ep

To the most High and Mighty Monarch, ELIZABETH, (my dread Sovereign) by the grace of God, Queen of England, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, &c.

IL my labour whatsoever, in translating another mans work, I present here unto your Highness, and consecrate to the happy and immortal memory of your most sacred Majesty. An attempt (I confess) in regard of mine own imperfections, venturesome and overbold; as the first enterprise, right hard and exposed to perill. Yet, most Worthy and Powerfull Empress; Who is there so unsufficient, that by the favourable aspect of your countenance, may not be graced and enabled? What so difficult and dangerous, which under the fortunate auspices of your Majesty, cannot be effected with ease and pass in safety?

Accept then, most gracious Lady, the first fruits of a few years study, for the benefit enjoyed of life and liberty. An offering, as well in that respect, as of myself the meanest of many thousands; under all proportion; but considering either the argument or the first Author, not much unfitting. He, in penning the History of the greatest State in his time, for exquisite eloquence had not his equal; no more than your Highness in glorious government at this day any second: Such are the incomparable perfections resplendent in your Royall person; the wonder of the world.

Vouchsafe also, of your accustomed clemency shewed to aliens, of your fervent zeal to learning and good letters, wherein (among other rare virtues and singular gifts seated in your Heroick mind) no Prince cometh near unto your Excellency, to reach forth your gracious hand to T. Livius: who having arrived long since and conversed as a meer stranger in this your famous Island, and now for love thereof learned in some sort the language, humbly craveth your Majesties favour to be ranged with other free denizens of that kind: so long to live under your Princely protection, as he shall duly keep his own allegiance, and acquaint your liege subjects with religious devotion after his manner, with wisdom, policy, ver-true, valour, loyalty, and not otherwise.

And the Almighty guard your Majesty alwaies with his holy Angels; prolong your life among us in perfect health, adorn your noble heart with divine graces, maintain your Regall estate in all honour: blest the rest of your daies (and infinite may they be) with sweet repose and firm peace, to the joy of your true-hearted and loving people; and finally, accomplish all your desires, for present prosperity and future felicity.

Your sacred Majesties most humble and obedient subject, Philemon Holland.

TO THE READER.

THE Rue is that Axiome received from Philosophy, τὸ ἐκ τῆς φθορᾶς γίγνεται ἄλλο. i. The corruption of one thing is the generation of another. Thus out of the ashes and ruines of Troy sprung the City of Rome: and by the woful fall of that one state, arose not only the most glorious empire of the Romans, but also the best writer of their history, Titus Livius. For whereas after the fatal destruction of Troy, two principal men of name remained alive, Aeneas and Antenor: the one with his fleet arriving in that coast of Italy where Tybre runneth, built Lavinium, and became the first father of the Romans, according to Virgil in the first Aeneid:

— genus unde Latinum, Albanique patres, ab aenea Romae?

— from whence are Latines come,
The noble Albanes eke, and walls of stately Rome.

Antenor entered the Venice gulf, & founded the City of Padua, the native place of Livy their historiographer; as the same Poet writeth a little after:

*Hic tamen ille urbem Patavum sedesque locavit

Yet here the City Padua built he: therein to plant
His Trojanes, left when Troy was lost, who resting seat did want.

And I wot not well, whether they were more beholden to that fortune of theirs, (whereof so much they boasted) for Aeneas the author of their beginning and admirable greatnes: than for this writer Livy, who commended their deeds to everlasting fame. For from their very first rising [even with Aeneas] unto their sensible declining and decay, were not 1200 years compleat: but since Livy enchronicled their acts, sixteen hundred are come and gone: yet continue they as fresh this day as at the first, and spread stil far and neer into all parts of the world. So much more durable and permanent are the memorials recorded by learned Historians, than either any Monarchy be it never so great, or all those wonderful Pyramides and Obeliskes, reared by most magnificent Kings, and mighty Emperors, to immortalize their name and memory. This T. Livius then, was born at Padua, in the year 694 after the foundation of Rome, when L. Afranius and Q. Cæcilius Metellus Celer were Consuls. He flourished lived all the time of Augustus Caesar, and died in the fourth year of Tiberius. By which account, he lived full LXXVI. years: as appeareth by an ancient Epitaph upon his tomb at Padua, (where it is thought he died) with the pourtrait of his visage: whereof the one is represented here, and the other immediately before the beginning of the History.

To the Reader.

Other evidences there be concerning the same, which needless it were to call to witness: for no Epitaph nor inscription either enchaſed in ſtone or cut in braſs, is there left, better than the monuments of his own writings (if they had come entire to our hands) and the testimony of good and approved authors. For during the time of Augustus, he wrote the worthy deeds of the Romans, and continued the narration thereof, from the very foundation of the City of Rome unto the one and twentieth year of his Empire. A story of 750 years, and a peece of work for the artificall frame and elegant setting out, comparable to the best in that kind. My purpose is not here, to enter into a large field and Rhetorical discourse of his praises in regard of any gifts of fortune wherewith he was plentifully enriched: namely, the place of his nativity, a City more ancient by 400 years than Rome; flourishing in martial puifſance, able to set out and maintain 100000 fighting-men for the wars; in stately port at home, having a nobility of 400 in number; in gorgeous and costly buildings; in traffique and frequent affluence of Marchants thither; as also, that Venice was a Colony deducted and drawn from thence; and, which is not the least, how at this day the famous Vniversity there, affordeth excellent Professors in all kind of learning: nor his happiness and felicity to live and die with the glory and beauty of Rome, and not to behold with his eyes those daies of her declining state & deformity, which in great wisdom he foresaw in his spirit, and denounced accordingly: ne yet the special favour wherein he stood with his Prince Augustus, and Livia the Empress: much less then mean I to set forth the singular qualities and perfections of his mind, and namely his rare and passing eloquence, which my pen is more able now to describe and amplify to the worthiness thereof, than it was to imitate and expresse the same in translating of his story. Moreover, if I should set into his commendation, besides that I must needs come far short of his merit, the thing it self would but renew the just grief, that all learned men have taken for the piteous maim and defect of that notable peece of work & uniform composition which he left unto posterity. For having digested the whole history into an hundred and two and forty books, as Petrarch was of opinion, and as Sigonius therein well collecteth: like as also it is evident by the Breviaries of L. Florus the Epitomist, wherof we have 140, with an evident flaw and default of twain, to wit, the 136 and 137: see the partial injury of the time, the crooked and malignant destiny of the man! Books of far less moment and importance, yea, & those of greater antiquity, have been spared & remain safe: but of that work of his, one fourth part hath not escaped the envy of fortune: and that which now is extant, hath been delivered unto us either by fragments of old copies unperfect, or by the over-curious meddling of some busy Aristarches of late daies depraved, who with their correcting have corrupted; and in stead of reforming words, have deformed the natural sense and primitive construction. Where, by the way, I must advertise the Reader of that which Pettus Crinitus hath observed, even against the common opinion proved by those who otherwise

are well learned, namely that our Author dispensed not this history into Decades: that is to say, suted and sorted them not into severall Tomes and Sections of ten books a peece. For Priscian and other old Grammarians, when they cite any testimony out of Livy, quote the book, and make no mention at all of any Decade; and with him the above-named Petrarch, Florus, and Politian do agree. Now in these 33 books, so few as they be, preserved as another Palladium out of a generall skare-fire, we may conceive the rare and wonderfull eloquence of our writer in the whole; for the farther he proceedeth into a world, as it were, of matter, the more copious still he floweth, and with such variety, as that he never iterateth one thing twice; but at every change of new affairs, returneth alwaies fresh and gay, furnished with new devises, inventions, and phrases; much like a second Anteu, gathering greater strength and more forces still at every turn; or after the manner of a little hill, which issuing from a small source, is maintained with fresh springs and new riverets; and halting toward the vast Ocean, carrieth a deeper channell and broader stream. For the form of his stile, I refer the readers to the sound and staid judgment rather of Quintilian, who compareth him with Herodotus, Thucydides, and the best Greeks; than to the fantastick conceits of some Criticks of our time, who seeking nodum in scirpo, have dreamed of I wot not what Paravinity in him. What should I speak of that Patheticall spirit of his in moving affections? But, that which most of all commendeth an history, which being lux veritatis, ought especially to deliver with sincerity the whole truth and nothing but the truth, without respect of face or person; to keep only to the substance and train of the subject argument; the due and orderly regard of the important circumstances thereto belonging, without incerting extravagant and impertinent by-matters, much less than fabulous tales; therein he hath the prick and price above all others. For, neither forbearth he to reprove (as occasion is offered) the Romans, in whose favour he might be thought to have written; nor doubteth to praise the good parts and the valiant exploits of their mortall enemies. The Gauls he may seem to gall more bitterly upon a sinister affection, glancing at them, as he doth, in many places for their greedy desire of gold and idle sloath, as not able to endure any long travell, and heat least of all; yet so, as the French, now living, seem not much offended therewith; for above other Nations they have given him most friendly entertainment, and twice enfranchised him among them. I am not unwilling to touch by the way this principall point and vertue of an Historiographer, I mean the delivery of a simple truth in his narrations; for that I have observed in him throughout, that he hath been most modest in reporting from others by hearsay any thing that soundeth to an untruth; so little deserveth he to be noted with the infamous brand of liew. The wary circumspection of his, in that behalf which I dare be bold to recommend unto the Reader, I proposed unto my self in making him English; endeavouring by conference especially of the select copies in Latine, yet not rejecting other translations (such as

To the Reader.

I had some little skill in)to come as near as possibly I could, to the true meaning of the Author ; making this account, that if I could approve my diligence that way to men of reason and understanding, all other my wants and defects might sooner be passed by and pardoned. A desire I had to perform, in some sort, that which is profitable to the most, namely, an english History of that C.W. which of all others (if I have any judgment) affordeth most plenteous examples of devout zeal in their kind, of wisdom, policy, justice, valour, and all vertues whatsoever. According to this purpose and intent of mine I framed my pen, not to any affected phrase, but a mean and popular stile. Wherein, if I have called again into use some old words, let it be attributed to the love of my country language : if the sentence be not so concise, couched and knit together, as the originall, loath I was to be obscure and dark ; have I not englished every word aptly ? Each Nation hath severall manners, yea, and terms appropriate by themselves ; have I varied in some places from the French or Italian ? Censured I look to be, and haply reprov'd ; but like as Alcibiades said to one, αδραστον εστιν ελπιειν, i.e. Strike hardly (Euribiades) so you bear me speak ; even so I say, Find fault and spare not ; but withall, read the originall better before ye give sentence. And howsoever I have faulted otherwise by oversight, set against it my affection and desire to do some good whiles I live to my sweet native country ; add thereto the long travel that I have taken to ~~write the same~~ ; and if that will not bring down the balance, let the profit and delight both, which you shall find in the argument and discourse of the history, counterpoise and outweigh my wants, more or less. And thus I recommend unto my countrymen Livy in english habit ; Livy (I say) who whether he were more honored whiles he lived, than beloved at this day of forraign nations, I cannot easily determine ; for like as then (by the testimony of S. Hieron, and Pliny in his Epistles) there repaired many great and noble personages from the farthest parts of Spain and France, only to see his face, for the admiration they conceived of him by the fame of his incomparable eloquence ; even so Quintus his spirit (which yet liveth in his writings) hath made a voyage by Florence into the same France and Spain, and hath passed as far as into Arabia one way, and Almain another. In which distant and remote parts he hath found such kind entertainment, not only in Courts of Emperors and Kings, in palaces of Princes and great Potentates ; but also with the people in generall ; that they seem to strive no less (who may endow him with most ample franchises and free burgesie) than those seven cities in old time who every one challenged to themselves the birth of the Poet Homer. Since then, he hath thus long been desirous to cross the seas into this noble Island, not as a traveller to sojourn for a time in the Court only or the Universties, but to remain here still both in City and country, and thereto hath learned our language indifferently ; let it now appear that this nation of ours (like to reap as great fruit and benefit by his acquaintance as any other) is ready to receive and embrace him as friendly as the rest.

I had some time before this to come as near as possible to the true meaning of the Author, making it a point that it should approve my intelligence, that way to men of reason and understanding, all other my wishes and desires might sooner be called by and pardoned. A desire I had to perform, in some sort, what his spirit had to the world, name-ly an English History of the Q. W. which of all others (if I have any judgment) I thought most pleasant examples of devotion and in their kind of wisdom, justice, valour, and all virtues whatsoever. Accord- ing to this purpose and intent of mine I framed my pen, and now as- signed place to a mean and popular style. Whence it I have called again- ing to the world, and to the love of my country.

OF THE HISTORIES
TITUS LIVIUS OF PADUA, FROM THE FOUNDATION OF THE CITY OF ROME.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the First Book.

A He coming of Aeneas into Italy, and his acts there: the reign of Alcanius in Alba: of Sylvius Aeneas, and so forth of other Sylvii, Kings thereof, are contained in the first Book. The daughter of Numitor with child by Mars, Romulus and Remus are born. Amulius killed. The City of Rome built by Romulus. The Senate by him chosen. He made war with the Sabines. He presented unto Jupiter Feretrius the royall spoiles of their King, whom he slew with his own hands. He divided the people into Centuries, vanquished the Fidenates and Veientians, and was canonized a god. Numa Pompilius taught the rites and ceremonies of sacrifice, and divine service, erected a Temple to Janus, and was the first that shut the doores thereof, after he had made peace with all the Nations thereabout: and finding that he had secret company and conference by night with the goddesse Egeria, won the stout and fierce hearts of the people to Religion. Tullus Hostilius warred upon the Albans, whereupon ensued the combate of the three brethren, twins on both sides. Horatius made acquit for killing his sister. The execution of Metius Suffetius. Alba raised and destroyed. The Albans made free denizens of Rome, and there dwell. War denounced against the Sabines. Finally, Tullus was consumed with lightning. Ancus Martius renewed the ceremonies by Numa first ordained. He to the Latines, being conquered and made Citizens of Rome, he assigned the mount Aventinero inhabit. He won again by force a town of the Latines called Politorium, which the old Latines had surprised and possessed themselves of, and utterly destroyed it. He made the Sublician or wooden bridge over Tybris, and adjoyned to the City the hill Janiculum. He enlarged the bounds of the Empire, built Ostia, and reigned three and thirty years. In the time of his reign, Lucumo the son of Demaratus a Corinthian, removed from Tarquins, a City of Tuscan, and came to Rome: and there entering into amity with Ancus, began to bear the name of Tarquinius, and so to be called: and after the death of Ancus took the Kingdom upon him. He increased the number of the Senators by one hundred, subdued the Latines, appointed the Circus or Theater, set forth the publicke games and plaies: and being warred upon by the Sabines, he augmented the centuries of the horsemen. And for to make prooffe and triall of Accius Navius the Augur his cunnings, he demanded of him, as they say, whether that which he conceived in his mind were possible to be effected: and when he made answer that it was, he commanded him to cut a whetstone in two with a razor, which out of hand was by Accius done. Moreover, he won the field of the Sabines, and defeated them, walled the City about, made the vaulted fink: and when he had reigned eight and thirty years, was murdered by the sons of Ancus. There succeeded after him Servius Tullius, the son of a Captive, a nable Lady of Corniculum, who being a child, and lying swaddled in the cradle, had a flame of fire (as the report goeth) burning about his head. He discomfited the Veientes and Tuscans in battell: He was the first that numbred the people of Rome, valued their goods and instituted the Lustrum every five years, in which were reputed to have been numbred eighty thousand Citizens. He described the Classes and Centuries: set out further the bounds of the Pomaria, without and within the City walls: and put to the City the hills Quirinalis, Viminalis, and Esquilinus. He together with the Latines founded the Temple of Diana in mount Aventine, and when he had reigned four and thirty years, he was, with the privy, and by the counsell of his daughter Tullia, murdered by L. Tarquinius, the son of Priscus. After him L. Tarquinius Superbus usurped the Kingdom, without the election, either of the Senators or the people. On which day Tullia (most wicked and cursed wretch that she was) caused her Coach to be driven over the Corps of her father, lying dead on the ground. He had about him a troop of armed men for the guard of his person. By a subtile wile he put to death Turnus Herdonius. He had war with the Volscians, and of their spoiles edified a Temple to Jupiter, on the hill Capitoll, where the god Terminus and goddesse Juventas, agreed not to be displaced, whose altars could not be stirred nor removed, as the others. the fraudulent practise of his son Sex. Tarquinius he brought the Gabians to his obedience. Unto his other H two sons, being gone to Delphi, and consulting there the Oracle, whether of them should be King of Rome, answer was made, That he should reign who first kissed his mother: which answer they interpreting wrong, Junius Brutus, who accompanied them in their voyage, made as though he caught a fall, and kissed the ground, the mother indeed of all: which proved true on his part as it fell out in the end. For when as Tarquinius Superbus by his proud tyrannicall demeanour, had incurred the hatred of all men: he at last upon the forcible outrage and villany done by Sex. Tarquinius (his son) in the night season upon the body of Lucretia: who sending for her father Tricipitinus, and her husband Collatinus, besought them earnestly not to see her death unrevenge, and so with a knife killed her selfe: he, I say, by the means of Brutus, especially was driven and expelled out of Rome, when he had reigned five and twenty years. Then were the Consuls first created, Lu. Jun. Brutus, and Lu. Tarquinius Collatinus.

WHether in writing the acts and affairs of the people of Rome, from the first Foundation of the City, I shall perform a work of importance and worth my travail, neither wor I well, nor if I will, dare I avouch: seeing it is a thing both old and usuall, that new Writers alwaies perswade themselves, either in matter to deliver more truth and certainty, or in manner of curious penning thereof, to outgo the rudenesse of elder time. How- K soever it fall out, this yet will do me good, that even I also, to the utmost of my power, have endeavoured to eternize the worthy deeds of that people which is the sovereign of the whole world. And if, among so many Writers, my fame chance to be obscure, yet may I comfort my selfe in this, That they who shall darken and shadow the same, are men so highly reputed and renowned. Besides, the thing it self is of infinite toile and labour, as counting and comprizing from above 700 years past, and which arising from small beginning hath proceeded and grown so great, as now the bignesse thereof is combrous to it self: and I doubt not, but the Readers for the most part will take but small delight and pleasure, either in those far-fetched Originals, or in the times next ensuing, for haste they make to these novelties of later daies, wherein the puissance of that so mighty people hath wrought long since their own downfall and overthrow. But I contrariwise will seek even this for L guerdon of my pains, namely, to turn away from beholding these calamities, which this our Age for many years hath seen, so long at least: whilst I call to remembrance, and wholly employ my spirits in considering those ancient monuments of old time, exempt from care and trouble, which were able, if not to with draw my mind as I write from the truth, yet to make it pensive and heavy. As for such things as are reported, either before, or at the Foundation of the City, more beautified and set out with Poets Fables, than grounded upon pure and faithfull Records, I mean neither to aver nor disprove. This leave and priviledge hath antiquity, by interlacing the acts of gods and men together, to make the first rising of Cities more sacred and venerable. And if it may be lawfull for any people under heaven to consecrate and ascribe unto the gods their Originall, surely, such is the renowned martiall prowess of the Romans, that all nations of the world may as well abide them to M report Mars above the rest, to be the prime father both of themselves and of their first founder, as they can be content to live in subjection under them. But these and such like matters, howsoever they shall hereafter be censured or esteemed, I will not greatly weigh and regard. This would I have every man rather to think upon in good earnest, and consider with me what their life, and what their carriage was, by what men and means, both in war and peace, their dominion was achieved and enlarged. Afterward as their discipline began by little and little to shrink, let him mark how at the very first their behaviour and manners sunk withall: and how still they fell more and more to decay and ruin, yea, and began soon after to tumble down right even untill these our daies, wherein we can neither endure our own sores, nor salves for the cure. For this is it that is so good and profitable in an history, when a man may see and behold, as in a conspicuous monument and lightfom memoriall N the lively examples of all sorts, set up in open view for his instruction, whereout he may chuse for himself and his Country what to follow, as also learn how to eschew a foul enterprise, and avoid a shamefull end. But unlesse I be deceived with the affectionate love of mine own commenced work, never was there Common-weal, either more mighty, more holy, and devout, better stored of good presidents, or into which covetousnesse and excesse more lately crept, or wherein poverty and frugality were so greatly or so long time honoured, insomuch as the more they wanted, the lesse they desired. Now of late daies wealth hath brought in avarice, abundant pleasures have kindled a desire by riot, lust, and loose life, to destroy and bring all to naught. But these complaints, which will be nothing pleasant, no not when perhaps they shall be needfull, banish we must (howsoever we do) at our first entrance of so weighty a matter: when as we rather should begin (if as the Poets use, it were our manner also) with good prefaces and lucky forespeakings, with vows and prayers to gods and goddesses, to vouchsafe their furtherance and happy successe to the enterprise of so great a Work.

The First Book OF TITUS LIVIUS.

A First of all, this is generally held for certain, That the Greeks, after the winning of Troy, dealt cruelly with all the Trojans, save only Aeneas and Antenor: to whom, as well in regard of the bond of mutuall entertainment, as also for that they ever perswaded peace and the rendring again of Helen, they wholly forbore to shew any rigour at all, as by martiall right of war they might have done. And how Antenor afterwards, accompanied with a number of Henetians, who driven by civill discord out of Papilagonia, and having lost at Troy their King Pylemenes, were to seek both a resting place, and a Captain to conduct them, arrived through many adventures and accidents of fortune, in the inmost gulf of the Adriatick sea: and after they had expelled the Enganians that inhabited between the sea and the Alps, those Henetians together with the Trojans, kept those parts and there remained. The place where first they landed, called Troy, whereof the Territory and Seigniorie thereabout was also named Troy, and the whole people in generall called Henetians. Moreover, how Aeneas upon like misfortune, having fled his countrey, yet aspiring by the farall dironion of the destinies to greater affairs, came first into Macedony: and after into Sicily, seeking an abiding place: and sailing with a fleet from Sicily arrived at length, and landed in the countrey of Laurentum: which place likewise was termed Troy. Where the Trojans being set a shore, having after their long wandering nothing in a manner left them but ships and armour, as they foraged and drave booties out of the Countrey, King Latinus with the Aborigines, who at that time inhabited those parts, ran forth in warlike manner out of town and countrey, to withstand the violent invasion of these strangers. But what befell thereupon, is two manner of waies reported. Some say, that Latinus being in a battell vanquished, first made peace with Aeneas, and after that allied himself to him by marriage. Others affirm, that as both armies stood ranged in battell array, before the trumpets sounded the battell, Latinus came forth into the Vanguard, and called out the Generall of the strangers to parle: demanding who they were, from whence they came, by what chance they departed from their own home, and to what end they entred the Laurentine borders? After that he heard the company were Trojans, the Captain Aeneas, son of Pennus and Anchises, and that upon the burning of their City, they having forgone their countrey, sought some place to abide and build them a City in: wondred much, not only at the noblenesse of the people and their leader, but also at their courageous hearts, resolved either for war or peace: whereupon, by giving his right hand he plight his troth, and faithfully promised them friendship and amity. So the two Generals made a League, and each host saluted other. And Aeneas was by Latinus entertained and lodged in the Court. Where Latinus solemnly in presence of his familiar household gods, by giving his daughter in marriage to Aeneas, joynd private alliance to the former publike confederacy. Which thing truly put the Trojans in good hope, and full assurance to end one day their wandering and sitting to and fro, and to settle themselves in one certain place of abode. Hereupon, a Town they built, which Aeneas of his wives name called Latvium. Within a while, by this new marriage, he had issue a son, whom the parents named Ascanius. But after all this, were both Trojans and Aborigines warred upon: For Turnus King of the Rutilians, unto whom Latinus, before Aeneas his coming, had been espoused, taking it to heart that a stranger was preferred before him, made war both upon Aeneas and Latinus: but neither Army departed from the battell with joy and well apaid: For the Rutilians were vanquished: the Aborigines and Trojans won indeed the field, but lost their Captain Latinus. Then Turnus and the Rutilians mistrusting their own strength, fled for succour to the puissant and mighty Tuscans, and to their King Mecenas, who keeping his Royall Court at Cere, a town in those daies of great wealth, not well pleased even from the first beginning, with the foundation of a new City and supposing the Trojans power was already much more encreased than might well stand with the safety of the borderers, joynd full willingly his forces with the Rutilians. Aeneas to win the hearts of the Aborigines against so dreadful and dangerous war, to the end they all should not only live under one government, but also be all of one name, called both Nations Latines. And from that time forth were the Aborigines nothing inferior to the Trojans in love and loyalty towards their Prince Aeneas. Aeneas also trusting confidently in the valiant and faithfull hearts of these two States, growing up daily more and more in mutuall amity, albeit Hebronia was so mighty, that the name thereof was renowned not only throughout the inland parts, but the sea coasts also, even from one end of Italy to the other, from the Alpes to the narrow seas of Sicily: yet whereas he might well have resisted the force of his enemies, and maintained a defensive war within his walls, he brought his Army forth into the open field. This was the second battell that the Latines fought, and the last deed that ever Aeneas, whilst he was man, achieved. And howsoever by right he ought to be named, he lieth interred upon the river Numicius, and Jupiter Indiges men him call. Now was not Ascanius, Aeneas his son, ripe as yet for age to sway the Scepter. Howbeit the Royall Crown remained whole and safe for him, untill he came to fourteen years of age. So long continued the state of the Latines, and the Kingdom by grandfire and father descended, unto the child's behoof: under the government only of a woman, as Prote-stresse: of so vertuous disposition and princely carriage was Dame Lavinia. Doubtfull much I stand (for who can certainly avouch a thing so long ago?) whether this were that Ascanius, or one elder than he, who had to his mother Cremus, whilst Ilium flourished, and who fled with his father from thence, and from whom being named Ascanius, the house and family of the Julii do fetch their name and pedigree. That same Ascanius, wheresoever, or of whomsoever he was born, (but Aeneas his son of a truth he was) when Lavinium grew exceeding populous, left that City now flourishing and wealthy (as the world went then) unto his mother or stepmother, I wot not whether. He himself built another out of the ground under the mountain Alba, which of the situation thereof, stretching out in length on the side of the hill, was named Long Alba. Between the building of Lavinium and Long Alba, which became an under-town or Colony drawn out of the other, and peopled from thence, were almost thirty years. But so mighty grew they, especially after the discomfiture of the Tuscans, that neither upon the death of Aeneas, nor during the time of a woman's government, nor all the while that the young Prince learned to be a King, durst either Mezentius, or the Tuscans, or any other of the borderers once stir or rise in arms. But peace was concluded upon these termes, That the river Alba, which now they call Tybris, should divide the Tuscans from the Latines, and limit to either of them their own bounds. After this, reigned Sylvius, the son of Ascanius, born by chance within the Forrests: who begat Eneus Sylvius, and he had issue Latinus Sylvius, by whom were certain Colonies or petty Townships erected, and the inhabitants named Prisci Latini. And from thenceforth all the Kings of Alba continued the surname of Sylvius. This Latinus begat Alla, of Alla came Atys, Atys begat Capor, and of Capor descended Capetus: whose son Tiberinus in ferrying over the river Alba was drowned, and by his name renowned that river unto all posterity. Next unto him reigned Agrippa his son, and after him succeeded Romulus Sylvius in his fathers Kingdom, who being stricken dead with a thunderbolt, left the Crown to Aventinus. This Aventinus was buried in that hill, which now is part of the City of Rome, and beareth his name. Then reigned Proas, who had two sons, Nunitor and Amulius. And unto Nunitor, because he was the elder, he bequeathed by his last will and testament the ancient Kingdom of the Sylvians line. Howbeit, might prevailed more than either the will of the father, or the reverend regard of elder brother. For Amulius having driven out Nunitor, sought himself and not here with content, heareth one mischief upon another. For first he murdered the issue male of his brother: then by making Rhea Sylvia his brother's daughter a Vestall Nun, and that under colour of honour and dignity, by perpetuall vowed virginity, he bereft her of all hope of child-bearing. But it was a fatal thing, and (as I think) which God would have, that so great a City should be built for to yield the ground and beginning of that Empire, which next under the gods is most mighty. For behold, the Vestall Virgin was by force defouled, and after delivered of two twins: and were it that she thought so in very deed, or because the name and credit of a god might carry away and shake the fault more cleanly, the fathered her bastard children upon Mars. But neither god nor man was able to save her self or her children from the Kings cruelty. For the Votary was committed to close prison, and there kept bound in irons: as for the babes he commanded they should be cast into the stream of the river. But (as God would) by good hap the Tyber overflowed the banks, and the standing waters on either side was nothing rough, yet so, as there was no coming to the deep current or channell of the very river, and they that brought the infants, hoped well they might be drowned in any place of the water, were it never so full and low. So to fulfill after a sort the Kings commandment, they laid the children in the next place they came to: even where as now standeth the fig-tree Ruminalis, called, as they say, Romulus: but all that ground then was nothing but waste deserts, and a very wilderness. The report yet goeth, that when the ebbe and shallow water was gone, and had left on dry ground the floating trough or vessel, wherein the babes were put forth, a she-Wolf from out of the mountains thereby being athirst, turned towards the childrens cry, and with her pendant teats so gently gave the infants suck, that Faustulus the head Reeve and overseer of the Kings Cartell found her licking them with her tongue: who brought them to his homestead, and gave them to his wife Laurentia to be fostered. There be that think that Laurentia being a common stamper among these herdmen and shepherds, was usually called Lupa. Whereupon arose the occasion of this strange tale and wondrous miracle. Well, so were they born, and so brought up. And as soon as they grew once to some big-ness, it was no boot to keep them within doores, nor to set them idly to tend the cartell, for they would use to hunt abroad in the Forrest: whereby having gotten strength of body, and courage with-all, they were able now, not only to withstand the violence of wild beasts, and to kill them, but also to set upon common robbers by the high-waies side, laden as they were with booties, and to spoile them thereof, yea, and divide the prey among the shepherds, and as the number of youngers daily increased with them to keep holidays, to make merry, and follow their disports. And even in those daies

A daies (as men say) was the festivall pastime Lupercal, used in mount Palatine, which of Palantium, Lupercal, a City in Arcadia, was first called Palantium, and after Palatine, wherein Evander, who descended Evander.
from the Arcadians, long before reigned in that country, and ordained a solemn game and recreation yearly to be held, as aforesaid in Arcadia, in this manner: that young men in the honor of Pan Pan Lycæus or Lycæus, whom the Romans after called Inuus, should loofely and wantonly run naked. Now whilest they were busily occupied in this kind of sport, which by vow yearly they performed; there lay in ambush the robbers aforesaid, in revenge and for anger of the prizes which they had lost: Where Romulus manfully quit himself, but Remus they took prisoner: and being thus taken, they brought Remus taken him before King Amulius, accusing him grievously, and laying especially to his charge, that he with B others invaded and made rodes into Numitor his Land, and with a power of lusty youths, assembled in warlike sort, had forraged and spoiled the same. Thus was Remus delivered unto Numitor to be put to death. Now had Fausstulus even since the first day conceived some hope, that there were in his house foster children of royall blood: For well he wist, that both by the Kings commandment the babes were cast forth to perish, and also that the time when he took them up fell out fitly thereunto; marry this would he in no wise should be known in haste, and before due time; unless it were either upon good occasion or great necessity. Necessity hapned first: and so for very fear he was driven to reveal the whole matter to Romulus. It hapned also, that Numitor himself having Remus in durance, and hearing they were brethren twins, by comparing their age, and viewing withall their very countenance and towardness, proceeding from no servile and base parentage, bethought himself of his C sisters children: and by farther enquiry and computation came so far, as he seemed well-near to acknowledge Remus for his nephew. Thus on all hands were means wrought to circumvent and surprize King Amulius. For Romulus on the one side not accompanied with a troupe of tall fellows, for he was not able in open fight to make his part good: but giving the herdmen his assistants, in charge to come at a time appointed, some one way, and some another, to the Kings Palace, he set upon the King. On the other side, Remus with another crew from Numitor his house, came to second him, and so they slew the King. Numitor at the first uprore giving out estoons, that the enemies had entered the City, and assailed the Kings Palace, and thereupon having called the youth of Alba into the Citadell, to keep it by force with a good guard, and espying the two young men after the murder done, comming towards him with joy: forthwith assembled the people together, and declared openly before them all, the wicked dealings of his brother against him, the parentage of his Nephews, D the manner of their birth and bringing up, and how they came to be known: after that he reported the murder of the Tyrant, and took it upon himself as the author thereof. The two young men passing with their companies through the midst of the people, saluted their grandfire King, whereat the whole multitude also with one accord and voice ratified the same: so was his royall name and estate by them established. Thus was the whole Regiment or Kingdom of the Albans committed to Numitor.
Then Romulus and Remus had a great desire to found themselves a City in the very place where they had been cast forth and fostered. Now were there of Albans and Latines both, very many that might be spared; besides, a number of herdmen: who all set together, put them in good hope, that Alba and Lavinium too, would be but small Cities in comparison of that which now was a E building. Whilest they were devising of these things, an old canker came between to mar all, even desire of rule and ioveraignty, the same which had troubled their grandfires before them: and thereupon a foule fray, which arose from a small and slight occasion. Forasmuch as they were both twins at one birth, and the respect of their age might yeeld no choice and difference, it was thought good and agreed upon, that the gods, who had the tuition of those places, should by Augury or flight of birds declare and shew whether of the twain should both name the City, and also rule the same. Romulus chose the mount Palatine, and Remus the Aventine, for their temples or religious quarters, to mark the bird-flight, and each one apart to receive their Augury. First (as they say) had Remus appearing in flight six vultures or gripes: and as tidings came unto him of this Augury, it hapned that the number unto Romulus was presented double: whereupon they were both of them by F their assistants and favorites saluted Kings. The one side took the vantage of the time: the other of the number, for the prerogative of the Kingdom. Thus they fell to hot words first, and from cho-lerick words to blows and bloudshed: in which stir and preys of the people, Remus was wounded and slain in the place. The more common report goeth, that Remus in scorn of his brother, leapt over the new walls: whereupon Romulus in great choler slue his brother with his own hands, and in menacing wise, added these words withall, So perish he, whatever else he be. that shall once dare to leap over my walls. Thus Romulus alone became King, and the City new built, of the founders name was called Rome. Wherein first he fortified mount Palatine, in which he was himself reared. To all the rest of the gods he sacrificed after the rule and custome of the Albans: only to Hercules after the manner of the Greeks, according to the first institution of Evander. For the G same goeth, that Hercules upon a time, after he had slain Geryon, drave that way exceeding fair Oxen, and near the River Tybris, where he had sworn over with his drove afore him, laid him down in a fair green meadow, as well to refresh himself, being weary of his way, as also to rest and bait his cattell in so plentifull grasse and forrage. There, falleth he into a sound sleep, as having well charged himself with wine and viands: and one Cacus a shepherd dwelling thereby, a man right fierce, and bearing him proudly of his strength, being greatly in love with the fairness of the beasts, had a good will, and minded to fetch away that booty: but for that if he had driven the beasts into his own cave, the very tracks would have led the owner of them thither, H he drew the goodliest and biggest of them backward by their tails into his hole. Hercules early in the morning when he awoke, and beheld his drove, and missed some of his count, went on towards the next cave, if haply their footing would traine him thither: But seeing all traces fromwards, and leading no other way; as one troubled in spirit, and doubtfull what to do, he began to drive farther out of that theevish and dangerous corner. But as some of the Oxen in driving, misled their fellows behind and honing after them, bellowed as their nature is: Hercules chanced to heare them low again, and answer from out of the cave wherein they had been bestowed: whereat he turned back, and made haste thither. But as Cacus forcibly made head against him, and would have kept him from entrance, Hercules smote him with his club: and for all his calling upon other herdmen for help, flew him outright. At the same time Evander, who fled out of Peloponnesus, governed that Countrey, rather by a kind of countenance and authority, than by force and Lordly command. A man much honored for his wonderfull invention of Letters, a strange and rare thing among thoe rude and unlearned sort: but more honored for the opinion that the people had of his mother Carmens, reputed to be a goddesse, whom for her spirit of prophesie, thoe countries, before that Sybilla came into Italy, had in great reverence and admiration. This Evander being raised with the concourie of the shepherds, affrighted about the stranger, guilty of manifest murder, and hearing of the fact committed, and the occasion thereof: viewing well therewith the perion of the man, his feature and favour, more stately a good deal, and carrying a greater Majesty than the ordinary proportion of men: demaneth of him who he was. And as soon as he understood his name, his father, and native Countrey: O Hercules (quoth he) the son of Jupiter, All hail: my mother a most true Prophetess hath fore-shewed unto me, that thou shalt encrease the number of heavenly wights, and that in this place an Altar shall be reared and dedicated unto thee, which the most mighty and richest nation one day of the world shall name Maxima, and honour according to the ceremonies by thee ordained. In a good hour be it spoken (quoth Hercules) and the presage I gladly accept: and so giving him his hand, faithfully promised to accomplish the will of the gods, and erected it raightwaies and consecrated an Altar in the place. There and then first, he sacrificed one of the fairest Oxen, choien out of the whole drove, calling to the ministry of that divine service and feast, the Potitii and Pinarii, two most noble houses at that time in those parts. It hapned so, by chance, that the Potitii were ready at hand in due time, and the inwards or intrals were set before them: which being eaten, the Pinarii came to the good chear behind: whereupon the custome held that so long as the family of the Pinarii continued they might not feed of the sacred inwards. But the Potitii, instructed by Evander, became the Priests of that holy sacrifice many ages after: untill the solemp service and ministry of this family was put over to publike servants, and the whole stock of the Potitii utterly worn out and dead. These were the only forrain sacrifices of all other, that Romulus received and admitted, being even then a furtherer and maintainer of immortality, by his own prowess achieved, and whereunto his fortune conducted him. Having in this manner religiously performed and established the service of the gods, he assembled the multitude to an audience: and for that they could by no means but by Laws be united together into one body and society of a people, he devised Statutes, and ministred justice unto them. And supposing that those Laws would be accounted sacred and inviolable of the wild and rusticall sort of men, in case he shewed himself by some regall ensignes venerable: he carried with him a greater port and Majesty, not only in his robes and princely habit, but most of all in the attendance of twelve Officers and Sergeants, called Lictours, whom he caused to go ordinarily before his person. Some think he chose this number according to the birds, which by Augury did foreshew and prognosticate his reign: I rather am of their opinion, who think that Sergeants at Arms, and this kind of Officers came from the Tuscans their neighbours, from whence also the Ivory chair of estate, called Sella curulis, and the Royall purple robe embroidered, named Toga pretexta, was fetched, as also the very number of Serjeants or Lictors. For that the Tuscans had this manner, when they chose their King by the common voices of their twelve principall States, each one found a Sergeant. All this while grew the City more and more to be fortified with Ramparts and Bulwarks, as men still built in sundry places where they liked best, seeming thereby to provide rather for a future multitude in time to come, than for the present number wherewith it was then peopled. Furthermore, lest that the City, so large in compasse, should stand void and vacant, Romulus for to encrease the number of the inhabitants (according to the old practise of the founders of Cities, who by gathering about them the base multitude and obscure, feigned that they were an off-spring born out of the earth) set up a Sanctuary or lawlesse Church, called Asylum, in that place which at this day between the two groves, is enclosed and fenced round about with thick briars and brambles. Thither resorted (as to a place of refuge, out of the neighbor Countries, a rabble and confused medley of all sorts, rag and rag, bond and free, one with another; folk desirous of change and novelty.

So began first the City according to the plot of large buildings, to be well peopled and grow mighty. Thus being provided of power sufficient: he thought then upon a Councell and policy to his power. And so created a hundred Senators: either because that number seemed great enough, or for that there were no more but one hundred that were of worth to be elected counsellors or (wise) fathers. These men certainly for honor and dignity were called Patres or Sage fathers: and their lineall descent Patritii or Nobles. Now by this time was the State of Rome so mighty and puissant,

A puissant, that it was able in fight to match any City meer adjoining whatsoever. But for default of woman kind, this puissance was to endure burthensome of one man: for neither had they hope of issue among themselves at home, nor yet made marriages with their neighbors abroad. Whereupon Romulus by the advice of his Senators, sent Embassadors to the countries thereabout, to treat for society and alliance for his new people, by way of marriage. Alledging that Cities also, as well as God withal, grow to great power and reputation: "Whereas therefore they were full well assured, that as the gods were gracious to their first uprising, so their own vertue and valor should not be wanting: their neighbors ought not, in regard of common humanity, and as they were men, think much and disdain to join in blood and kindred with them, being also men as well as they." Howbeit, this embassage in no place had gentle audience and courteous entertainment. For they all in general despised them, and were in fear for themselves and their posterity, by reason of so mighty a state, encroaching in the midst of them, and under their very noses. And from the midst of them the Embassadors were dismissed and sent away, with great scorn and demand. Whether they had set up a Sanctuary or lawless place for women to resort to, for that were alone, and a fit marriage indeed to sort together. This took the youth of Rome in great displeasure, and double the quarrel grew like to be tried, by knocks. But Romulus dissembling his inward heart-burning, to the end he might find time and place meet for the purpose, prepareth to set forth certain solemn playes and games, which he nameth Consualia, to the honor of Neptunus Equestris. Hereupon he commanded to proclaim these games all over the country adjoining: and with as great preparation and furniture, as in those days either their skill or ability might afford, they celebrate the same, and all to make the shew more goodly, and worthy to great expectation. Thither resorted many a one, desirous also to see this new City, but their next neighbors especially of Cenina, Crustumium, and Antemna. The whole multitude of Sabins likewise came with their wives and children. Who being friendly invited to their houses, from one to another, and courteously entertained: when they beheld the situation of the City, the strong walls and fair buildings, so thick standing, wondered how in so short a space the City of Rome was grown so great. Now when the time of this solemn fight was come, and that their minds were bured, and their eyes bent thereon: then at once, as it was agreed before, there arose an uproar. And the youth of Rome upon a token and watch-word given, fell on every side to carry away the Sabin Maidens. A great many of them were ravished by hap hazard, as they did light upon them, and as they came next to their hands. Other some more beautiful then the rest, were appointed for the chief of the Senators, and by certain of the Commons, as they had given them in charge, conveyed home to their houses. But one passing fair and lovely above all others, was hurried by the company of one of Thalassius (they say) and when as any asked to whom they carried her, they ever cried out (for fear she should be forced or deflowered) Thalassio, i. e. Unto Thalassius. Whereupon Thalassio became a common by-word at Weddings ever after. Thus their sport and pastime upon this fir and fright, was marred: and the Parents of the Virgins fled away with heavy cheer, blaming them highly, and complaining of their breach of hospitality: and calling upon the god for vengeance, to whose festival games they being come, were under colour of religion and truth, beguiled. The Damsels likewise that were ravished, conceived neither better hope of themselves, nor less indignation against them. But Romulus himself in person went from one to another, declaring, "That their fathers pride, who denied their neighbors marriage was the cause of all this, promising nevertheless that they should be linked in lawful wedlock, made partakers of all worldly goods, obtain the freedom of a City, and (then, which nothing is more deer to mankind) enjoy the blessing of children: exhorting them to appease their anger, and quiet themselves, and to give them their hearts, whose hap it was to have their bodies. For oftentimes upon wrong and injury there groweth love and reconciliation. Alledging moreover, that they should find their spouses so much more loving and kind, as every one of them for his part would endeavour, after they had in their turn and course fulfilled the duty to them of good husbands, for to make amends, and supply the miss they have of father, mother, and native countrey. Their husbands withal used fair speeches, and flattering words, excusing the matter, and laying all the weight upon fervent affection and pure love: which kind of perswasion of all other, prevaleth most with womens nature. Thus were the ravished young Wives in some sort quieted in mind, and held themselves well contented. But their fathers then most of all arrayed in mourning weed, with tears and heavy complaints, stirred up the Cities where they dwelt: neither contained they their mood within home, but assembled themselves from all parts unto Tatius the King of the Sabins: and to him repaired their Embassages, for that the name of Tatius was highly renowned in those countries. They thought that Tatius and the Sabins dealt but coldly in the action, and went but slowly about revenge. These three nations therefore banded themselves, and agreed to prepare for war. But so sharp let were the Ceninians that the men of Crustumium and Antemna, bestirred not themselves quick enough for them. So they of Cenina entered alone by force of arms the Territories of the Romans. As they wasted and spoiled without order and measure Romulus met them with an army, composed, put to flight, and pursued in chase their whole host slew their King in battel, and him despoiled: and having slain their General, at the first assault he won the town: and after he had from thence thence brought back his army with conquest and victory, as a man no less desirous to shew his noble acts with glory, then to achieve the same by prowess, he bare afore him on high as a pompous Pageant in a frame fitly for the purpose wrought, the spoile and armor of his enemies Captain, by himself slain: and so ascended up to the Capitol Hill, where laying them down at the Oak which the shepherds had in great reverence, he consecrated them as a present to Jupiter: and set out withal, the foundation and bounds of a Temple unto him: giving moreover this addition and title to the god, and saying solemnly: "O Jupiter Feretrius, I King Romulus upon my victory, present unto thee this armor of a King, and within this compass of ground, which even now I have conceived and assigned, I dedicate a Temple, to receive thosierich and royal spoils, which the posterity, following mine example, shall bear away from the Kings and Captains general of their enemies, whom they shall happen hereafter to kill. This is the very beginning of that Temple, which first of all other was in Rome consecrated. And so it pleased God, that neither the first founders words were spoken in vain, whereby he foretold and pronounced, that his posterity should bring their spoils thither: nor his glory made vulgar and common to many co-partners with him in the like exploit and glorious present. For after him, in so many years, and after so many wars, two royal spoils, only were won of the enemies. So rare was the happiness of honor in that behalf. Whilst the Romans were thus employed about Cenina, the army of the Antemnates, taking the vantage of time, and of the Romans absence from home, and seeing their frontiers without a guard, with a power of armed men entred the confines of Rome. Against whom also the Roman Legion made head in all haste, and finding them scattered out of order in the fields, charged upon them. By reason whereof, at the very first shock and shout made discomfited were the enemies and their town surprized. As Romulus returned with triumph and joy for these two victories, his Wife Herfilia, at the importunate sute of the Wives that had been ravished, earnestly besought him to pardon their fathers, and receive them into his City: for so by concord and unity the Weale-publick, and the good estate of his Kingdom might flourish and grow mighty. This sute was gently heard, and soon obtained. After this, he set forth against the Crustuminians that began to war upon him: with whom he had the less ado, for that their courages were well abated already by the overthrowes of others. To both these places as unto Colonies, were new inhabitants sent. But the greater number were desirous to enter their names, and to plant themselves at Crustuminum, for the fertility of the soil. And many likewise removed from thence to Rome, the parents especially and kinsfolk of the ravished women. Last of all, the Sabins warred far more sharply and dangerously then the rest, for nothing did they either in fury and rage, or for covetous desire of spoil. Neither made they talk and shew of war, before they warred indeed and were seen in field. And besides this their considerate policy, they dealt also with craft and subtilty. For whereas one Sp. Tarpeius had the charge of the Castle in Rome, his daughter a young maiden, Tarvis with a sum of money corrupted and procured, at what time as she went to fetch water without the walls for sacrifice, to receive armed souldiers into the fortrels. But so soon as they were let in, they with their armor smothered and killed her: either for that thereby it might be thought the Castle was won by force: or because they would make her an example to posterity, that no Traitor should ever think to escape unpunished. But hereto belongeth a tale, namely, that the Sabins used commonly on their left arms to wear bracelets of masse and weighty gold, and fair rings besides on their fingers, set with precious stones of great value; and that she covenanted and agreed with them to have that which they wear on their left hands, whereupon she had their targets in stead of those golden ornaments, heaped upon her. Others say, that upon agreement and covenant made to deliver that which was on their left hands, she demanded their armor, and because she seemed to deal deceitfully, she was overtaken therewith, and perished by receiving a reward other own chusing. However it was, the Sabins were possessed of the Castle. From whence the morrow after (when as the Romans army well appointed in battel ray, had taken up and overspread the whole plain that lieth from mount Palatine to the hil Capitol) they would not come down on even ground before that the Romans, partly nettled with anger, and partly pricked with an hot desire to recover the Castle again, began with their great disadvantage to climb against the hill. Whereupon the Captains on both sides joined battel. Metius Curtius for the Sabins, Hostius Hostilius for the Romans: who albeit he was on the lower ground, yet in the forefront most courageously and stoutly underwent the brunt of the conflict. But so soon as he was stricken down and slain, incontinently the Romans retired and gave ground: and thus discomfited fled backward to the old gate of Palatium. Romulus himself also, born back with the press and throng of those that fled, list up his weapons on high towards heaven, and cried out saying: "O Jupiter. I Romulus by thy direction guided and ruled, have here in this mount Palatine laid the foundation of this City; and now already have the Sabins by corruption and treachery got the Citadel and fortrels thereof: from whence they having passed the midst of the vale between, make higher in haste with force of arms. But thou O father of gods and men, vouchsafe O yet from hence at leastwise to repulse the enemies, deliver the Romans from this so great fear, and stay their shameful flight. And here to thee O Jupiter Sator I vow a Temple, for a memorial to all posterity, that by thy present help this City was laved and preserved. Thus having once prayed, as if he had known for certain that his prayers were heard. Even here (quoth he) O ye Romans doth Jupiter Opt. Max. the best and greatest of all the gods command you to stay and begin the battel afresh. Herewith the Romans, no less then if they had been commanded from heaven above, made

A cruel battel between Romans and Sabins. Metius Curtius. Hostius Hostilius.

The prayer of Romulus to Jupiter Sator.

A made a stand. And Romulus in person hyed him with all speed to the foremost in the vanguard. Now was Metius Curtius, principal leader of the Sabines, run down from the Castle, and had scattered and chased the Romans back as far as the Forum or common place of Rome at this day reacheth in length: and being come within a little of the gate of Palatium, he lift up his voice and cried aloud: "Vanquish't we have these faithless friends, and heartless foes: and now know they well, it is one thing to ravish maidens, and a far other thing to fight with men. In this sort, as he braved it out, Romulus with a troop of lusty young men, made head against him. Metius haply at that time fought on Horseback, whereby he was forced the sooner to recule, and the Romans made after and pursued him. The other battel of the Romans in like manner, being much encouraged with the valour of their King, discomfited the Sabines. Metius with his horse under him, affrighted at the noise of them that ran after, leapt into a marsh or bog thereby. Which accident, considering the danger of so great a person, made the Sabines to look back to him. And he verily taking heart again at the calling and encouragement of many of his favourites, escaped. But the Romans and Sabines both, in the middle valley between the two hills, renew the battel again: where the Romans got the better hand. Then the Sabine Dames, for whose wrongful usage all this war arose, with their hair hanging loose about their shoulders, and renting their garments, for very grief and sorrow past all fear, ventured to run amongst the javelins and darts as they flew: and thus having thrust themselves violently overthwart between them, began to part these bloody armies, and to end their deadly feud: Beech'ing their own fathers on the one side, and their husbands on the other, that they being fathers and sons in law, would not embrew themselves with so unkind and unnatural bloodshed, nor as parricides, murder the young ones newly born, some their grand children, and others their own heirs of their body begotten. If ye our fathers, think much (say they) of the affinity between our husbands and you, or if ye our husbands are displeased with our marriage, bend all your anger and malice against us: we are the cause of this war, we are the cause of wounding and killing both husband and father: yet will we rather die, then live either Orphans without the one, or Widows without the other. This thing moved as well the multitude of Souldiers, as also the Captains: and presently of a sudden all was hush, and the fight ceased. Whereupon, the Generals came forth to conclude a League. Neither made they peace only, but one City of two: united their Realms, and joined together in the Regiment: but the royal estate they setled in Rome.

D The City thus being made one of twain, the Romans for to gratifie the Sabines in some sort, were of Cures, a town of the Sabines, called Quirici. And for a memorial of that Battel, the very place where Curtius, after he was gotten out of the deed marsh, fast set his horse on firm ground, was named Curtius his lake. This joyous peace ensuing presently upon so cruel war, made these women better beloved of their husbands and parents: but especially of Romulus himself. And therefore when he divided the City into thirty Wards or Parishes, he called them by their names. But it is not left in any record (for out of all question the women were far more in number then so) whether those that should give names unto the Wards, were chosen by age, or by their own dignity and worthiness, or their husbands degree and calling, or by casting lots. At the same time were enrolled and ordained three Centuries of Gentlemen or Knights: The Ramenfes were so called of Romulus, the

E Turineses of Titus Tatius, but of the name and first beginning of the Lucerians, the occasion is not certain. So these two Kings not only reigned together, but also governed with great unity and concord. But after certain years the kindred of King Tatius chanced to bear and evil entreat the Embassadors of Laurentum. And when as the Laurentines pleaded the law of Nations, for satisfaction of this outrage: Tatius his kinsfolk what by favour, and what by intreaty, prevailed more with him then the just complaint of the others. Whereby he brought vengeance due to them upon his own head: for being come upon a time to Laavinum, unto a solemn sacrifice and feast, there in an uproar or hubbub the people ran upon him, and so was be slain. Which thing (they say) Romulus made less regard of then was meet: either for that fellowship in Lordship is never faithful, or because he esteemed him not worthy to be made away. Whereupon he forbore indeed to make war: yet to the end the wrong done unto the Embassadors, together with the murder of the King, might be expiate and purged clean away, the League between the Cities of Rome and Laavinum was renewed. But whilst peace verily was beyond mens expectation with them concluded: behold another fresh war arose, much nearer then the other, and had almost at their very gates. For the people of Fidene, supposing the Romans power and riches so to increase over much so near unto them: before they should grow to such greatness as they were like to do, began first to war upon them: and sending a power of lusty tall souldiers, invaded and wasted all the country between the City of Rome and Fidene. And taking their way on the left hand, for that the Tiber kept from the other, they foraged and spoiled as they went, to the great fear of the Peasants and country people. So as this sudden tumult and gaboul heard out of the fields into the City, brought the first news of the war, Romulus rallied therewith (for so nigh a war might bear no delay) led forth his army, and encamped within a

G mile of Fidene: and leaving there a competent guard, he departed thence with all his other forces, commanding part of his souldiers to lie close in certain covert places, among the thickets in ambushment. Himself with the greater number, and all his horse, advanced forward, and riding up and down before their gates, after a disordered and bragging manner, made semblant of a bravado, and all to train the enemy forth, which was the thing he only sought. This kind of horse service was a means that the Fideneans less suspected and marvelled at their flying, which they were to counterfeit.

feit. For whilst the Cavalry stood unresolved, as it were, in a hammering whether to fly or fight, G and the Infantry withal began to retire: all at once the enemies in thronging manner sallied forth of the gates, and chased the Romans so fiercely, that in their eager pursuit they were drawn to the very place of ambush. Thence the Romans suddenly arose, and charged the flank of the enemies: And to encrease their fright, they likewise that were left behind to guard the camp, shewed themselves with banners displayed. So the Fidenates terrified sundry ways, before well neer that Romulus and his men of arms could rein about their horse-heads, turned their backs, and rode full gallop towards the town again, and so much the faster, for that they fled now in good earnest themselves, that pursued them, who a little before made but semblance thereof. Yet for all this could they not escape the enemy: for the Romans hard at their heels, rushed together with them pel-mel into the town, H before the gates could be shut against them. At this Fidenatian war spreading so dangerously, the Veientians grew angry in their hearts, and began to chafe. Touched they were also in regard of kindred and alliance: for the Fidenates were likewise Tuscans. And fearing lest (if the Roman forces should thus distress and lie upon all the borderers) they being so neer should not go free, they were the rather pricked forward, and thereupon made rodes, and entred in arms the confines of Rome, spoiling and rifling, more like robbers then professed warriors. So without pitching any tents, or abiding the coming of their enemies, but only driving and carrying away great booties out of the fields, they return again to Vei. The Romans contrariwise, not finding the enemies in the field, but yet provided and resolved to give battel, and to hazard all, passed over the Tyber. Whom the Veientians understanding to be encamping themselves, fully minded to come against their City: issued forth and met them, intending to try the quarrel by dint of sword, and in open field, rather then to be mued up within the town, and to fight and defend themselves from off their houses and walls. There the Roman King with the strength only of his old beaten souldiers, without any other help and supply whatsoever, without policy or stratagem, had the better: and having thus discomfited the enemies, he chased them even to their very walls. And for that the City was exceeding strong, fortified as well by natural situation, as by walls, he forbore to assault it. But in his return homeward, he wasted the country, more upon a mind to revenge, than hope of spoil. With this defeature the Veientians no less subdued then if they had lost a field, sent Orators to Rome to sue for peace: unto whom Truce was granted for an hundred years, but they were amerced to lose part of their lands. These were in manner all the acts that were done both at home and abroad, during the reign of Romulus. Whereof none seemed to derogate any jot from the opinion, both of his divine birth K and beginning, and also of his immortality or deification after his death. Such was his courageous heart in recovering his Grandfathers Kingdom: his policy and wisdom in founding the City first, and after in establishing and governing the same, as well in war as in peace. By whose good proceedings it got such strength, and so sure footing, that for forty years space after, it enjoyed peace with safety. Nevertheless of his Commons he was better beloved then of his Nobles: but above all, his Souldiers most heartily affected him: of whom he had always about him, as Equires of the body, three hundred Pensioners armed, not only in time of war, but also of peace, whom he called Celeres. Thus having achieved these noble and immortal deeds, as he upon a time assembled all his people upon the plain, at the marish Capra, there to number or muster his army: behold upon a sudden there L arose a tempest with great cracks of thunder, which with so thick and cloudy a storm, covered the King, that the people lost the sight of him. And never after was Romulus seen on earth. The Roman youth, after their fear was at length past, and that upon so dark and troublesome weather, it proved a fair day again, and calm, withal, seeing the Kings Throne empty, albeit they credited the Senators that stood next about him, who gave out he was taken up aloft in the storm: yet stricken into sad dumps, as it were for the loss of their father, held their peace a good while. But afterwards, when some few of them had once begun, they all set on and cried aloud, All hail god Romulus the son of a god, King and Father of the City of Rome: With earnest prayer beseeching him of his grace, that he would vouchsafe to be propitious, and save their off-spring and posterity for ever. I am of this mind, that some there were even then, that suspected and secretly surmised that the King was M pulled in pieces by the hands of the Nobles. For this rumor also was bruited abroad, although in very dark and obscure terms. But by reason of the high admiration of the man, and the present fear withal, the former opinion took place, and was more currant. Over and besides, it grew the rather credible, through the politick practise of one person. For as the whole City was pensive and sorrowful for the miss of their King, and sore displeased with the Senators, one Proculus Julius, a substantial good author (as men say) and to be believed in a matter of great importance, stepped forth into the assembly. "Romulus (quoth he) O Quirites, the Founder and Patron of this City, even "this very morning at the day break, descended suddenly down from heaven and met me, and as "I stood all quaking for fear, ready to worship him, and humbly beseeching that I might behold "him face to face: Away (quoth he) and tell the Romans that the will of the gods in heaven is, that N "my City of Rome shall be the head and chief of the whole world: will them therefore to follow "and practise chivalry, and the knowledg thereof: and wot this well, and so let them teach their "posterity, to wit, That no power in the world shall be able to withstand the puissance of the Romans. Which (said he) was not so soon spoken, but he ascended on high, and departed. A wonder it was to see, how much they gave credit to this mans tale, and how greatly the miss of Romulus both among the Commons and the Army, was by this belief of his immortality, digested.

Romulus his end.

The speech of Proculus Julius.

A In this mean while the Senators fell to strive who should be King, and the desire of sovereignty troubled much and perplexed their minds. But as yet, there was no banding nor siding from any one person in particular: for that in a State so newly risen, and of so small continuance, there was not one that far excelled another in authority. All the contention was between the two feyerall factions in general. For they that were descended of the Sabins, fearing lest because after the death of Tatius there was none of their part, that had reigned with Romulus in equal jurisdiction, they should now lose their possession and title to the Crown, were desirous to have a King chosen out of their corporation. The old Romans again might not abide an alien or forraigner to be King. Howbeit, thus diversly affected as they were, a King they all will needs have, as who (God wor) had not yet tasted the sweetness of liberty and freedom. Besides, the Nobles began to fear, lest peradventure in case the hearts of many Cities thereabouts, should not be well disposed, but provoked against them, some forraign power would make invasion, finding the City without government, and the army without a Caprain. Therefore they all liked well to have one head, but none could find in his heart to give place unto another. Whereupon the hundred Senators associate and combine together in the rule of the Common-woole, by dividing themselves into ten Decuries, and for every Decury chusing one to bear the chiefe authority. So that ten governed at once, but one alone had the regal Ensigns and the Lictors before him. This sovereignty and preheminnce determined every five days: and thus went it through them all round in course. After which manner, they continued the space of one year. And the government upon this occasion was (as it is still at this day) called Interregnum. Then after a year began the Commons to grudge and mutter, that their servitude was greater then before, having now Lords over them, an hundred for one: and seemed they would no longer endure, but have a King again; yea, and one of their own chusing. The Senators seeing them thereabouts, and taking it to be good policy for to offer that of their own accord, which they were otherwise like to forgo, curried favour with them in this wise, to wit, by granting the chief prerogative unto the people (in chusing a King) yet so, as they gave them no greater priviledg, then they reserved to themselves. For thus it was decreed, that when the people had elected a King, it should stand firm and ratified, if the Senators liked thereof, and gave thereto their royal assent. And even at this day in making of Laws, and chusing of Magistrates or Rulers, the same right is in some sort observed, setting aside the violence of Tribunes. For that now before the people give their voices, the Senators passe by their authority, that which they would have done; fall it out in the assembly of people, by scrutiny, doubtful as it will. To proceed then, the Interregent having called a general Parliament: In the name of God (quoth he) O Quirites, and which may be to you good, lucky, and prosperous, elect, or nominate yea a new King: for so is the good pleasure of the Nobles and Senators: and in case ye shall elect a man of such quality, as may be deemed worthy to succeed Romulus, then will they by their assent pass the same, and allow thereof. This pleased and contented the Commons so highly, that because they would not seem behind in bounty and courtesie, they answered again, that this only they ordained and agreed upon, to wit, that the Senate should determine who should be King of Rome. There was in those days one Numa Pompilius, much renowned and esteemed for his just life and religious: he dwelt in Cures, a City of the Sabins, E a man right skilful and very well seen (as any one might be in that age) in all Laws both divine and humane: whose teacher and first master, for want of other Anchor of his Science and Knowledge (they say) but yet untruly, was Pythagoras of Samos. Concerning whom, this is well known, that he 100. years after and above, in the days of Servius Tullius King of Rome, held a School of young men Students, that were his Disciples, and followed his Sect, in the utmost and farthest coast of Italy, about Metapontum, Heraclea, and Croton. From which places (albeit he had lived in that time) whatfame of him could spread so far as to the Sabins? or by what entercourse and affinity of language might he possibly have trained any man unto him for desire of learning at his hands? or by what good means and help, could Numa travel alone unto him in safety, through so many countries, of divers tongues and sundry manners? I am of this opinion rather, that the man by nature F was framed and disposed to vertue, and that he was instructed, not so much in strange and forraign Sciences, as after that strict rule, that stern and severe discipline of the ancient Sabins; then whom, there was not a nation in times past, more precise, reformed, and void of corruption. The Roman Senators hearing the name of Numa, although they saw well enough, that the Sabins were like to prove of great reputation and power, by chusing their King from among them, yet was there none of them so audacious, as to prefer either themselves, or any one of their party and faction, nor any one, I say, Senator or Citizen, before that man: but all in general with one accord, agreed to confer the Kingdom upon Numa Pompilius. Who being sent for and come; like as Romulus at the founding of the City was inaugurate King, or attained to the Crown by means of Augury: so also he would needs, that the will and counsel of God should be sought for, touching his own election. Whereupon he was by the Augur (unto whom for ever after that publick Ministry or Priesthood, in regard G of honor and reverence by patent belonged) brought unto the Castle hill, and there he set him down upon a stone, with his face toward the South. Then the Augur on his left side, with head covered, took his place: holding in his right hand a smooth staff without knor or knob, and hooked towards the top, which they called lituus. From whence after that he had with good advise, taken a prospect and view towards the City and Country, and made his prayers unto the gods, he limited the quarters of the Heaven, from East to West: and the parts Southward he appointed for the

the right hand, and those Northward for the left. And so far as ever he could cast his eye and see forward, he imagined to himself a mark: then shifting his staff into his left hand, and laying the right hand upon Numa his head, he prayed in this form: O Father Jupiter, if it may be right and lawful, that this Numa Pompilius, whose head I lay my hand upon, shall be King of Rome, shew I beseech thee some certain and manifest signs within that compass and those precincts, that I conceived and set out. Then pronounced he in plain words what tokens by sight or flight of fowls he would have to appear. Which being once seen, Numa was declared King, and so came down from the Temple or place of prospect abovesaid.

In this manner, being inaugurate and invested in the Kingdom, he provideth by good Orders, Laws, and Customs, to re-edifie, as it were, that City, which beforetime had been new built by force and arms. Whereunto, he seeing that they might not be brought and framed in time of war, whose hearts were already by continual warfare grown wild and savage: and supposing that this fierce people might be made more gentle and tractable, through disuse of arms, he therefore built the Temple of Janus in the nether end of the street Argiletum, in token both of war and peace: with this invention, that being open it should signifie, that the City was in arms; and standing shut, that all the neighbor countries were in peace and quiet. Twice only after the reign of Numa was this Temple shut: once, when T. Manlius was Consul, after the first Carthaginian war was done and ended: and a second time (as God would) in our age for us to see, when as the Emperor Cesar Augustus, after the battel of Actium (with Antonius and Cleopatra) had obtained peace both by Land and Sea. Numa then having knit the hearts of the borderers about him in firm league and amity, and thereupon closed up the doors of Janus, secured now from all fear and care of dangers abroad, yet doubting lest through ease and idleness their minds might fall to looseness and riot, whom the dread of enemies and martial discipline had held in awe and good order: devised above all things to strike some fear of God into them, and to plant religion in their hearts: a policy no doubt, with the simple multitude (rude in those days and ignorant) most effectual. Which reverence of God, for that it could not sink nor enter well into their heads, and take a deep impression, without some device of a fained miracle, he made semblance, and gave out, that he conversed in the night season, and had, I wot not what, secret conference with the goddess Egeria. By whose counsel and direction forsooth, he ordained such divine service and sacrifices to the gods, as to them was most acceptable: and to every god appointed several Priests for the ministry thereof accordingly. But first above all other things he divided the year, according to the course of the Moon, into twelve months: and for as much as the Moon hath not full thirty days to every month, whereby some days are wanting to make up the just year, after the revolution and circle of the Sun: he, by putting the odd days between every month, so disposed and ordered the year, that in every three and twenty years space the days agreed just to the same point of the Sun from whence they began, and so made up the void spaces, and accomplished fully the term of every year. He appointed likewise law days and days of vacation, called Festi and Nefasti, thinking it good, that otherwhiles there should be rest from attendance on the Courts, and no dealing with the people. After this, he set his mind about the creation of Priests, albeit in his own person he performed very many sacrifices, especially those which at this day pertain to the Priest of Jupiter, called Flamen Dialis. And supposing that in a City so martial, there should succeed more Kings like to Romulus than Numa, who in proper person would go forth to war: lest haply the divine ministry that belonged to the King, might be neglected, he created a Flamine to Jupiter, for to be a sacrificer continually resident: endued and adorned him with a rich cope or vestment, and with an ivory chair of state upon wheels, called Sella curulis. Unto him he adjoined two Flamines more: one for Mars, another for Quirinus. He instituted also a Nunnery, as it were, of religious Vestal Virgins. A Priesthood that had the beginning from Alba, and sired well with the house, from whom the first founder of the City was descended. And to the end they should attend continually about the Church, as resiant Chaplains, he allowed them an ordinary fee or pension, at the publick charges of the City: and made them by perpetual vowed virginity, and other ceremonies to be revered and accounted holy. Likewise unto Mars Gradivus he elected twelve Priests called Salii, and gave unto them a rich purple coat, embroidered for an ornament, and to wear upon that coat a brazen breast-plate, and to bear certain scutcheions or bucklers that fell from heaven, called Ancilia: commanding them to run about the City, chanting hymns and songs, with dancing and leaping full solemnly. Moreover, he chose for a Superintendent or high Priest, Numa Martius, the son of Marcus, one of the Senators: and to him he gave in writing set down under his hand and seal, a rule, whereby he might know what beasts should be killed for sacrifice, upon what days, and at which Temples, and how the money should be levied and disbursed for the defraying of all charges. All other sacred rites as well publick as private, he submitted and referred to the discretion and ordering of that high Priest: to this end, that the common people might know unto whom they were to resort for counsel and instruction, and that no part of Gods worship and service should by neglect of the ancient rites and traditions of their own country, be confounded and corrupted by bringing in any strange and forraign superstitions. He ordained besides, that the same Arch-Prelate should teach, not only these heavenly ceremonies, but also funeral obsequies, and how the spirits beneath, and ghosts of bodies departed, should be quieted and pacified: and what strange and prodigious tokens, that came by way of lightning, thunder, or any other fearful sight whatsoever, should be expiate and purged by sacrifice accordingly. And

A for to know the truth, portended by these tokens even from the minds of heavenly spirits above, he consecrated unto Jupiter Elicius an altar upon the mount Aventina. And by the means of Augury, he consulted with that god, what things he was to enterprize and go about. Whilst the whole multitude was thus drawn away, and clean turned from thinking of force and arms, and busied about devising and ordering of these matters, not only their minds were occupied in doing somewhat, but also the continual fear of God now settled in them, (as being perswaded that the heavenly power was present in the managing of mens affairs) had possessed now all their hearts with such piety and religious holiness, that faithful promise once made, and the reverence of an oath taken, abandoning all fear of law and punishment, was able to rule and govern the City. And as the people framed and reformed themselves to the fashions and manners of their King, as the only and special pattern to follow: so the nations likewise bordering upon them, who beforetime verily thought that City to be built, and as it were encamped in the midst of them to the disturbance and disquieting of all their peace, were now become so respective of them, that they thought it an impious and sinful deed, once to offend or offer abuse to that City, so well given, and devoted to the worship and service of God. Furthermore, there was a grove, the midst whereof was watered continually by a spring that issued out of a dark and shadowed cave: into which, because Numa used very oft to retire himself alone, without any other, as it were, to have familiar company with Egeria, he dedicated that grove unto the Muses, for that, their assistance also in counsel and advice he desired together with his wife Egeria. And so Faith alone he instituted a solemn yearly festival day, and erected a chappel: Unto which he commanded the Flamines to ride in an arched or embowed close Chariot, drawn with two horses, and to sacrifice and execute their function, with their hands covered and wrapped close to their fingers ends: signifying thereby, that faith is to be kept and preserved: and that her seat was sacred and consecrated even upon the right hands. Many other sacrifices, and places for sacrifice, which the Priests call Argeos, did he appoint and dedicate. But of all his acts this was most worthy and memorable, that during the time of his reign he had no lesse regard to preserve peace, then to maintain royal estate and dominion. Thus two Kings one after another, taking either of them a several course by himself, that one by war, this other by peace, mightily promoted the welfare of the City. Romulus reigned 37 years, Numa 43. So that now the City became very puissant, as being well and equally tempered both with fears of arms, as also with discipline of peace.

Upon the death of Numa the regiment returned again to an inter-raign. Then the people nominated and elected for their King, with the royal assent of the Senators Tullus Hostilius, the Nephew or Grandson of that Hostilius, who had in times past fought valiantly against the Sabins, at the foot of the Castle hill. This man was not only unlike the former King, but also more fierce and hardy then Romulus himself. For besides the heat of youth, and strength of body withal, the glorious remembrance of his Grandfather set him on, and pricked him forward. Supposing therefore that the City through rest and ease began to age, as it were, and to decay, he sought every way to pick quarrels, and to give occasion to make war. It fortuned, that the Peasants about Rome, and those of Alba likewise, preyed upon and spoiled one anothers land. At that time C. Clauilius was Lord and King of Alba. From both parts well neer at one time, were Embassadors addrested to demand restitution of goods, and satisfaction for their harms. Tullus Hostilius he had straitly charged his messengers to have no dealing with the Alban Prince, before they had delivered unto him their message. For well he wist, that he would make denial, and yeeld no amends: and then might he with safe conscience justly proclame war against him. On the contrary side the Alban Embassadors followed their business but slackly, for being courteously invited, and friendly entertained by Tullus, and lodged within his palace, they were well content to be feasted by the King, and were his daily guests so long, that the Romans had by this time both challenged their own first, and upon denial made by the Alban King, given defiance and proclaimed open war within thirty days next ensuing. Upon which tidings by them related to Tullus, he gave the Alban Embassadors audience, per-suading them to declare what their errand was, that they came about. They (simple men) ignorant of all that was done, first spent time in excusing themselves, saying they were very loth & unwilling to speak ought that might displease Tullus, but being commanded by authority, they might not but will nor chuse, and thereupon were come to make claim of goods & amends for wrongs, and if they should not be restored and recompence made, they had commission to denounce war against him. Whereunto Tullus made answer in this wise: "Tell your King and Master (quoth he) that the Roman King calleth the gods to witness, whether of the two Nations sent the Embassadors away first; and rejected them when they demanded restitution, that upon his head they might bring the misery, loss, and calamity of the present war. With this dispatch the Albans returned home. So they made preparation of forces on both sides all that they could, most like in all the world to a civil war, between fathers and sons, proceeding both from the Trojan race: considering that by Trojans Lavinium was founded; from Lavinium came the people of Alba: and from the Alban Kings were the Romans in right line descended. But the final issue and end of this war, made the war it self less woful and lamentable, both because they came not to a set field, and also for that by raising the houses only of the one City, two nations were intermingled & united in one. The Albans first with a mighty power, entered the Territory of Rome, and encamped themselves not past five miles from the City, where they strongly entrenched themselves: which place of the Captains name was called Falsa Chulius, many years after until both it and the name withal in process of time, decayed clean and came to nothing. In this camp the Alban King, Chulius, ended his days, in whose stead the Alban army created Marcus Sufferius their Dictator. Tullus in the mean time became haughty and proud, especially upon the death of the King, oftentimes giving out and saying, that the mighty power of the gods, having thus begun at the very head, would likewise take vengeance on the whole body of the Alban Nation, for this their unjust and godless war: and one night above the rest passed secretly by the camp of his enemies, and in warlike manner invaded the Alban land. This news raised Marius out of his standing camp. Who led forth his army and marched on as near to his enemies as he could, dispatching aforehand an Herald unto Tullus, to notify unto him thus much from him, that it was needful and expedient before they joined battel to parle and commune together. If he would vouchsafe to confer, he knew very well, that he should alledge and lay forth such matters, as might concern the Weale of the Romans, as well as of the Albans. Tullus refused not the offer, albeit they were but vain toies that were pretended, and therefore set his men in battel aray. The Albans in like manner came forth against him.

After they were thus ranged and embattelled ready to fight, the Generals on both sides, accompanied with a few of their principal Nobles, advance between both armies. Then began the Alban Dictator in this wise: "Me thinks (quoth he) I hear already of injury and wrongs done, and how such goods as were demanded are not restored again according to the form of the league, as also that Chulius our King was cause of this war: neither doubt I, O Tullus, but even you pretend, and are about to alledge as much. But if we would as we ought to do, stand upon the truth of things, rather then upon I wot not what glosses, and goodly shews of words: it is ambition and desire of rule only and nothing else, that spureth on two nations of one blood and near neighbors to take arms and war one with another: justly or unjustly, I am not able to say. Let him on Gods name that first began the quarrel, in conscience see to that. As for me, the Albans indeed have made me their General. But this one point Tullus, I would have you to remember and consider: How strong about us and you especially the Tuscans are, you know better, the nearer ye are unto them: mighty they are by land, much more by sea. Then wot well this, that when you shall cause the Trumpet to sound unto battel, these two armies will be to them a fair mark and spectacle to behold: that they may give in assault to both at once, as well the victors, as them that are vanquished, whilst they are wearied and toiled out of heart. For the love of God, if there be any spark of grace in us, hede we not contented with that liberty which we surely enjoy, will needs venture and put in doubtful hazzard, which of us shall rule and command, and who shall serve and obey the other, let us take some good course whereby it may be decided without great loss of bloodshed on both sides, whether shall be Lord and Sovereign. The motion Tullus misliked not, albeit both for disposition of nature, and hope of victory, he were the haughtier of the twain. And as they fought on both parts what way to take, this means at length they found, wherunto fortune it self presented fit matter and occasion. For by good hap even then, in either of those three brethren twins there were born at one birth, and those neither in age nor strength unlike. Their names were Curius and Horatius, that is very certain, neither is there any thing of ancient record more famous and notable. Yet as clear in instance as it is, there remaineth still some doubt and error in their names: of whether people the Curius and the Horatius were. Writers there be on both sides, but the greater number say, as I find, that Horatius were the Romans, to whom I rather incline, and my mind giveth me to follow them. With these three brethren the Kings went in hand, perswading them to fight for the honor of their country, and try the quarrel by dint of sword: shewing them, first on whether side the victory fell, there should remain the sovereign dominion. Nothing refused they to do, the time and place both were agreed upon and appointed. But before the combat, it was covenanted between the Romans and Albans, and these conditions drawn: That whose champions in fight should have the better, that nation should peaceably command the other. There are of covenants many and sundry. Capitulations far different in matter: but they run all after one manner and form. As for this, it was made, as we have heard in this wise, neither is there extant a more ancient record of any competition whatsoever. The Herald (called Fecialis) demandeth of King Tullus in this wise: Is it your will and commandment my Lord, That I make a covenant and accord with the Paterpatra of the Alban people? It is (quoth the King.) Then (quoth he) I demand of you sacred herbs. The King answered again, Take them pure and clean. The Fecialis then reached from the Castle hill pure herbs from among the grails: which done, he thus asked the King: Do you (my Lord) ordaine me the Messenger Royal of the Commons of the people of Rome? and allow necessary implemets, all furniture for my self, and my retinue and train? The King answered: I do, so far forth as may be, without the harm or detriment of my self, and of the Citizens of the people of Rome. The Fecialis or Herald for that time, was Marcus Valerius, who created Paterpatra a King at Arms. So Falsus, by touching his head and hair with Vervain. Now the Paterpatra is for to confirm the agreement with an oath, and so he read out the covenant and oath, and that with many words: Which to rehearse, as they were in a long prescript form pronounced, were very needless. After this having recited all the Articles and conditions thereof. Hearken (quoth he) O Jupiter, listen thou Herald for the Albans, attend also and give ear ye the Alban people, how these conditions from the first to the last, have been read aloud out of those Books or Tables of wax, without

- A "coven, or fraud, and how at this day they are most rightly meant and understood, according to the tenure of the words: from these articles I say, shall not the people of Rome start back first, nor make default: If they shall first go back and fall therein by publick consent, and fraudulent-ly; that day, O Jupiter, imite thou the City of Rome, as I to day will strike this Swine: yea, and imite thou home so much more, as thou art more able and powerful then my self. And after he had thus said, he smote the swine with a flint stone. The Albans likewise repeated their prescript form of words, and the oath, by their Dictator and Priests for the purpose. The complements of the covenant and composition thus performed, and all concluded, then those three brethren of both sides, as it was before agreed, buckle to arm themselves. And being encouraged on both hands,
- B by their well-willers and friends, that put them in mind of their country gods, their native soile and parents, saying, that all their fellow Citizens and country men whatsoever, both at home in the City, and abroad in the camp, every one had their eye only upon them, their weapons and their hands: the young men being both of themselves by nature forward and lusty, and also emboldened with the comfortable words of their friends, advanced forth between both armies. Now were the two hosts set on both sides before their camps, rid of present danger, rather then void of care and peniveness. For why? the whole trial of sovereignty and rule, rested in the valour and good speed of a few. Whereupon they longing to see the sequel and issue, were wholly bent to behold, and only minded this unpleasant sight and spectacle. At sound of Trumpet these brave brethren, three to three, like as they had been two set battels, and carrying the stomachs verily of two great armies, affronted one another, and with cruel and mortal weapons gave the charge. Neither regarded they their own proper peril, but set before their eyes, only the rule or servitude of the Common-wealth, as if the state of their country from thenceforth lay wholly upon their good or bad success in this action. So soon as they began to cope together and make assault, that their harness and weapons once clattered, and their drawn swords shone and glittered again; behoid such an exceeding fear came upon the beholders, that they trembled and quaked withal: and during the time of equal combat, seeing no inclination of victory to the one side or the other, they were so astonied, that hardly they could well speak or freely take their wind. Afterwards, when as they were come to hand-strokes, and that now not only the stirring of their bodies, and the doubtful handling of their weapons and armor, but bloody wounds also were seen, two of the Romans
- C (having fore wounded all the three Albans) fell down one upon the other, and yeilded up the ghost. At whose fall, the Alban host shouted again for joy: but the Roman legions, albeit they were now past hope of victory, yet they were not void of care being amazed, and in extasie as it were, with very fear what should become of him, who being but one, had three Curatius upon him at once. But as good hap was, he as yet was fresh and unwounded. And as he was not able alone to make his part good with them altogether, so in single fight, man to man, he thought himselfe good enough for them all, one after another. To single therefore, and to part them in fight, he begins to flie, thinking thereby they would follow after him, each one as his hurt body would give him leave. Now when he was retired a pretty good way from the place where they fought, and looking behind him, espied them following far asunder, and one of them not much behind himself, he turned again upon him with great violence. And whilst the host of the Albans cried out to the Curatius to rescue and succour their brother, Horatius by that time had slain his foremost enemy, and was in hand with the second. Then the Romans with such a shout, as they are wont to make, who after a great fright recover themselves and take heart again, encourage their champions: and he himself haltereth to finish the combat. And before that the third, who was not far off, could get to the other, he had slain the second Curatius. So that now there was but one to one, left to fight on even hand: and they, neither in hope nor strength equally matched. As for the one of them, his body as yet not wounded; and his double victory withal, caused him to attempt the third conflict stoutly and courageously. The other faint and feeble of his hurt, tired with running, had much ado to come forward, and quite out of heart, seeing his two brethren lie slain at his feet, offered himself as a prey to his victorious enemy: for surely between them was no fight at all to speak of. The Roman he triumphing and crying out for joy, Two brethren already (quoth he) are I sent to the Diuel, the third likewise shall I send after them, that a Roman may command an Alban, which is the cause of all this war. And therewith he thrust his sword aloft into his throat, who had fatch ado to hold his weapons: and so soon as he was down, stript and rifled him. The Romans with great triumph and gratulation, receive Horatius rejoicing so much the more, as his case was more dangerous and well need desperate. Then of both sides address they themselves to bury their champions, but not with like cheer and alacrity of heart. For why? they of the one part were become Lords, and they of the other, Subjects. Their tombs remain yet to be seen in the very places where they were each of them slain, two of the Romans entombed together in one place neerer unto Alba: the three Albans towards Rome; but distant asunder, like as they fought and left their lives. Before they dislodged and departed thence the one from another, Albius, according as it was capitulated in the composition, asked and demanded what Tullus would command him to do, who enjoined him to keep his youth ready in arms at an hours warning, for what he would employ them in service, in case he should war with the Veientians; So were the armies dismissed home. And Horatius he went foremost, baring afore him the threefold spoile of three brethren. Whom his Sister a maid affianced before to one of the Curatius, met before Capena gate: &

espying upon her brothers shoulders, the coat of arms of her espoused husband, which she her self had wrought with her own hands: she unbound her head, let her hair loose, and pitiously called upon her dead spouse by name. This lamentable wailing of the sister presently upon victory, and amidst so great and publick joy, moved the proud and haughty young man to wrath, and drawing out his sword therewith, ran the silly damsel through: and with these bitter words rebuketh her also, Get thee hence (quoth he) to thy spouse with thy unreasonablenesse and foolhardy love, forgetful as thou art, of thy two brethren dead, and him that is alive: forgetful of thy native country, and the honor thereof: and so with a mischief go she, whatever she be, that shall bewail an enemy of Rome. A cruel and horrible fact this seemed, as well to the Senators, as to the Commons: but his late and fresh desert made it the less unpardonable: yet for all that was he apprehended, and brought before the King. The King, that he might not seem the author of a judgment so unpleasant and odious unto the people, and consequently of punishment according to the doom, assembled the people together and said: I ordain Duumvirs to sit upon Horatius, in trial of a criminal cause of felony, and to judge him according to the law, in that case provided. The tenor of the law runneth thus, in dreadful kind of form. [The Magistrates called Duumvirs shall judge the party accused in a capital action of felony, if he shall appeal from the Duumvirs, let him traverse his appeal, if they overthrow him, then hoodwink him, or cover his head, hang him upon a cursed Gallows tree by a rope, and strangle him, having whipped and scourged him before, either within the Pomary or without.] By virtue of this law were the Duumvirs created, who by the rigour of that law thought they might not quit so much as a guiltless person: and having once condemned him, then one of them gave sentence and said: I judge thee O Publius Horatius a murderer and an enemy to the state of Rome. Go Liſtor therefore, and bind his hands together. Then came the Liſtor and cast a cord about them. But Horatius, by the advice of Tullus, a gentle and mild interpreter of the Law, I appeal (quoth he.) So upon his appeal was the matter debated, and to be tried before the people: who were not a little troubled in deciding or judging this cause, and most of all in regard of Publius Horatius the Father, crying out and saying, "That he deemed his daughter was justly and worthily killed: otherwise he would himself have punished his son by his fatherly authority. Beseeching moreover, that they would not now make him childlike, whom erewhile they saw with a goodly company of children about him. And therewithal the old father embracing the young man, and shewing the spoils of the Curia, set up and hanging in that very place which now is called Pila Horatia, i. e. Horatius his Pillar. "And can ye indeed (O ye Romans, quoth he) abide to see him bound under a Gallows, yea, and whipped and tormented, whom a while afore ye beheld to march in great glory and jollity for his achieved victory? So unseemly and foul a sight as which, the Albans themselves can hardly suffer. Go Liſtor, go bind those hands fast, which armed a little before, won the people of Rome their dominion: Go I say, and hoodwink his head who saved and delivered this City from bondage, hang him by the neck, and strangle him upon a cursed tree: scourge him and spare not, either within the circuit of the walls, so it be among those javelins and spoils of the enemies: or without the walls, so it be within the compass of the Curian Sepulchres. For to what place can you lead this young gentleman, where his honorable acts may not save him from so unworthy and shameful punishment? The people could no longer endure, either the tears of the old father, or the constant resolution of the youth his son, who shewed himselfe still the same, and not to change for any danger. So they quit him, in the honorable regard rather of his prowess and valor, then in the right and equity of his cause. Yet to the end that the murder so manifest and openly known, should be in some sort expiate, and satisfaction made therefore, his father was charged to purge his sons sin, and make amends, at the expences of the City. Who having performed certain purgatory sacrifices, which afterward belonged to the house and family of the Horatii, put a rafter or beam cross overthwart the street, and caused the young man with his head covered to go under, as under a yoke or gallows: which remaineth yet unto this day, from time to time as the City charges repaired, and they call it Sororium Tigillum, i. e. The Sisters beam. And in that very place where Horatia was wounded and fell down, her tomb was erected of four square stone.

But not long continued the Albans in quiet and peace. For the common people finding fault and greatly discontented, that the whole state of the Weale-publick was put into the hands of three souldiers, infected so, and poisoned the vain and shittie head of the Dictator: that for as much as plain and upright dealing sped no better, he began to win again the hearts of his Commons by crooked means, and indirect courses. Seeking therefore war in time of peace, as before in time of war he sought peace: and seeing his people had more heart then hand, and their strength not answerable to their stomacks: he stirred up other nations, openly by way of proclamation and defiance to make war, and reserved his own men under a colour of league and confederacy, for to practise treason and falshood. The Fidenates, a Colony of the Romans, having made the Veintians partakers of their counsel, and combined with the Albans to forsake the Romans, when time came, and turn unto them, brake out and took arms. When Fidene had thus openly revolted, Tullus sent for Metius and his power from Alba, and set forth against his enemies: and passing over the river Anio, encamped near the confluent, where both streams meet together. Between which place and Fidene, the army of the Veintians had crossed the Tiber, who put themselves in the right wing of the battel fast by the river, and the Fidenates in the left,

A left nearer to the mountains. Tullus directly opposeth his own forces against the Veientians, and placeth the Albans to affront the Fidenates. The Alban Captain having as little heart as honesty and truth, neither durst keep his standing, nor openly turn unto the enemy, but by little and little withdraweth himself toward the mountains: and when he thought he had gained vantage enough, he mounted up the hill with all his companies, and with a wavering mind to spend the time, displayeth his ranks. His intent and purpose was, on what side fortune seemed to give the better, with them to join and take their part. The Romans that stood next, perceiving their flanks naked by reason of the departure of their friends and allies, at first marvelled much at the matter: but afterwards there galloped in horsemen, and advertised the King that the Albans were gone away. Tullus in this so fearful and dangerous case, vowed twelve Priests Salii, and two Temples to Pallor and Pavor, i. e. to Palenes and Fears and with a loud voice cried out in the hearing of his enemies, commanding the said horseman to return to the battle, saying, There was no cause at all to fear, for that himself had commanded the Alban host to wheel and tetch about, and so to charge the Fidenates on their backs where they lay open. Willing him expressly moreover, to cause the men of arms to hold up their lances on end. By which means, a great part of the footmen could not see the Albans as they departed and went their ways. And those that had seen them, thinking it was a truth which they heard the King to speak, fought so much the more boldly. So the fear turned now from them, and fell upon the enemies: for they heard the King which he spake so loud, and also a great many of the Fidenatians being co-habitants with the Romans, understood Latine. For fear therefore, that the Albans should all on a sudden run down from the hills, and stop their passage to the town, they turned their backs and fled. Then Tullus pressed hard upon them, and having discomfited the Fidenatians wing, cometh back more fiercely upon the Veientians, being already amazed at the sight of the other. Neither were they able to withstand the brunt. Howbeit the river behind at their backs kept them at first from flying away, but afterwards when their flight bended thitherward: some flinging their weapons shamefully away, like blind men, ran headlong into the water: other lingering still, and staying on the bank side, doubtful whether to flee, or to stick to it and fight, were trod under foot, and hewne in pieces. Never had the Romans before that day a more cruel battle. Then the Alban army, which beheld and saw all this conflict, descended down into the plain. And Metius, forsooth, rejoiceth much on Tullus behalf for his victory. Tullus again speaketh Metius fair, and gave order, that the Albans in a good hour should join their camp to the Romans: and against the next day, prepared a purging or Lustral sacrifice. The morrow when it was day, and that all things were in a readiness, according to the manner, he commandeth both armies to assemble together to an audience. The Criers, beginning at the farthest part of the camp, summoned the Albans first. Who also for the strangeness of the matter, and desirous to hear the Roman King to make his Oration, pressed forward to stand next. The Roman legion on set purpose, as it was before decreed, stood armed round about, and hemmed them in: and the Centurions had in charge without delay to execute whatsoever they were commanded.

E Then began Tullus to speak in this wise, "If ever in any war heretofore had cause, O Romans, to render thanks, first to the immortal gods, and then to your own manhood and valor, certainly it was in yesterdays battle. For ye fought not then with the force of your enemies more than with the treachery and falshood of your friends and confederates, which is the greater conflict and far more dangerous. For to put you clean out of doubt, and to bear you no longer in hand with a wrong perswasion: The Albans went up toward the hills without my commission, neither was that my commandment, but a policy and countenance only of command: to this end, that ye not knowing how ye were forsaken, might not withdraw your hearts from fight, and also that your enemies weening they were environed behind, should be afraid and so enforced to flee. Yet are not the Albans all in general to be charged with this fault which I reprove. They did but follow their leader, as ye likewise would have done, if I had willed the march to have turned any whither from thence. It is Metius that was the guide and leader of this journey, Metius is he that is the worker and deviser of this war, Metius I say it is, and none but Metius, the breaker of the Roman and Alban league. But let who that will from henceforth presume hardly to do the like, if I make not him a notable example to all the world. The Centurions stood armed round about Metius, and the King goeth on with the rest of his speech as he began, and said: "That which I pray God may turn to the good prosperity and happiness of the people of Rome, of myself, and you the Albans, I am minded to reduce all the Alban nation to Rome: to endue the Commons with the freedom of the City: to advance their chief Gentlemen to the order of Senators, and to make one uniform City and Common wealth: that as in times past the Albans stare, out of one body was divided into twain, so now it may be united and become one again. At these words the Alban youth unarmed, and beset on every side with armed men, albeit they were distracted in mind, yet were they forced with a general fear to keep silence, and hold their peace. Metius Suffetius (quoth Tullus then) If thou couldst have learned to keep allegiance, promise, and covenants, thou mightest have been taught it at my hands with life. But now since thy froward nature is incurable, teach thou by thy fearful example and death all mankind, to hold and repute those things for sacred and holy, which have by thee been broken and violate. Like as therefore atewhiles thou barest a double heart in doubtful ballance, between the the Fidenates and the Romans state: even so streightways shalt thou H

 "yeeld thy body to be drawn asunder, and plucked in two peeces accordingly. Then forthwith he cauled two teames of four houses to be set to, and Metius to be stretched out and tied unto the chariots to them belonging. Afterwards were the horses driven a contrary way, and carried with them in both chariots the body torn in pieces, as far forth as the limbs hung fast together by their cords and ligaments: which made all men avert their eyes from beholding so cruel and horrible a spectacle. This was the first and last punishment that ever the Romans executed with so little respect or none at all (to say a truth) of the laws of humanity. In all other they may safely make their boast, that no nation in the world hath been lesse delighted and pleased with extremity of torment.

Whilst these things were in doing, there had been certain horsemen sent afore to Alba, for to translate the multitude to Rome. After whom were the legions also of the footmen thither led, to rase and destroy the city. At whose entrance within the gates, there was nor that stir nor fearful hurry, as usually is seen when cities are lost: and when with breaking down the gates, beating and battering the wals with rams and other engines, for ing the citadel, the enemies shout, and the armed souldiers run to and fro in the city, killing and slaying, firing and burning all afore them as they go: but a sad silence, and a still kind of sorrow and pensiveness so possessed and astonied all their minds, that for fear forgetting what to leave behind them, or what to take with them, without advice and counsell, one asking another what to do, they one while stood in their house entries, another while ran up and down: wandering in their houses, as if their last day had been come. But so soon as they heard the horsemen cry aloud, and command them with menacing to void and depart, and that now the ratling of the tiles and slates from off the houses, as they were a pulling down, was from the furthest part of the town heard: and that the dust raised from places far off, had as it were with a cloud overcast and filled all: then every man catching up hastily, and carrying forth what he could, leaving their domestical gods, leaving their houses wherein they had been born, bred, and brought up, departed forth: so that now they filled the streets as they went close on a row together, and the sight one of another with mutual commiseration, redoubled their tears and wooll complaints. Yea, and pitious mone and lamentations were heard of women especially, as they passed by their fair and stately churches, beset with souldiers, and abandoned their gods as it were captives and prisoners. After the Albans had thus quit the city down went the Romans every where with the buildings, as well publick as private, and laid them even with the ground, and so in one hour destroyed and rased four hundred yeers work: for so long had Alba stood and flourished. Howbeit the temples of the gods they spared, for so the king had given commandment. Rome all this while riseth by the fall of Alba. The number of Citizens increased double: to enlarge the city the mount Velius was annexed to it: and that it should be better peopled and more inhabited, Tullus had his royal seat and palace there, and therein from that time forth he kept his court. The chief Citizens of the Albans he advanced to the order of Senators, that he might augment that state also of the Commonwealth: namely, the houses of the Tullij, Servilij, Quintij, Geganij, Curij, Julij: and for that degree and order of Senators by him encreased, he built an hall or new court, called until our fathers dayes Hofilia curia.
Hofilia court. And that all estates and degrees might out of this new people be somewhat strengthened, he chose from out of the Albans ten troops or cornets of horsemen, and with the same supply he both fulfilled the number of the old legions, and also made and enrolled new.

Curia Hofilia.

War with the Sabins.

Tullus upon this affiance he had in his strength and power, denounceth war against the Sabins, a people in those dayes of all other most puissant and mighty, both in men and munition, next the Tuscans. Wrongs had been done, and outrages committed on both parts, and restitution or amends demanded, but to no effect. Tullus found himself grieved, that divers occupiers or merchants of Rome, at an open mart or fair of great resort before the temple of Feronia, were laid hold upon and apprehended. The Sabins on the other side complained, that their men notwithstanding they took sanctuary in a certain sacred and privileged grove, were arrested and in hold at Rome.
 These were the quarrels and occasions pretended of the war. The Sabins well remembering, that not onely part of their own forces was by Tatius translated to Rome, and there planted, but also that now of late the puissance of the Romans was well amended by the supplement of the Albans, began likewise for their part to cast about, and seek for help abroad, and forraign aids. Now was Tuscan their neighbour nation, and of the Tuscans the neereft unto them were the Veientians.
 From thence they gat certain voluntaries to take their part, by reason that their minds already were well disposed to revolt upon old grudges and rancour remaining still of the former war past: other some also vagarants and idle persons of the rascal sort, and needy commons, were soon hired for money. But as for any succour from thence by publick consent of the state they had none at all.
 So much prevailed even with the Veientians (for in the rest it was lets marvel) the faithful covenant of truce concluded with Romulus. Now when these preparations of war were made on both sides to the uttermost of their power, and that it stood upon this point, That they were like to have the ods and vantage, who should begin first and enter the field: Tullus prevented the enemies and invaded the Sabine land. A sharp and bloody batrel was there fought under the wood Malicusa.
 Where the Romans bare themselves bravely that day, much upon the valour of the Legionary foot.

The Sabines
defeated by the Romans

A footmen, but more upon the strength of their men of arms, whose number lately was increased for by the suddain and forcible charge of the horsemen; the ranks of the Sabines were so disordered, that they could neither stand close together to fight it out, nor spread themselves to flie, without great slaughter and bloodshed.

The Sabines thus vanquished, and the kingdom of Tullus and the whole of Rome, being very glorious and wealthy: behold, news came to the King and Senators, that in the Alps mount it rained stones: which hardly was believed, and therefore certain men went out of purpose to see this strange and prodigious sight: who might plainly behold stones to fall thick out of the sky like as when some forcible winds drive hail in big round balls upon the earth. They imagined moreover, that they heard a great and mighty voice out of the grove from the very top of the hill crying unto them, and warning the Albans to do sacrifice and divine service according to the rites and ancient manner of their forefathers, which they had discontinued and forgotten as together with their country they had abandoned their gods, and either taken to the Roman religion, or else being angry with fortune (as it is commonly seen) forgot and neglected the worship of the gods altogether. The Romans likewise upon that miraculous sign, for the purging and expiation thereof, celebrated solemn publick sacrifices for the space of nine dayes, called a Novendial: either because they were moved thereto by that voice from heaven (for that also is reported) or took direction from the Soothsayers that pry into the inwards of beasts. Certain it is, that a solemn custome remaineth still unto this day, that whensoever word cometh of the like wonder, they keep holyday nine dayes together. Nor long after this, the pestilence rained in the city. And albeit the people began thereby to slack souldery and military service: yet would not this martial prince give them rest and respite from war: being of this mind, that the bodies of young men were more healthy in armour, abroad in the open field, than at home in the city under covert: until himself at length fell sick of a long and lingering disease. Then that haughty and courageous stomack of his, together with his lusty and able body, became so abated, that he who earst before thought nothing lesse befitting a king, than to let his mind, and busy his brains about religious ceremonies: now all upon a suddain became wholly devoted to all kind of superstition both more and lesse, yea, and filled the peoples heads besides with holiness and devotion. So as now the very common sort wishing again for the old world, under the reign of king Numa, were fully perswaded, that there was no other remedy left for their sick and diseased bodies, but to obtain at Gods hands grace and pardon. Men say, that the king himself in perusing and turning over the Commentaries and registers of Numa his predecessor, and therein finding certain hidden and solemn sacrifices that had been unto Iupiter Elicus, retired himself, and kept close within a house to celebrate the same. But for that this holy service was not to be begun aright, nor duly administered, he had not onely no divine apparition and heavenly vision presented unto him, but also incurred the heavy displeasure and wrath of Iupiter, whom by his preposterous religion he had thus offended, and so both himself and his whole house were consumed with lightning. This Tullus, in great glory and renown of martial prowesse, reigned two and thirty years.

When Tullus was dead, the government returned again, as it was from the first beginning ordained, unto the Senators: who named an Interregent, and he called a Parliament, wherein the people elected Ancus Martius for their King, and the Senators gave their assent thereto. This Ancus Martius, was Numa Pompilius his daughters son; who so soon as he was come to the crown, both in remembrance of his grand-fathers glorious government, and also in regard of the reign of his next predecessor, which in other points right excellent and commendable, in this onely failed; and was not so happy: either for that religion was neglected, or not with due ceremonies exercised; and thinking it a thing most necessary, and of greatest moment, to reduce all publick divine service and sacrifices to the first institution of Numa, commanded the Arch-priest or High-priest to make an extract, and transcript of all the sacred rites and mysteries out of Numa his Commentaries, and ingrois them into one table, and to publish them abroad unto the people: whereby both his subjects and citizens desirous of peace, as also the States thereby adjoining, were in good hope, that the king would altogether conform himself, and take after the customes and ordinances of his grand-father.

Hereupon the Latins, with whom in King Tullus his dayes a league was made, took heart unto them, made inrodes into the countrey about Rome, and fetcht out booties. And when the Romans demanded restitution, they made them a proud answer, supposing belike, That the King of Rome would pass the whole course of his reign in ease and idleness, sitting still in his chappels, and by his holy altars. But Ancus was of a mean and indifferent disposition by nature, having an eye as well to Numa, as to Romulus, and composed as it were of both. For over and besides, that he thought peace more expedient and necessary for his grandfathers reign, the people being as then but new risen, unsettled, and fierce withal: considering also, that himself should not easily, without taking wrong, enjoy the quietness which to him hapned: for that his patience was already tried, and not onely tried, but also despised: and seeing that the State of the present time was fitter for a Tullus to be King, than a Numa: yet to the end that, as Numa in time of peace instituted ceremonies of religion, so he might likewise set out to posterity others concerning war: and that wars should not be onely made, but also denounced and proclaimed orderly, and in some religious form of solemnity:

he set down in writing that law and formal order, by vertue whereof restitution is demanded (which at this day the Feciales or Heralds observe) like as he received it from the ancient people Æqui.

The Embassador Fecial, coming to their borders, at whose hands the goods are required again, covering his head with a bonnet or vail of woollen yarn, saith thus: Hear O Jupiter, give ear ye limits and confines (naming them of such and such a Country) let Justice and Right hearken also to what I shall say: I am the publick messenger of the people of Rome, of a just and religious embassy am I come, and to my words give credit. After this, rehearseth he all his demands, and then calleth Jupiter to witness, saying, If I unjustly and impiously demand, that such persons should be delivered, or such and such goods be rendered unto me, the publick messenger of the people of Rome: then let me never return again to enjoy mine own country. These words rehearseth he, as he setteth foot, and steps into the confines: the same also he speaketh to him, whomsoever he meeteth first: the self same words he pronounceth, as he entreteth within the gate of the City; yea, and when he is come into the market place he saith the same, changing and varying in some few terms, from the prescript form of the demand, and taking the solemn oath. In case then, the persons whom he requireth, be not yeilded after 33. days expired (for so many just are usually granted) then proclaimeth he war in this wise. Hear O Jupiter, and thou Juno, Quirinus thou: ye celestial Saints all, and terrestrial powers, ye infernal spirits also listen and give ear. I call you all to witness, and protest before you, that this nation (naming them whosoever they be) is unjust, and doth not according to right and equity. But of these matters will we consult at home in our own country, with our elders, and ask their advice how we may come by our own. Herewith returneth the messenger unto Rome for counsel, and presently the King would in these or such like words, sitting in Council with his Peers, move them in this manner. Whereas the Paterpatrat or Herald, in the behalf of the people of Rome, and their Quirites, hath treated with the Paterpatrat, or Herald, in the name of the ancient Latines, and with the folk of the ancient Latines, concerning certain things, differences, sutes, and causes: thereupon depending; which things they have neither yeilded nor paid, nor performed and done; which ought to have been paid, yeilded, performed, and done; what is your judgment? speaking to him, whole opinion first he asketh in this case. Then (saith he) My advice is, that those things be sought for, and recovered by mere force, by just and lawfull war. This do I fully agree unto, this do I determine resolutely. After him were the other asked in course: and when the greater number of them who were present accord thereunto, then by general consent, they were wont to proclame war in this order: That the Fecial or King at Arms should go with a javelin, having an iron head, or with a red bloody spear burnt at the end, as far as to their borders or marches: and there in the presence of three witnesses at the least, not under fourteen years of age, should say thus: Whereas the people of the old Latines, and the old Latine folk have practised and trespassed against the people of Rome and the Quirites, and whereas the people of Rome and the Quirites have so determined, consented, and agreed, that war should be made with the ancient Latines; I therefore together with the people of Rome, do denounce and proclame and make war with the nations of the old Latines, and with the old Latine folk. And when he had thus said, he lanced his spear or javelin within the confines of the enemies. After this manner then, was restitution demanded of the Latines, and war denounced or proclaimed: which order of proceeding, M their posterity by tradition received.

Ancus having committed the charge of divine service and sacrifice unto the Flamins, and the other Priests, levied a new Army, went forth into the field, and by force won Politorium, a City of the Latines. And following the usual manner of the former Kings his progenitors, who had mightily increased the Roman State, by admitting their enemies into the number of Citizens, transported the whole multitude from thence to Rome. And because the ancient natural Romans inhabited Palatium, the Sabins about the Capitol and rock Tarpeia, and the Albans replenished the mount Calius: therefore the hill Aventine was allowed this new company to dwell in. Unto whom not long after, there came fresh inhabitants to people it, upon the winning of Tellene and Ficana. But after this, the Romans were driven to recover by war Politorium again: for that whilst it stood void and empty, the old Latines had surprised and taken it. Which was the cause, that the Romans destroyed that City quite, that it should not be at all times a receptacle for the enemies. Last of all, when as now the Latines war was driven wholly and brought before Medullia, there for a good while was much ado, and doubtful issue of fight, and interchangeable victory: for that the Town was both well fortified with bulwarks, and furnished with a strong garrison of men: and also by reason that the army of the Latines being incamped in plain and open ground, had sundry times with banners displayed, encountred hand to hand with the Romans. At the last Ancus bending his whole power against them, first gave them an overthrow in a set battel: and so having gained rich pillage, returned to Rome. At that time also were many thousands of the Latines received into the City: Who to the end, that the Aventine and Palatium should meet together, were appointed to seat themselves about the Temple of * Murtia. The Janiculum likewise was adjoined unto the City, not for want of ground, but because it might not be at any time a fortress and hold for the enemies: which was thought good to be united unto the City, not only with a wall, but also for more commodious passage to and fro, with a wooden bridge over Tyber. The Quirites foss or ditch also, no small defence against the easie access from the plain grounds, was a work of Ancus. Thus the estate being grown

A grown to exceeding strength and bigness: when as now in so huge a multitude of people there was much confusion, and no difference of well doing or ill, and thereby many mischiefs and outrages began secretly to be committed: for to restrain therefore with some terror, such boldness increasing daily more and more, there was a goal or common prison built in the heart of the City, even over against the common place of assembly. And in this Kings days not only the circuit of the City was enlarged, but also their Lands and Territories. For by reason that the Forrest Mæsia was conquered from the Veientians, their Seignory reached to the Sea: where, in the very mouth of Tyber was the town Hestia built, and the salt pits made there about, and upon such noble exploits by arms achieved, the Temple of Jupiter Feretrius, was in more ample and glorious manner re-edified.

B In the reign of Ancus, there came to dwell at Rome one Lucumo, a pregnant nimble headed man, and a wealthy, upon a desire especially and hope of advancement and honor, which at Tarquinius (where he was born, although descended of foreign parentage) he had no means to attain unto. The Son he was of Demaratus the Corinthian, who upon civil troubles and dissensions having fled his country, and by chance planting himself in Tarquinius, there married a wife and had issue by her two sons; named Lucumo and Aruns. Lucumo survived his father, and became heir of all his goods. Aruns died before his father, leaving his wife behind him, conceived with child: neither lived the father Demaratus long after his son, who not knowing that his daughter-in-law and sons wife was with child, made no mention at all of his Nephew in his Will, and so departed this world. Whereupon the child after his Grandfathers decease being born to no part of his goods,

C for his poor condition, was called Egerius. But Lucumo on the other side, the sole heir and inheritor of all, as he began by his wealth to be haughty enough, and to look aloft, so he grew much more proud for his marching in marriage with Tanaquil, a dame of a right noble house descended, and who could hardly bear a lower estate and degree then that wherein she was born. When she was once married, and saw the Tuscans to disdain Lucumo, for that his father was a stranger and banished person, she could not endure that indignity. But forgetting all kind of affection to her native country, so she might see her husband raised to high promotion, she resolved and plotted to leave Tarquinius and depart. To which purpose and design, Rome seemed a place most fit and convenient of all others. For thus she projected and discoursed: That in a City lately founded, where

D all kind of Nobility suddenly cometh up, and ariseth from vertue and prowess, her husband a valorous and industrious man must needs have place, and be entertained: that King Tatius a Sabin born, had reigned there: that Numa was from Cures sent forth, and called to the Crown: that Ancus also a Sabin by his mothers side, had the only image of Numa to shew for his Nobility. Thus she soon perswaded him, as being a man ambitious and desirous of honor, and whose mother only was a Tarquinian born, and therefore he was to make less scruple of abandoning the place of his Nativity. Thereupon they removed with all they had to Rome. And it fortuneth that to Janiculum they came. Where, as Tarquinius sat with his wife in the chariot, behold an Eagle came gently flying down from aloft, and took up his bonnet from his head, and soaring over the chariot with a great noise, and clapping of her wings, as if she had been sent from Heaven to do

E this feat, set it gently and handsomly on his head again: which done, she mounted on high, and flew away. Tanaquil, as they say, embraced this Augury with great joy, being a womanskilful, as commonly all the Tuscans are, in such prodigious sights and apparitions from heaven: and therewith taking her husband about the neck, willed him to be of good cheer, and to hope for great matters and high preferments: saying, how that bird came from such a quarter of the Heaven, addressed as a messenger from such a god, and shewed a divine token and presage upon the highest part of man, even the top of the Crown, and lifted up the ornament that stood upon his mortal head, to give it him again immortal, as from God above. In these hopes and cogitations which they entertained by the way, they entered the City: where they took an house, and from thence forth he was commonly called L. Tarquinius. Now within a while both his new coming, and his

F wealth withal, made him well known: and himself also besides, set forward his good fortune by courteous and fair speech and affable language to every man, by friendly enviting, and liberal feasting, and by making what friends he could by gifts, favours, and good turns: so far forth, as the fame of him came into the Kings Court: where, by his willing service and singular dexterity, in short time he had not only access to the Kings knowledge, but also entered into familiar acquaintance and friendship with his Highness. Insomuch, that both in private Councils and publick consultations, as well at home as abroad, he was always present, and bare a great stroke. And having in all kind of offices carried himself with credit, was in the end by the Kings last Will and Testament made Tutor or Protector of his children: Thus reigned Ancus 24. years, for glory and reputation of his sage government, as well in war as in peace, equal to any of the former Kings: his

G predecessors. Now were his sons neer 14. years of age when he died. Tarquinius therefore made the more haste, that the high Court of Parliament should with all speed possibly be summoned for creation of a King: which being against a day proclaimed, he sent away the boys to the chase a hunting, at the very instant of the said election. He himself (as men say) was the first, that both ambitiously sought for the Crown, and also for to win the hearts of the Commons, devised and framed an eloquent Oration. Saying, it was no new and strange thing that he stood for: And why? he was not the

"the first (that any man should be offended, or make any wonder) but the third alien that in Rome
 "affected and aspired to the Kingdom: that both Tatius, not of a forraigner only, but of an ene"my became King: and Numa likewise, a man unacquainted with the City and matters of State,
 "was without any sute or seeking of his part, by the Romans sent for, & advanced to the crown.
 "As for himself, he alledged and said, That from the time that he was at his own liberty and dispose "of himself, he with his wife & all that he had removed and came to Rome: and of that age wherein "men are employed in civil affairs, he had spent a greater part in Rome, then in his own ancient "country. Moreover, that he was trained up both at home in the City and in war abroad, to the "knowledge of the Roman laws, orders, and customs, and that under no mean person but an ex"cellent matter, even King Ancus himself. And finally, for faithful service and diligent attendance
 "about the King, he had endeavoured to pass all others: and for liberality and courtesie towards
 "all others, he had striven to go beyond the King. These and such like allegations, as he laid forth
 "and pleaded, and that right truly; the people of Rome with exceeding great consent elected him "their King. Who being a man otherwise of singular parts and of great worth, as he was ambitious "in seeking the kingdom, so continued he still, when he wore the crown: and minding no less to e"stablish his own state and throne, than to maintain the good estate of the Common weal, he advanced
 "one hundred more to the order of Senators, who afterwards were called Minorum Gentium
 "Patres, as a men would say, Senators of a later sort, and meaner quality. A faction, no doubt to take "part and side with the King, by whose means they had been admitted into the Senate. The first war
 "he made, was with the Latins: from whom by force he won the town Appia: from thence ha"ving brought away a greater pillage in proportion, than the war imported in brute, he set forth ga-
 "mings and plays more stately and with greater furniture and provision, than the other Kings before "his time. Then was the plot or compas of ground first set out & appointed for the lists or theater, "called now * Circus maximus wherein were assigned scaffolds for the Senators, and for the Gentle"men or Knights severally by themselves, called Fori, where they might make them places to see the "pastimes at their ease and pleasure. And in this manner stood they to behold: namely, upon scaf"folds born up twelve foot high from the ground with forked perches or props. The gamings were "running of horses, and fighting at fists and buffers: for performance whereof, there were champi"ons sent for of purpose, especially out of Tuscan. These sports continued afterwards from year to "year in great solemnity, and named diversly, either the Roman games, or the great Games. This "King moreover assigned certain places about the Forum or common place for private men to build "in where the galleries and shops were made. He went in hand likewise to wall the City about with "a stone wall, but the Sabin war staid him in the beginning, that he went not forward with that "work. This came so suddenly upon him, that the enemies were passed over the river Anio, before "the power of the Romans could meet them, and make head against them. Whereupon great fear
 "there was at Rome. And at the first a cruel conflict there was, and much blood shed on both parts,
 "but no appearance of victory. But after the enemies were retired once into the camp, and that the "Romans had time to gather fresh forces, Tarquinius supposing his only want was in his cavalry,
 "determined to join unto the Rhamneses, *Titien*ses, and Luceres, which Romulus had ordained, other
 "Centuries or Cornets of horsemen, and them to leave unto the posterity after him, bearing his M "own name. Which because Romulus had done aforetime by the counsel and advise of Augurs, Ac"cius Navius renowned and famous in those days for his skill that way, opposed himself and gave "out plainly, that there might be nothing changed or newly ordained in that behalf, unless the birds
 "first approved and allowed the same. Whereat the King was wroth, and in scorn and derision of his "art, as they say: Come on Sir Soothsayer (quoth he) agreed, and tell me by the sight of your birds, "whether that may possibly be done, which I now conceive in my mind. To which demand Navius,
 "who had first made proof thereof by his learning, answered resolutely, that it might in very deed be "effected. Why then (quoth he) I have imagined in my conceit, that thou shalt cut a whetstone a-
 "sunder with a razor: Heretake them to thee, and dispatch that which thy fowls foretnew may be "done: then as the report goeth, without more ado, he cut the whetstone quite in two. And in that "very place where this feat was done, the Statue or Image of Accius was erected, with his head co"vered, even in the Comitium, at the stairs therof on the left hand of the Curia or Council house. It is "reported that the whetstone also was set up in the same place, for a memorial to all posterity fol"lowing, of that miracle. Certainly both Auguries, and the Priesthood and Colledg of Augurs from "that time forward, was so highly honored; and had in such reverence, that never after was there "ought done, either in war abroad, or in peace at home, but by their counsel and advise. Assemblies "of people summoned were dismissed, armies levied and ready to take the field were discharged,
 "yea, and the greatest affairs of State, were given over and laid aside, when the birds allowed not "thereof. Neither did Tarquin for that time alter the Centuries of the horsemen any whit, only he "redoubled the number, so that in three Centuries or Cornets there were 1300. horse: and those "lastenfort who were added to the others, bare the names of the former, which at this day, because "they be double, are called the six Centuries. Tarquin thus having encreased that part of his power, "bade the Sabins battel the second time. And over and besides, that the Romans army was in "strength well amended, he devised also privily a subtle stratagem, and set certain men to set on fire
 "a mighty stack of wood, lying upon the bank of Anio; and so to cast it into the river: the wood "burning still by the help of the wind; and most of it being driven against the piles of the bridge,
 "and

A and there sticking close together with the boats and planks, fired and consumed it clean. This accident both terrified the Sabins in their flight, and when they were discomfited, troubled them much, and hindered their flight: so that many a man having escaped the enemy, yet perished in the very river. Whose armor and weapons floating down the Tiber, were known at Rome, and brought news thither of this victory, in manner before word could be brought thereof by land. In this conflict the horsemen won greatest price and praise. For being placed at the skirts of both the wings, at what time as the main battel of their own footmen, were now at the point to retire, they charged so forcibly upon the enemy (as it is reported) from the flanks where they were marshalled, that they not only stayed the Sabin Legions pressing hard and fiercely upon those that began to shrink and give back, but all at once purthem to flight. The Sabins ran amain towards the mountains, but few gat thither: for the greater number, as we said before, were by the horsemen driven into the river. Tarquinius thinking it good to take the time, and follow hard upon them whiles they were frighted, after he had sent to Rome, the booty with the prisoners, and burned on a great heap together (as he had vowed to Vulcan) the spoils of the enemies, marched on still forward, and led his army into the Territory of the Sabins: who albeit they had already sustained an overthrow, and could not hope for better success, yet because they had no time to consult and advise with themselves, with such a power as might on a sudden in that strite be raised, met with him. Where they once again were defeated and vanquished, and in the end being in despair to make their part good, they sued for peace. Then was Collatia, and all the lands about it taken from the Sabins. Exerius the Kings brothers son, was left with a garrison at Collatia to keep that place. And (as I find upon record) the Collatins were yielded into his hands, and the manner of their surrender went in this order. First, the King demanded thus and said: Are ye Embassadors, or deputed assigns sent from the people of Collatia to make surrender both of yourselves and the Collatines? We are (quoth they.) And are the people of Collatia in their own power, and at liberty to do what they will? They are (say they.) Doye also render up your selves, the people of Collatia their town, their territory and lands, their waters, their limits, their temples, their household stuff and implements, and all thing else, as well sacred as prophane, unto my power and the peoples of Rome. We do yeeld (say they.) Then (quoth he) do I accept thereof, and receive all into my hands. The Sabin war thus finished, Tarquinius returned to Rome in triumph. After this, he warred upon the old Latines, but they never proceeded so far on any side, as to join issue in a general battel, and one set field for all. But bringing his power first to one town, and after to another, he made a conquest of the whole nation of the Latins. So as these towns, Cornetulum, old Picula, Cametia, Craustumerium, Ameriola, Medullia, Nomentum, were recovered from the old Latines, or from those that had revolted unto them.

B After all this ensued peace. Then was he more earnestly bent to go forward with his works, began in time of peace, then he was before busied in managing of his wars: in so much, as he gave the people no more repose at home, then he had in wars abroad. For besides that he prepared to compass the City (which as yet he had not fortified) round about with a stone wall, the beginning of which piece of work was by the Sabin war interrupted and broken off: he devised also certain draughts or vaulted finks from aloft into the Tiber, whereby he drained and kept dry the base City, or lowest grounds about the market place, and the other vallies between hill and hill, for that out of the plains and flats, they might not easily make riddance and conveyance away of the water. Moreover, he levelled a large court or plot of ground, ready for the foundation of the Temple of Jupiter in the Capitol, which he had vowed in the Sabin war, his mind even then giving him, that one day it should be a stately place.

C At the same time there hapned in the court a wonderful strange thing, both in present view, and also in consequence. For as the report went, a young lad, whose name was Servius Tullius, as he lay asleep, in the sight of many persons had his head all on a light fire. And upon an outcry raised at the wondering of so great a matter, the King arose: and when one of the household brought water to quench the flame, he was by the Queen stayed. And after the fire was somewhat appeased, she forbade the boy to be disquieted, until such time as he awoke of himself: and within a while as the sleep departed, the blaze likewise went out, and vanished away. Then Tanquil the Queen taking her husband aside into a secret room: See you this boy (quoth she) whom we so homely keep, and in so poor and mean estate bring up? Were well this, and know for certain, that he will one day be a light to direct us in our dangerous troubles and doubtful affairs; he will be the chief pillar and succour of the afflicted state of the Kings house. Let us therefore cherish and foster with all kindness and indulgence the subject matter of so great a publick and private ornament. Whereupon they began to make much of the boy, as if he had been one of their own children, and to instruct and train him up in those arts, whereby forward wits are fitted to great enterprises, and to achieve high place of wealth and honor. And soon came to that pass, which pleased the almighty gods. For he proved a young man indeed of princely nature and forwardness: in such sort, that when there should be a son in law sought out to match with Tarquinius his daughter in marriage, there was not one of all the young gentlemen of Rome, to be found comparable to him in any respect. So as the King affianced his daughter unto him. This so great honor whereunto he was advanced upon whatfore cause or occasion it was, induceth me to think he was not the son of a bondwoman, nor that he served whilst he was a little one, as a slave. I am of their mind rather, that report thus:

When

The form of surrendering a City.

Tanquil the Queen unto King Tarquinius.

When Corniculum was won, the wife of Servius Tullius, a great Lord and principal personage of that City, and there slain, was left great with child; and being among other captives known whose wife she was, in regard of her rare nobility only, was by the Queen preserved from servitude, and at Rome in Priscus Tarquinius his house, was delivered of a child upon which so special favor, there grew more familiar acquaintance between the two Ladies, the Queen and her self; and the child also brought up of a little one there in Court, was both tenderly beloved, and also highly regarded. But his mothers fortune, whose hap was after her country was lost, to fall into the hands of enemies, caused men commonly to think that he was the son of a bond-slave. Now in the 38th year almost, after that Tarquinius began his reign, was this Servius Tullius in right great estimation and credit, not only with the King, but also with the nobility and commons. Then the 2. sons of An- cus, who as they always before disdained in the highest degree, that they were by the deceitful practise of their guardian, so unworthily put by the inheritance of their fathers Kingdom, and that a stranger reigned at Rome, one who was not descended of any neighbors house thereby, no nor so much as of Italian blood: so now they began much more to take it much and indignation, in case that after Tarquinius, the Kingdom should not return unto them and their line, but should still run on end, and headlongwise fall unto such base varlets: That in the same City, 100. years almost after that Romulus the son of a god, and a god himself, reigned therein, (during the time he remained here upon the earth) a very bond-slave and no better, and one born of a bond-woman, should be possessed of the Crown: and that it would be a foul stain and dishonor generally to the name of the Romans, but most especially to their house & family, if whilst the issue Male of An- cus lived, the Kingdom of Rome should lie open, and be expoted, not to strangers alone, but which is more, to very bond-men and slaves. This ignominy therefore, and open wrong, they resolve by meer force to put by and avoid: howbeit, the grievance of this injury done unto them, set them on against Tarquinius himself, rather than Servius Tullius: both for that the King if he lived still, would be a more sharp revenger of the murder, than a private person: and also if they should happen to kill Servius, whomsoever besides, the King would vouchsafe for his son in law, him was he like to make heir apparent, and inheritor also of the Kingdom. For these considerations they lay wait for to murder the King himself in this manner: There were for the purpose to do this feat, two passing stout and sturdy herdmen chosen, who having such rustical iron tools about them, as they were wont both of them to occupy, and made a great shew of a most tumultuous brawl and fray in the very porch of the Court gate: by which means, they drew all the Kings officers, sergeants, and guard about them: then as they called with a loud voice, both the one and the other, upon the King, in such wise, as the noise was heard within the palace, they were converted before his Highness. At their first coming they cried out both at once, and interrupted one another in all outrageous manner, so as by a sergeant they were fain to be restrained and commanded to speak by turns, until at length they gave over their confused brawlings. Then one of them on set purpose, as it was before agreed upon, began his tale: and while the King as wholly bent to give ear turned aside towards him, the other lift his Ax aloft, and struck the King on the head, and leaving it sticking there still in the wound, they whipt out both of them together, and ran their ways. And whilst they that stood next about Tarquinius, took him up ready to die, the sergeants made after them that were M fled, and apprehended them. Whereupon an outcry arose, & a great concourse of people, wondering what the matter might be: Tanaquil in this hurlyburly caused the Court gates to be shut, and commanded every one to avoid the place: and at one instant with great diligence provideth things requisite to cure the wound, as if there were some hope of life: and withal, if that should fail, she prepareth other means and remedies against the worst that might happen. Sending therefore in all speed for Servius, when she had shewed him her husband half dead, and already bloodless: she took him by the right hand, and besought him not to suffer, either the death of his father-in-law unrevenged, or his wives mother, to be a laughing stock unto the enemies. Thine is the kingdom O Serv- ius by right (quoth she) if thou be a man: and not theirs, who by the hands of others have committed a most shameful & villainous fact. Take a good heart therefore, and arm thy self, and follow the guidance and direction of the gods, who long since by a divine and heavenly flame burning about thy head, foreshewed that one day it should be highly advanced. Now let that heavenly blaze raise thee up: now awake in every deed: what man! we also being strangers have born the Scepter: consider with thy self who thou art now, and not from whence thou art descended. And if in so sudden an occurrence, thine own wits be astonished, and to seek, then follow my rule, and be advised by my counsel. In this while the noise and violence of the people was so great, that it could not well be suffered. Then Tanaquil from the upper loft of the house, out at a window that opened into the new street (for the King kept his Court hard by the Temple of Jupiter Stator) spake unto the people, willing them to be of good cheer. "The King indeed (quoth she) was amazed and swooned at the sudden stroke, howbeit it went nothing deep: for now is he come again to himself, his wound cleansed from blood, and searched: all signs of life, and no danger of death: and I trust in God within a while you shall see himself again. In the mean time his pleasure is, that the people shall be obeyant to Servius Tullius: he shall minister justice and give laws, he shall execute and perform all the offices of the King. Then came Servius abroad in his royal robe, called Trabea, attended with the Lictors; and sitting in the Kings throne, some causes he dispatcheth himself, of other some he maketh as though he would consult and confer with the King.

A Thus for certain daies, the King being dead, and his death concealed, he, under colour of executing the function of another, gathered strength to himself. But when at the last it was openly known by the wailing and lamentation which arose in the Palace, that the King was departed, Servius accompanied with a strong guard, shewed himself and was the first, that without the election of the people only by the will and consent of the nobles, took the Kingdom upon him.

Servius Tullius
takes the Crown upon him.

The sons of Ancus at the first, seeing the murderers attached, and hearing that the King was alive, and Servius so mighty, retired themselves as banished persons to Succsa Pometia. And Servius now sought means to make himself strong, as well by private helps, as by publike. And lest peradventure the children of Tarquinius should another day be as ill affected against him, as the children of Ancus were against Tarquinius, he gave in marriage his two daughters to Lucius and Aruns, two of the Kings sons, late deceased. Yet could not he with all the policy of mans wit stay the fatal necessity, nor stop and divert the course of the destinies; but that the envy that followeth a Kingdom bred all distrust, disloyalty, and malice, even among those of his own household, for all their alliance and affinity. Howbeit in very good time, and fitly for the quietness of the present state, was the war with the Veientes (for now was the term of the truce expired) and other Tuscans, taken in hand. In which war, both the valour, and also the good fortune of Tullius was well seen and greatly renowned. Who having discomfited a mighty host of the enemies, as undoubted King in the conceit and judgment as well of the Senators as of the Commons, if their hearts had been lounded, returned to Rome.

C Then in hand went he with a work of peace, and of all other the greatest, and of most importance. To the end, that as Numa was the first author of divine Law and Religion: so the posterity forever after might report and record, that Servius was the founder of all distinction and orders; whereby between degrees of worship and wealth, there might be seen due difference, and regard of worth. For he devised and ordained the Cens, to wit, the Assessing, and Taxation of the Citizens: a thing most profitable to that state and government, which was like in time to come to grow so mighty. By which Cens, the charges and contributions, either in war or peace, was not levied by the poll, upon the Citizens, as aforetime, but according to the valuation of their wealth and ability. So he erected certain Classes and Centuries, and appointed their degrees, according to the assessing, and valuation, meet in decent manner to serve in war, and meet to be employed in The Levy or taxation of the people first instituted.

D peace. And first of those who were rated at an hundred thousand Asses and above, he ordained 80 Centuries: 40 of the elder sort, and as many of the younger: and all joyntly were counted the first Classis. The elder were charged to be in readines at all hours, for defence of the City: the younger to follow the wars abroad. These were bound to find harness, for defence of their own bodies, an headpiece or morion, a shield, greeves, and corselet, all of brasse: and for offence of the enemy, a javelin, and a sword. To this Classis were adjoynd two Centuries of Carpenters and Smiths, or Engineers, who were in wage, and served without armour: and their charge was to find the Campes Engines of battery and artillery. The second consisted of those that were valued between 100000 and * 75000 Asses. And of this sort both young and old were enrolled twenty Centuries: who were enjoyned to provide for their armour, a target or buckler instead of a shield: and excepting only a corselet, in all points as the former. The third he would have to be of those that were esteemed worth * 50000 Asses; and as many Centuries of them, and with the same distinction of age. Neither concerning their armour was any thing altered: only for their greeves they were dispensed with. In the fourth Classis were those that were assessed in the Subsidy book, between 50000 and * 25000 Asses, and of them were so many Centuries. Their armour was changed, having no more but a spear and a casting dart, with a loop called Verrutum. The fifth was greater, containing thirty Centuries. These carried with them slings and stones to sling afar off: among whom were reckoned the beedles or criers, together with the trumpeters and cornettriers, who were divided into three Centuries. This band stood of them that were assessed from 25000 unto * 11000 Asses. The valuation under this comprised all the rest of the multitude. Whereof arose one Century, freed and exempted from warfare. Thus having furnished and disposed the forces of the Infantry, he enrolled besides twelve Centuries of horsemen, and those out of the principall men of the City: and six other Centuries likewise, to those three that Romulus instituted, retaining the same name till that they in their first solemn institution had. These horsemen for to buy their great horses had * 10000 Asses out of the chamber of the City a peece: and for to find and keep those horses were the rich widows set yearly at * 2000 Asses a peece. Thus were all these charges and burdens shifted from off the poor mens shoulders, and laid upon the rich. And therefore afterward was their dignity and honour so much the more. For in the grand-leets and solemn elections of Magistrates, every man had not prerogative alike, nor equall authority, as Romulus first ordained; and the other Kings continued, when they gave their voices by the poll indifferently, one with another: but there was distinction made, and certain degrees; but so, as neither any one was excluded or shut out, and yet the whole rested and lay in the power of the richer sort, and chief of the City. For first the horsemen were called: afterward, the eighty Centuries belonging to the first Classis, of the principall footmen: who if they disagreed, and hapned to be at any difference, then the Centuries of the second Classis were cited. And never went they likely so low as to the last of all. Neither ought any man to marvell, that this order in these daies, after five and thirty tribes compleat, agreeth not with the Centuries of the elder and yonger sort, according to the computation set down by Servius Tullius, considering their number is now doubled. For having divided the City into four Wards, according to the quarters and hills; those parts which were inhabited he called Tribes, of the word Tribute (as I suppose.) For he it was that devised and brought up the manner of equall contribution and payment, proportionably to the assessment and rate of mens goods. Neither were these Tribes any waies at all respective to the division or number of the Centuries aforesaid. When this Levy and taxation was finished, which he dispatched the sooner, by reason of the peoples fear of an act by him made, concerning those that should not come in to be registred and enrolled in the Subsidy book: he published an Edict, under pain of imprisonment and death, that all Citizens of Rome, as well horsemen as footmen, should the morrow after at the break of day, every one in his own Century, I shew himself in Campus Martius, i. e. in Mars field. There, after he had mustered and embattelled the whole Army, he assailed and purged the same with the sacrifice of a Swine, a Sheep, and a Bull. And this was called Condium Lustrum. Which was the very closing up and accomplishment of the assessment. In this Lustrum there were numbred and assessed 80000 Citizens. Fabius Pictor, a most ancient writer saith moreover, that so many there were of able men to bear arms. For to contain this multitude, it was thought good the City should be enlarged. Whereupon he adjoynerh unto it two hills more, to wit, Quirinalis, and Viminalis. After this, he proceeded to augment the mount Esquilie: and to grace that hill, and make it of more reputation, there he dwelt himself, and had his Court. He cast a trench and ditch, and raised a rampire about the City, and then walled it: by occasion whereof, he set out the Pomery further. Pomarium, according to the Etymology and literall signification of the word, is as much to say, as Postmarium, or the Arrivemure, that is, a plot of ground behind, or without the wall. But indeed it is rather a space about the wall on either side, which the Tuscans in old time, when they built their Cities, used by advice of Augurs, to hallow and consecrate in certain bounds and limits, all along where they minded to set the wall: that neither within, the houses might joyn upon the wall (whereas now adays they build close to) and without also, there might be a void piece of ground, lying common, free, and unoccupied of men. This vacant space, that neither might lawfully be inhabited, nor yet eared and plowed, as well because it was without the wally as the wall without it, the Romans called Pomarium. And ever as the circuit of the City was made larger, look how much the walls should be set out further, so far those hallowed and consecrated bounds of the Pomery were extended.

Pomery what it is,

Thus the City being much increased in compass of building, and all things disposed in good order, requisite as well for war as peace; to the end, that he should not alwaies seek to purchase wealth and puissance by war and martiall prowes only, he attempted to amplifie his dominion by policy, and withall to bestow upon the City some glorious ornament to beautifie the same. And even at that time was the Temple of Diana at Ephesus, of great fame, and much renowned: which as the report went, was built in common by all the states and princes of Asia. When as therefore Servius would use highly to praise and commend unto the Lords and heads of the Latines (with whom of purpose he had both in publike and private, mutual entertainment and familiar acquaintance) that generall agreement of the Princes of Asia, in matters of religion, and in the uniform worship of the same gods: at length, by much iterating and following till that theam, he prevailed with them so far, that the nations of the Latines, and the people of Rome together, built at Rome a Temple unto Diana: which was a plain confession, and clear case, that Rome was now the imperiall seat, for which they had so often warred. This quarrell, albeit now the Latines all in a manner had neglected quite, and made no care at all thereof, seeing they had so often attempted it by force of arms, and sped so badly: yet fortune seemed to one only man to cast a favourable aspect, and yeeld good hope, by his private policy and industry, to recover again the imperiall dignity unto the Latines. A certain householder, forsooth, of the Sabins, had, as they say, a cow bred with him of a wonderfull bigness, and faire withall. (for a memoriall of which so rare and wonderfull beast the horns were set up, and remained fast fixed in the porch of Dianas Temple, many a hundred years after:) this was supposed (as it was no lesse in very deed) a strange and prodigious thing: and the wife men or wizards prophesied, that the sovereignty and Empire should be settled and established in that State, whereof any one Citizen sacrificed that cow unto Diana. This prophesie came to the ears of the Priest of Dianas Temple. The Sabin aforesaid, so soon as he had espied a meet and convenient day for sacrifice, drives the cow to Rome, and leads her to the Temple of Diana, and there presented her before the Altar: where the Roman Priest wondring to see so huge a beast, whereof there had been so much speech, and calling to mind withall the foresaid Oracle, spake to the Sabin in this wise, My friend (quoth he) what mean you to sacrifice so uncleanly unto Diana, and do not rather purifie and wash your self all over in some running stream, before you come hither? Lo where Tyber runneth in the valley beneath. The stranger then, moved with some scruple of conscience, who desired nothing more, than that all should be well and orderly done, that an happy success might be correspondent and answerable to so prodigious a beast, forthwith went down to the Tyber. In the mean while, the Roman killed the Cow in honor of Diana. This thing pleased the King and the whole City wonderfull well.

Servius, albeit he were now without all question by so long continuance, fully and really invested in the Kingdom; yet because he heard say, that young Tarquinius otherwhile gave out speeches of him, that he reigned without the nomination and election of the people: therefore after he had

A first wan the hearts of the Commons, by dividing among them every one certaine lands gotten by conquest from the enemies, he adventured to propound unto the people, and put it to their suffrages and voices, Whether their will and pleasure was, that he should raign over them. Thus was he declared King with as great consent, as never any before with the like. But Tarquinius for all this, had nevertheless hope to aspire and attain unto the Crown: nay, rather so much the more, because he understood the said division of the lands among the Commons, was a thing concluded and passed against the will and mind of the Senators. Taking therefore occasion thereby to accuse and blame Servius before them, he supposed he had good means offered to wind himself into favor with the Lords of the Senate, and so to become strong in the Council-house. Over and besides, he was both himself a young man of great courage and hot stomach, and his wife likewise at home, dame Tullia, lay ever upon him, and pricked forward his distempered and troubled mind: for you must think, that the royall Court of Rome also hath brought forth and afforded one example of a tragical and horrible act: that by a weariness and loathing conceived against the Kings government, liberty and freedom might the sooner ensue: and that raign be the last, which was by mischief gotten first. This L. Tarquinius, whether he were the son or nephew of Priscus Tarquinius, it is not very clear, howbeit, I would rather think with most writers, that he was his son. A brother he had, Aruns Tarquinius, a young gentleman of a mild nature. These two (as is aforesaid) had married the two Tullia, the Kings daughters, and they also themselves were in conditions far unlike. And happily it so fell out, that two forward and violent natures were not coupled together in wedlock: such was the good fortune, I beleeve, of the Roman people, that thereby the raign of Servius might continue the longer, and the City brought and settled in good order. The younger Tullia, a stout dame and a proud, grieved and vexed much that her husband had nothing in him, no metall or matter at all, either to covet and desire, or to enterprise and adventure: her mind was fully set upon the other Tarquin, him she esteemed highly, and had in admiration, him she said to be a man indeed, and descended of royall blood. As for her sister, she despised and checked her, for that she having a forward and valorous Knight to her husband, sat still, and seconded him not in audacity and boldness, as a woman should do. Well, in short time likeness and disposition soon brought them together, and as it is commonly seen, Naught will to naught, and sort best together. But the mischief and trouble that brought all up-side down, arose from the woman. For she using to have secret conference with her sitters husband, never ceased to speak badly, and to rail of her own husband unto his brother, and of her sister unto her husband. "Affirming in good earnest, it were better both for her self to be a widow, and for him to live single, and without a wife, than so to be mismatched as they were, and through the craven cowardise of others to languish and come to nothing. As for her self, if the gods had given her an husband according to her own quality and worthiness, she doubted not to see, and that very shortly, the Crown in her own house, that now she seeth in her fathers. In this manner possesseth she quickly the humorous young man, and filled his head with her own rashness and follies. Now when Aruns Tarquinius, and the elder Tullia, who died just in a manner both at one time, had well rid their own houses, and made way and overture for a new marriage, it was not long but they were married, with Servius his leave and connivency, rather than his good liking. But then every day more than other began Tullius to be a continuall mote in their eyes, his old age hatefull, and his raign more odious: for now the woman minded nothing but one mischief upon another: and would not suffer her husband to be at rest night nor day, lest peradventure the former murders done and past, should serve to no purpose, and mis the effect of their designments. And thus she brake out and said, That she wanted not before one that carried the name of an husband, with whom she served, and kept her self quiet and said nothing. "But she had a want of one, that thought himself worthy of a kingdom, that remembered he was the son of Tarquinius Priscus, that loved better to be seised of a Crown and scepter indeed, than hope for a kingdom, and hear thereof. But sir (quoth she) if you be the man to whom I take my self wedded, then I call you both husband and king: if not, then is our case changed for the worse, in that cowardliness is accompanied now with wickedness. Why resolve you not? why arm you not your self, and go about this business? you need not go so far as to Corinth or Tarquinius, for to seek and compass forrain kingdoms, as your father did. The gods of your own house and native country, the image and example of your father, the Kings Palace, and therein the royall seat and throne of estate, yea, the very name of Tarquin, createth, nameth, and saluteth you King. But an if your heart will not serve you to these designs, why bear you the world in hand and deceive them? why take you so upon you as you do, to shew your self as a kings son? Get you hence to Corinth again, away to Tarquinius, turn backward to your former stock and condition, more like to your brother than to your father. With these and such like motives, by way of reproof she checked the young man, set him on, and pricked him forwards, and she her self for her part, could be at no repose, for thinking that Tanaquil, an alien and stranger born, could contrive in her head, and effect to great a matter, as to make two kings together, one after other, namely, her husband first and afterwards her son in law: and she her own self, a Kings daughter, could bear no stroke either in giving or taking away a kingdom. Tarquinius kindled with these furies and temptations of a woman, went about, laboured, and made court to the Nobles, especially those that were Minorum gentium: oftentimes putting them in mind of the pleasures and favours that his father had done them, and requiring now of duty the like good turn at their hands. The young men, the flower and manhood in generall of the City, he wrought and won to himself with gifts: and so partly with great promises, what wonders would he do, and partly with raising slanders upon the King in all places, and charging upon him odious crimes, he grew very great and mighty. At the last, espying a convenient time to set on foot, and put in execution his intended projects, with a strong guard of armed men, he entred forcibly into the Forum or common place of assembly, whereat the people all surprized with great feare, he sat him down upon the Kings throne, even at the entrance of the Curia or Senate house, and there, by the voice of the crier summoned the Senators to counsell before King Tarquinus. Who forthwith there assembled together. Some, thereto made and prepared aforehand: others, for fear lest their not coming might turn them to displeasure. And as they were astonied at this strange and wonderful sight, so they thought Servius utterly undone, and his case desperate. There Tarquinus began an invective in spiteful & reproachful terms, touching the first pedigree or parentage of Servius: saying, that he being a slave, & born of a bond-woman, after the cruel and shamefull death of his father Tarquin, usurped the Kingdom: not by means of an Interregnum, as the order was aforetime, nor by a solemn assembly, and the free voices of the people, nor yet by the assent of the nobles, but only through the wile and fraud of one woman. And as he was (quoth he) thus born and thus created King, so hath he been a partial favourer ever of the basest sort, even such as himself; and in hatred of the noble birth of others hath divided amongst the vilest persons, lands taken from the chief men of the City; and all such burdens and charges, as had been in times past common to all, he hath cast upon great personages of quality and worth, and set up an assesseing or taxing, that the state of the wealthier persons being made known and exposed to envy, he might bring them into disgrace with the people, and bestow their goods upon the poorest and neediest at his pleasure. At midst this Oration of his came Servius in place, advertised of the matter by a fearful messenger in all haste. And presently began to cry out with a loud voice, at the very porch or entry of the Curia: "What is here ado, (quoth he) and what meaneth this O Tarquin? how darest thou during my life, assemble the Senators or sit on my seat? Whereunto he stoutly made a proud answer, that he did but keep his fathers throne, and being as he was, a Kings son, he deemed himself more worthy to be inheritor of the Kingdom than a bondslave: and as for him, he had been suffered long enough to play with his good Masters, and to insult over his betters. With this arose a great clamour from the partakers and complices of both sides: the people they ran from all parts to the Council-house, and like it was, that the stronger should be King. Then Tarquinus being put to his shifts, and forced to try the utmost, seeing no other remedy, took Servius by the middle, as being himself much younger and stronger far, carried him out of the Council-house, and threw him down from the stairs head to the foot, and so returned again into the Senate-house, to get the Senators together. The Kings Officers with the guard attending upon him, fled. Himself well near dead, with certain of his courtiers and train, breathless also for fear, made speed, and retired towards his Pallace, as far as to the top of Cyprius street, where he was overtaken by them that were sent by Tarquinus, and so slain outright. And it is verily thought, that this was done by the suggestion and procurement of Tullia; so little disagreeeth it from other wicked pranks of hers. But this one thing is known for certainty, that she came riding in her coach into the common place of assembly, and nothing dismayed or abashed at the presence of so many men, there met together, called forth her husband out of the Senate-house, and was the first that stiled him with the title of King. By whom she being willed to depart away out of that throng and uprore, as she returned homeward as far as the pitch of Cyprius street, where was of late a place consecrated unto Diana, called Dianium, the coachman that had the guiding and driving of the steeds, as he turned the chariot on the right hand up to the cliff Verbins, for to pass up to the hill Esquilia, suddenly staid for fear, and reined in his horses, and shewed unto his Lady and Mistis Servius lying there murdered. And hereof followed (as the report goeth) a beastly part, and beyond all sense of humanity, which the very place doth witness still at this day, called thereupon Sceleratus Vicus, i.e. the wicked street: wherein the raging and frantick woman Tullia, hurried with the furies, and haunted with the ghosts of her sister and husband, caused (men say) her chariot to be driven over her fathers dead corps; and being her self besprinkled and beraied with the bloody chariot, carried home with her some part of it in token and witness, that her hand was in this paricide and murder of her own father: to the end, that she might provoke her own domesticall gods and her husbands to wrath and displeasure: and so consequently, as they entred their reign with mischief and wickedness, they might soon after be turned out thereof with shame and infamy. Servius Tullius reigned four and fourty years, in such wise carrying himself, as it were hard, even for a good and staid Prince that should succeed him, to follow his steps. This made moreover for his glory and fame, that together with him died all right and lawfull government of Roman Kings. And even that regiment of his, so mild, so gracious, and temperate as it was: yet because it rested in the absolute power of one man, he was minded, as some do write, to have forgone and given over, had not this wicked intestine practise from his own family come between, to prevent and cut off his good designs and intent to set his country free.

killed.

After him began to reign Tarquinus, for his insolent acts surnamed Superbus, i.e. the proud. For he would not suffer his wives father (unkind son in law he) to be interred: saying oftentimes in jibing manner, that Romulus also died and was never buried. Moreover, the principall heads of his Peers and Nobles, such (as he thought) had favoured Servius his proceedings, and took part

A part with him, those he made away and flew. Afterwards, fearing upon the guilt of his own conscience, that he had given an ill precedent for others, to take vantage against himself, attaining to the Crown so lowly; he retained therefore a guard of armed men about his body: and in very truth, setting only might aside, no other right had he to wear the diadem, as who reigned neither by peoples election nor Senators approbation. Over and besides all this, to the end he might sit safely in his seat by servile fear and dread, who reposed no trust nor hope in the love of his subjects; therefore to strike the greater terror into them, and hold them in awe, he by himself alone without assistance of any counsell, sat upon all matters of life and death: by means whereof he was able to kill, banish, and condemn in forfeiture of lands and goods, not those only whom he suspected and hated, B but also them, from whom he could look for nothing else but spoil. Thus when he had decayed the number of the nobles especially, he purposed to chuse no new in their place, for to make supply: to the end, that the fewer they were, the more contemptible the whole order might grow: and with less discontent put up the indignity, that they were not employed in the State, nor ought done by their advice. For this King was the first that abolished the custome received and continued by all others afore him, of consulting with the Senate in all matters, & managing nothing without them. He governed the Commonweale by himself, and after his own waies: with whom it pleased him he made war and peace, league and society, even of his own head: & would break the same as himself thought good: thus he did, and undid all at his pleasure, without regard of the peoples mind, or the Senates authority. Above all, he sought to win the hearts and good wills of the Latine nation, that by support of forraign power also, he might be more secure and safe among his own people: neither entertained he with their Princes friendship and amity only, but entred also into alliance and affinity with them. For unto Ostivius Mamilius a Tusculan, he gave his daughter in marriage. This Mamilius was of all Latines the principall and noblest person, lineally descended (if we may beleve the common bruit and report) from Ulysses and Circe. By this marriage he gained many kinsfolk and friends of his new son in law. So that now Tarquinius was in great authority and reputation among the Lords and Barons of the Latines. Whereupon he gave them knowledge, and proclaimed, that upon a certain day they should all meet him at the sacred grove of Ferentina, to treat and commune together about matters concerning the common good of both States. Thither resorted they in great number betimes in the morning. And Tarquinius himself failed not for his D part to keep the very day appointed, but it was sunsetting well near before he came. There, in that assembly all day long before his coming, was much talk and reasoning, pro Et contra, touching him. Turnus Herdonius of Ardea, had inveighed spitefully against Tarquinius in his absence (for his being away) saying, "It was no marvel indeed that he was at Rome surnamed Superbus (for even then commonly they termed him so, although secretly, and in whispering wise.) For could there be (quoth he) a prouder part plaid, than this to mock delude and abuse the whole state of Latium, that when their princes and nobles were cited there to appear, far from the Cities and dwelling houses, he only should be absent that summoned the assembly? Which verily was but a device of his to try their patience, that if they once took the yoke, he might keep them still under as his vassals: for who seeth not what he reacheth at? even to command and Lord it over the E Latines. And in case his own Citizens have done well, in trusting him in the rule over them (if a man may say they trusted him, and not rather that he came foully and forcibly by it: even with shameful murder) the Latines also may put themselves into his hands with security. And yet I see not why they should so do, considering he is a meer stranger and alien. But how and if his own subjects repent, and are discontented with him, being one after another by him murdered banished, deprived, and spoiled of their goods? What better dealings may the Latines hope and look for? Therefore if they would be ruled by him, they should depart home every man, and not keep the day of the Diet no more than he doth that published and proclaimed it. Whilest this seditious and dangerous person, who by these and such like factious courtes was grown to be a great man and powerfull in his country, stood arguing thus, enforcing and following hard upon other F points, tending to the same effect, in cometh Tarquinius. Whereupon he brake off his speech, and all was hush. Then turned every man to salute and welcome Tarquinius: Who after silence made (being advised by some of his familiars that were next unto him, to excuse himself for coming at that time of the day) said that he had been taken to be an arbitrator or daiesman between the father and the son: and because he was desirous and carefull to procure an attonement between them, and to make them good friends: he made the longer stay and came the later. Which occasion of business seeing it had disappointed them of that day, therefore the morrow after he would deliver that which he had in purpose and intended to move unto them. But Turnus (as they say) could not hold, nor put up so much as this with silence: but brake out and said again, there was no speedier deciding and taking up of any matter, than between the father and the son: a thing that G might be dispatched in few words: for if he would not obey and give place unto his father, he should abide the smart of it with a mischief. And thus the Ardeine having girded as it were, and glanced at the Roman King, departed out of the Assembly. Which thing Tarquinius taking more displeasantly a good deal than he made semblance of, forthwith devised and practised to bring Turnus to his death, that he might strike the same terror into the hearts of the Latines, where-with he had kept under his own subjects at home. And for that he had no absolute power to cause him openly to be slain, he framed most falsely a criminall action against the guiltless man: thereby D 3 wrongwrongfully to work his destruction. By means of certain Aricians of a contrary faction, he wrought a bondslave of Turnus with a sum of money, to suffer a number of swords privily to be conveyed into his Masters Inn or Lodging: which being done in that one night accordingly, Tarquinus somewhat before day, sent for the chief Lords of the Latines to come unto him: and pretending as though he were frightened by some strange accident, said, "That his long tarrying the day before, (by Gods speciall providence, as it were, so appointed) was for the safety of him and them all. For he was informed that Turnus contrived to massacre both him and the heads of their nation, to the end that he alone might raign over the Latines: That he minded yesterday to have put this plot in execution, even in the very assembly; but the deed was deferred, for that himself (the principall author of that meeting) whose life he sought for above all other, was not in place; and hereupon it was (saith he) that he fared so as he did, and railed against him so bitterly the day before in his absence: for that he by his long tarrying had put him by his hope and the effect of his designs: and if all were true that was told him, he nothing doubted but early in the morning at break of the day, so soon as they were set in Councill together, he would come armed and well appointed with a crew of his adherents and sworn confederats: for reported it is, (quoth he) that a number of swords & other weapons are brought into his lodging; which whether it be so or no might soon be known. And therewith he desired them to take the pains to go with him thither. And verily, considering the proud nature and haughty spirit of Turnus, together with his yesterdaies Oration, and the long stay of Tarquinus besides, for that the pretended massacre seemed thereby to have been put off and prolonged, the matter became very suspicious, and pregnant. Thus go they with minds verily somewhat enclined and disposed to beleeve all, and yet so, as they would think all the rest but tales and lies, unless they found the swords aforesaid. Being come to the house, and Turnus awakened out of sleep, certain warders were set to keep him on every side: and when they had laid hold upon his servants, who for love of their Lord and Master began to make resistance, the swords were brought forth out of all the blind corners of the hostelry openly to be seen: then was it a clear case and past all peradventures: and Turnus was apprehended and irons clapt upon him. And immediately in all haste the Latines assembled together to councill in that great tumult and uproar: Where, upon bringing forth the swords in sight before them all, they were so incensed and deadly bent against him, that he was not suffered to answer and plead for himself, but was presently at the source or spring head of the Ferentine water plunged down, and a hurdle done aloft upon him, and great stones heaped thereon, and so after a new kind of death stifled and drowned. Tarquinus then, after he had called the Latines again to the place of councill, and much commended them for duly executing Turnus, who practising thus to alter and trouble the state, was detected of a manifest intended murder, made this speech unto them: "I might (quoth he) if I would, by vertue of ancient rites alledge and plead, that forasmuch as all the Latines are descended from Alba, they are comprised within that confederacy and league, whereby in the raign of Tullus the whole Commonweal and State of Alba, together with their inhabitants, became incorporate into the Empire of Rome. Howbeit, in regard rather of the commodity and weal-publike of all, I judge it requisite, that the league were renewed, and that the Latines might enjoy and be partakers of the prosperity and happy fortune of the people of Rome, rather than evermore to hazard and suffer the destruction and desolation of their Cities, with the spoiling and wasting of their lands, which first in Ancus daies they tasted, and after in my fathers time they had abidden & suffered. The Latines were hereto soon perswaded. And although in that league the preheminance and sovereignty rested in the Romans, yet they saw well enough that both the Heads and Rulers of the Latine Nation stood with the Roman King, and were wrought unto his hand, to side with him: and also Turnus unto them was a fresh precedent and example, to teach them what danger might betide every one that should make a part against him and cross his intention. So the alliance was renewed and proclamation made according as it was capitulated, that all the serviceable men of the Latines should at a day appointed repair in good number with their armour unto the grove of Ferentina. Who when they were there met together from all parts according to the Ediēt of the Roman King, to the end they should have no Captain of their own to lead them, no privy watchword or regiment by themselves to direct them, nor private ensigns distinct from the rest to keep them together: he shuffled or mingled the bands and companies of Latines and Romans one with another, making one of twain, and two of one: and when he had thus doubled the bands, he set Centurions over them. And albeit he was in peace an unjust Prince, yet was he in war no bad Captain: nay, for martiall prowess he had been equall to the former Kings, had he not failed and degenerated in other things, and thereby stained and hurt his glory even in that behalf. He was the first that warred upon the Volscians, which war after his time lasted more than 200 years: and wan from them by force Suessa Pometia. Where having made portsale of the pillage and raised as much gold and silver as amounted to 40 talents, he conceived in his mind to build so stately a Temple of Jupiter as might beseem the sovereign King of gods and men, become the noble Empire of Rome, and answer the Majesty also of the very place where it was to stand. And for the rearing and finishing of this Temple, he laid that money apart, that came of the spoil aforesaid. But presently upon this was he surprisid with a war that held longer than he hoped it would. For having made one assault in vain upon Gabin, a neighbour City to Rome, and despairing also of any good success by beleaguering the town,

A for that he was valiantly repulsed from the wals, at the last he devised and resolved to get it by wile and deceit: a course that Romans had not usually practised. For making as though he had given over and abandoned this war, as being now earnestly bent and busily occupied about laying the foundations of the Temple, and following other publike works in the City: Sextus his son, the youngest of three, fled on purpose to Gabii, complaining of his fathers intollerable rigour and cruelty against him: saying, "That now he had turned his accustomed pride from strangers upon his own bloud, and was grown to be weary of so many children: that as he had made good hand and clean riddance of his Nobles, and left the Senate desolate, so he might bring it to pass in his own house, to leave behind him no issue nor inheritor of the Kingdom. And for his own person

B "verily, he was escaped from among the pikes and swords of his father, and was perswaded fully, he might no where be sure in safety, but with the capitall enemies of L. Tarquinius. For to put them out of doubt, and that they might be no longer abused, the war continued still against them, which seemed in outward shew given over and laid away: and his father would not fail, but whensoever he could spy his vantage and fit opportunity, come upon them at unawares. But in case there were no place of refuge and protection for poor & humble suppliants amongst them, he would wander & travel all over Latium: and if he might not rest there, he would from thence go to the Volscians, Equians, and Hernicks, untill he came to them that knew how to save the children from the cruelty and inhumane persecution of the fathers. Perhaps he should find means to stir coals and kindle war, yea, and perform himself good service against that most proud

C King, and that most stout and insolent people. And seeming withall in great anger and discontentment, (if they would not regard his complaints) ready to depart and go his waies, he was kindly entertained and friendly entreated by the Gabians: "who willed him to be of good chear and not to marvell at all, that Tarquinius became now at length so ill affected against his own children, like as he had tyrannized already upon his subjects and confederats: for he would no doubt in the end exercise his fell stomach even upon himself, for want of other subject matter to work upon. And as to him, right welcome he was to them, assuring themselves that within a while it would so come to pass, that if he with them would set to his helping hand, they should remove the war from the gates of Gabii unto the very walls of Rome. After this was he admitted to sit with them in common counsell. In which he used oftentimes to say, "That in other matters he

D "gave place, and referred himself to be advised by the ancient Gabins, as men more practised and experienced than himself, but for the war, which ever and anon he perswaded them unto, himself took upon him a speciall insight and skill therein, as he that knew the strength of both nations, and was fully perswaded in his conscience, that the Kings pride must needs be odious to his subjects, which his very own children could not brook and endure. Thus whiles by little and little he solicited the principall Citizens to rebell, and went himself daily in person with a crew of the most forward and able young men, foraging spoiling, and making rodes into the Territory of the Romans, and that now through his words and deeds, which tended to fraud and deceit in the end, they began more and more to give credit unto him that one day would deceive them, he was at last choien Generall for the war. And having made certain small skirmishes between Rome and Gabes, in which for the most part the Gabins had the better (whiles the simple people, God wot, saw nor his drift and how he carried the matter:) then all the Gabins from the highest to the lowest, thought verily and in good earnest, that Sextus Tarquinius was sent them by speciall grace even from God above to be their Captain and Protector. But with the souldiers, what with attempting painfull enterprizes and performing dangerous service, and what with dealing prizes liberally amongst them, it passed how he grew into credit, and how dearly he was beloved: inso much as Tarquinius the Father was of no greater command at Rome, than Tarquinius the Son at Gabes. Thus when he saw he had gathered strength sufficient, and was fully furnished against all assaies; he dispatched unto his father at Rome, one of his trusty servants with credence, to know his will and pleasure, seeing that the gods had done him this grace, that he at Gabes was able to do all in all. To this message made the King no answer at all by word of mouth, taking the man belike, as I verily think, for one hardly to be trusted. But as one musing with himself and in a deep study what answer to shape, he went into a garden on the back side of the house, and his sons messenger followed after. There walked he up and down, and said never a word: only with his rod or walking staff, as it is reported, he knapt off the uttermost heads and tops of the poppies. The messenger weary with calling for an answer, and waiting such attendance, returned to Gabes as wise as he came, and without effect of his errand. He reported what he had said and seen, namely, how the King, whether upon anger or hatred, or pride ingrafted by nature, uttered no speech at all. But Sextus knowing by these mysticall and secret circumstances, his fathers will and direction, made no more ado but slew the chief of the Citizens: some by accusations unto the people, and others by reason of disgrace

G they were already in, and thereby exposed unto violence, were soon overthrowen. Many of them were openly executed, and some, whom there was little apparance or colour of justice or none at all to accuse, were secretly murdered. Divers of their own accord fled into voluntary exile, or else they were forced into banishment: whose goods as well as theirs that were put to death, were divided among the people. By sweetness of this largesse of spoil, by the profit and wealth that grew to private persons; the publike woe and calamity was nothing felt and seen: untill such time as the Gabins whole estate, despoiled of counsell, bereft of aid and succour, yielded without dint of sword unto the King of Rome.

Tarquinius having thus gained the town of Gates, made peace with the nation of the Equians, and renewed the league with the Tuscans. After this he converted his mind to the affairs of the City, among which this was the principall, to leave behind him the Temple of Jupiter, upon the mount Tarpeius, for a monument and memoriall of his raig and name. That of two Tarquins, Kings both, it might be said another day, that the father vowed it, and the son finished the same. And to the end that the floor and plot of ground, freed and exempted from all other kind of religions, might wholly be dedicated to Jupiter and his Temple, there to be built: he determined to exaugurate and to unhallow certain Churches and Chappels, which having been first vowed, by King Tatinus, in the very extremity of the battell against Romulus, were after by him consecrated and hallowed. In the very beginning and founding of which work, it is said, that the divine power and I sovereign deity, moved the gods to declare the future mightiness of so great an Empire. For when as the birds by signs out of the Augurs learning, admitted and allowed the exauguration and unhallowing of all other cels and chappels besides, only in that of Terminus, they gave no token to confirm the unhallowing thereof: which was taken for an ominous preface, and thus interpreted, That seeing the seat and house of Terminus was not stirred, and he the god alone that was not displaced and called forth of the limits to him consecrated; it shewed that all should remain there firm and stable for ever. This divine token of perpetuity being received for good and currant: there followed another strange and prodigious sign, portending the greatness also of the Empire. For as they digged for the foundation of the Temple, there appeared (as they say) a mans head, face and all whole and sound: which sight imported no doubt, and plainly foretold that it should be K the chief Castle of the Empire, and the Capitall place of the whole world. To this effect prophesied the wizards, as well they of the City, as those whom they sent for out of Tuscan, to know their opinion and judgment. Thus was the Kings mind all wholly set upon sumptuous building, and spared for no cost. So that the pillage taken at Pometia, which was laid by for the accomplishment of the whole work, would hard and scant serve for the very foundation. And therefore I would rather give credit unto Fabius Pictor (to say nothing that he is the more ancient author of the twain) that there were but * 40 talents; and no more, than to Piso, who writeth, that there was * 40000 pound weight of silver set by for that use. Which sum or mass of money could never be looked for to arise out of the sacrifice of one only City in those daies: and must needs exceed the charges of the foundation of any of these stately and magnificent buildings in this our age. The King being L thus wholly minded and bent to the finishing of the Temple, and sending for Carpenters, Masons, and other workmen, out of all parts of Tuscan, employed not only the Cities money and stock thereabout, but also had the work and labour of the common people withall. Which was no small toil of theirs, considering the travell of warfare besides: yet were they less aggrieved and discontented therewith, so long as they founded and reared with their own hands the Temples of the immortal gods. But afterwards were they employed and set to other works, which as they were less in shew, so were they more painful and of greater trouble, namely, the making of scaffolds or standing-places in the Cirque or Theater; and to the conveyance of a mighty great sinke or vault under the ground for to receive and carry away all the filth and corruption of the City. To which two pieces of work, scarcely is the magnificence of our new modern buildings, in any respect com- M parable. Having in this wise held the commons in continuall labour, because he thought that a multitude of people would but over-charge and pester the City, when they were not employed some way or other, and also minded by erecting Colonies, to enlarge the Confines of his Dominions, he therefore sent part of them to inhabit and people Signia and Circeii, two strong forts and frontier towns for the defence of the City by sea and land.

Whilest he was busied in these affairs, there appeared unto him a strange and fearfull sight, namely, a serpent gliding down a pillar of wood, which having put the beholders in great fright, and caused them to flie into the Kings palace, did not so much amaze the Kings heart with sudden and momentary fear for the present, as fill his head with perplexed cares what the thing might portend. Whereas therefore the manner was to use the Calchans and wise men of Tuscan about N publike prodigious tokens only: he being much troubled in spirit, and terrified at this fearfull sight, being domesticall, and as it were touching and concerning his own person: purposed to send out as far as Delphi to the most famous and renowned Oracle in the world. And for that he durst not put any other in trust with the answers that should be delivered by the fatall lots, he addressed two of his sons to take a voyage through unknown lands in those daies, and more unknown seas into Greece. Titus and Aruns were they that went this journey, having to bear them company all the way, L. Junius Brutus. This Brutus was the son of Tarquinia, the Kings sister, a young gentleman of a far other nature and disposition than he seemed in outward shew and semblance. He having heard say, that certain principall Citizens, and his own brother among, had been by this his uncle put to death: to the intent that himself might have nothing left, either in O the parts of his mind for the King to fear, or in his outward state for him to covet and desire: resolved under the cloak of base contempt to save himself, since that in right or justice he might repose small or no safegard at all. And therefore composing and framing himself of purpose to counterfeit a noddy and a very innocent, as suffering himself and all that he had to fall into the Kings hands as an echeat, he refused not to be misnamed Brutus, a name appropriate to unreasonable creatures; that under the shadow & colour of that surname, that courage of his lying close hid, which

- A which should one day set free the City of Rome, might abide the full time and appear in due season. This Brutus being by the Tarquins brought to Delphi, as their laughing stock to make them pastime by the way, rather than a meet mate to accompany them, carried with him (as men say) for to offer and present unto Apollo a golden rod within a staffe of cornell wood, made hollow for the purpose: the very type and resemblance by secret circumstances, of his naturall disposition. Thither being arrived, the young men having done their fathers commission accordingly, were very desirous and earnest to inquire and learn of the Oracle, which of them should be King of Rome. And from the bottom of the deep Vault, this answer, as men say, was delivered in their hearing: [Which of you (O young men) shall first kiss your mother, he shall bear chief and sovereign rule in Rome.]
- B The Tarquins then intending that Sextus their brother who was left behind at Rome, might neither know the answer, nor yet obtain the kingdom, willed the matter should by all possible means be carried so secret as might be, and concealed from him. They themselves agreed upon this together, to draw lots whether of them twain, when they were returned to Rome, should first kiss his mother. But Brutus supposing the speech of Apollo his Priest, tended to another sense, made as though he stumbled forward and took a fall, and so touched the ground with his mouth and kissed the earth, thinking this with himself, that she was common mother of all mortall men. Then returned they to Rome, where they found great preparation for war against the Rutilians.
- The Rutilians then were Lords of Ardea. A people in those parts, and for those times, very rich and wealthy: and that was it that gave the very occasion and was the first motive of war. The Roman King was desirous both to enrich himself, as having about the sumptuous building of publicke works emptied his coffers: and also by some spoil, to mollifie and win again the hearts of his naturall subjects: being much discontented (besides their generall dislike of his pride otherwise) at his manner of government; and disdaining greatly that they were by the King made labourers, to serve carpenters and masons, and held so long to servile toil and painfull labour. The Romans assailed at the beginning to surprize and win Ardea by assault: but when that way sped but ill, then began they to annoy and distress the enemies by laying siege, by casting trenches, raising forts, and fabricks about the town. During this siege, and the standing camp lying there, (as it falleth out commonly, when the war is rather long and late than hot and cruell) there were granted large licences and passports to and fro between the Camp and Rome, with much liberty: and yet more to the Principals of the Army than to the common Souldiers. And the Kings sons had otherwhile good leisure to feast and banquet one with another. Upon a time it hapned whiles they were drinking and making merry with Sextus Tarquinius in his pavilion, where Collatinus Tarquinius the son of Egerius sat at supper; there arose among other good table-talk, some arguing about their wives: whiles every man highly praised and wondrously commended his own. And growing to some heat and contention thereabout: There need not many words for this matter, quoth Collatinus, for in few hours it may be known how far my Lucretia surpasseth all the rest. And therefore if there be any lustiness and courage of youth in us, why mount we not on horseback, and in our own persons go and see the natures and dispositions of our wives? And as they shall be found and seen, taken of a sudden, and not looking for their husbands coming, so let every man judge of them, and set that down for the only trial of this controversie. They had all taken their drink well, and were prettily heat with wine: Mary, content say they all, and to horse they go, and away they gallop on the spur to Rome. Thither were they come by the shutting in of the evening when it grew to be dark; and so forward without any stay to Collatia they ride. Where they find dame Lucretia, not as the Kings sons wives, whom they had surprised and seen afore, passing the time away in feasting and rioting with their minions and companions: but sitting up far within the night in the midst of her house amongst her maidens, hard at wooll-work by candle-light. Whertupon, in this debate about their wives, the entire praise and commendation rested in Lucretia: Her Husband and the Tarquins had a loving and courteous welcome at her hands. And he again for joy of the victory, invited the Kings sons kindly and made them friendly cheare. There at that instant Sextus Tarquinius was bewitched and possessed with wicked wanton lust, for to offer violence and villany unto Lucretia: her passing beauty and her approved chastity set him on fire and provoked him thereto. But for the present, when they had disported themselves all night long like lusty and pleasant youths, they returned betimes in the morning to the Camp. A few daies after, Sextus Tarquinius, unwitting to Collatinus, attended with one only man came to Collatia, where he was again in good and friendly sort received by them in the house, that suspected nothing less than that whereabout he was come. And being after supper brought up into the guest chamber, when he thought all about him sure, and that every body was fast asleep, all set on fire and burning in love, he steppeth with naked sword in hand to Lucretia, as she lay sleeping full soundly, and bearing down the womans brest with his left hand, Peace (quoth he) Lucretia & not a word: I am Sextus Tarquinius, I have my drawn sword in hand: if thou once speak thou shalt surely die. The silly woman thus starting out of sleep, was sore affright, as seeing no remedy but in a manner present death, in case she had cried for help. Then uttered Tarquinius and confessed his amorous passion, tell to entreat and entreat again, and with his prayers intermedled threats, and went every way about her, not ceasing by all means to sit, to sound and tempt the womans heart. But when he saw her obstinate and invincible, and (to die for it) not relenting one jot; then, besides the fear of death, he presented unto her dishonour and shame: pretending pretending that after he had massacred her, he would lay by her side in naked bed, her own man-servant with his throat cut; that it might be voiced abroad, that she was taken and killed in filthy adultery. For fear of this reproach and infamy, see how sinfull lust gat the victory, and conquered constant chastity: and Tarquinius in great pride and jollity, that he had by assault won the fort of a womans honour, departed thence. But wofull Lucretia, all sorrowing for so heavy a mischance, dispatched a messenger to her father at Rome, and so forward to her husband at Ardea, with this errand: That they should come unto her, each of them with one faithfull and trusty friend, and hereof they must not fail, but make all the speed they could, for that there was befallen a grievous chance and horrible. So there repaired to her Sp. Lucretius her father, accompanied with P. Vale-rius the son of Volusus: and Collatinus her husband, with L. Jun. Brutus. Who both together by chance going back to Rome, encountred in the way his wives messenger. Lucretia they found sitting alone in her bed-chamber, all heavy and sad: and she at the coming of these her dearest friends, shed tears and wept apace. How now my dear (quoth her husband) is all well? "No God wot sir,

"lot live a day: & thus having said, with a knife which she had close hidden under her cloaths, she "stabbed her self to the heart, and sinking down forward, fell upon the floor ready to yeeld up the "ghost. Out alas, cried her husband and father hereat: and whilest they two were in their plaints and moans, Brutus drew forth the knife out of the wound of Lucretia, & holding it out afore him, L all embued and dropping with bloud, "Now I swear (quoth he) by this bloud, by this most chaste
"and pure bloud, before the villany wrought by the Kings son, and here before the gods I protest,
"whom I call to witness, that I will by fire and sword, and with all my might and main persecute
"and drive the country of L. Tarquinius the proud, and his ungracious wife, and the whole brood "of his children, and suffer neither him nor any else for his sake to raige as King at Rome. Then gave he the knife to Collatinus, and so to Lucretius & Valerius, who greatly amazed at this so strange occurent, and wondring how it came to pass, that Brutus should of a sudden be so changed, and become so stout of stomach and couragious, took the same form of oath that he sware afore: and so leaving their wailing and lamentation, and wholly set upon anger and revenge, they followed Brutus as their Captain and Leader to put down and overthrow the government of Kings, and utterly to root out their race. The dead corps of Lucretia, was had out of doors, brought into the market place, and there shewed. And thither, what with wondring (as the manner is) at so strange a sight, and what with the indignation of so unworthy a fact, they raised much people together.
Every man for his part was ready enough to complain of the wickedness and violence done by the Kings bloud. The sorrow of Lucretius the father on the one side, the resolution of Brutus on the other side, who rebuked and blamed all vain weeping and foolish moaning, moved and perswaded all that were present, that like men of valour, like true hearted Romans, they would take arms against them that demeaned themselves no better, nay, worse than ordinary enemies. And presently, the bravest and tallest young men shewed themselves forward, ready in armour, and voluntary. The rest of the youths followed streight after. And having left at Collatia the one half of their forces in garrison, toward the gates, and set certain watches, that no man brought tidings or news unto the King and his sons, of this rising and commotion, all the other were appointed in warlike manner, followed their leader Brutus, from thence directly to Rome. At the sudden coming thither of this armed multitude: no marvell if all the way whereas they passed and marched, there arose a fear and trouble among the people. But when they perceived the most substantiall and principall Citizens in the forefront, they judged whatsoever the matter meant, it was not for naught. And verily this hainous fact disquieted the minds of men no less at Rome, than it had before at Collatia. Therefore from all parts of the City there was flocking and running into the market place. And being thither come, the Bedell or common Crier, summoned the people to appeare before the Tribune of the Celeres or Captain of the guard: which office haply Brutus bare at that time. Where O he made an Oration, not proceeding from that spirit, nor resembling that quality of nature which unto that day he had pretended and made shew of unto the world, for he inveighed against the violence and filthy lust of Sextus Tarquinius; the shamefull villany and not to be named, done upon the body of Lucretia: "he discoursed of her lamentable end and pitious death, and "the desolate case of Tricipitinus, bereft now of all his children: who accounted the occasion of "his daughters death a greater indignity, and more pittifull, than her very death. Moreover he "laid

A^l laid abroad the pride of the King himself, the miseries, the infinite toyle and paines of the Commons, buried as it were under the ground, with cleaning and casting of ditches, voiding and farming of the flocks. Saying, that the men of Rome, which were the conquerers of all nations about them, were now of warriors become quarriers, hewers of stone and day-laborers. He reckoned up also and put them in mind of the unworthy death and cruel murder of Servius Tullius: and how his daughter (of abominable act) rode over the corpse of her father in her cursed chariot: And herewith he calleth on the gods that are revengers of outrages and wrongs done to parents. Thus rehearsing these and other matters, much more grievous and horrible, (I verily beleieve) according as the present indignity at the very time doth minister and give utterance for, not so easily happened and set down by whiskeys that come after. he so mightily inflamed the multitude, that he caused them to depose the King, to deprive him of his royall state and dignity, yea, and to decree and enact, that L. Tarquinius with his wife and children should be banished for ever. Himself having selected and armed the younger gallants who offered their service, and willingly entered their names, set forward in person to the Camp lying before Ardea, for to excite the Army there against the King: leaving the government of the City unto Lucius Junius Brutus, who had, before been appointed Deputy and Lieutenant there, by the King. In this time of garboile, Tullia left the palace and fled, and all the way as she went, both men and women cursed and cried out upon her, and brought the ghostly spirits and furies of parents to be avenged. When news hereof was brought into the Camp, and that the King upon these strange tidings made haste towards Rome, to stay and suppress these broyles: Brutus having intelligence of his coming, turned another way because he would not meet with him. And so at one instant in a manner by contrary journeys came Brutus to Ardea and Tarquinius to Rome. But the gates were shut against Tarquinius, and instead of entrance, warned he was, and commanded into exile. The whole Camp received with joy Brutus the redeemer of their City. From thence were also the Kings sons driven: two of them followed after their father and departed into banishment unto Cere, a town of the Tuscans: as for Sextus Tarquinius, he retired himself to Gabes as it were into his own Kingdom: where he was murdered in revenge of old quarrels, upon malice and hatred of the people which he had brought upon himself in times past. L. Tarquinius Superbus reigned 25 years. Thus continued the Kings Regiment at Rome, from the foundation of the City, unto the freedom and redemption thereof 244 years. Then in a solemn assembly and election by the Centuries, held by the Provost of the City, according to the ordinance of Sextus Tullius in his Commentaries, two Consuls were created: L. Junius Brutus and L. Tarquinius Collatinus.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the Second Book.

Brutus took an oath of the people, that they should not suffer any to reign King at Rome. He compelled his fellow Consul Tarquinius Collatinus, a suspected man to take part with the Tarquins, by reason of the affinity he had with them, to give over the Consulship, and to depart the City. The goods of the King and his sons he commanded to be seized upon, and rifled. A field of theirs he consecrated to Mars, which was named afterwards Campus Martius, or Mars field. He beheaded certain young Gentlemen of the Nobility together with his own and his brothers sons, for conspiring to receive the King and his Complices again into the City. Unto the bondslave Vindicius, that betrayed the complot, he gave his freedom, of whom Vindicta took the name. Having led an Army against the King, who had assembled a power of Veientians and Tarquinians, and made war, he died in battell together with Aruns, the son of Superbus: and for his death the dames of Rome mourned one whole year. P. Valerius the Consul propounded and made a Law concerning Appealing unto the people. The Capitol was dedicated, Porcena King of the Clusins, warring in the quarrell of the Tarquins, and being come to the Janiculum, was by the valour of Cocles Horatius, impeached: that he passed not the Tyber: who alone, whiles others bewied down the Sublician bridge, withstood the Tuscans: and when it was broken down, leapt armed as he was into the river, and swam over to his fellows: Another example of manhood is reported of Mutius, who being entered the Camp of the enemies with full intent to kill Porcena, and having slain his principall Secretary, whom he took for the King, was apprehended: and thrusting his hand into the fire of the Altars, whereupon they had burned sacrifice, suffered it there to fry untill it was consumed: and said withall, that there were behind him three hundred more besides, that had sworn the death of the King himself. Who wondering at their resolution, was driven to offer conditions of peace, and upon taking of hostages to give over war: amongst whom, one virgin Clotia, beguiled her keepers, made an escape, and swam over Tyber to her friends: and being rendered again, was by Porcena sent honorably home, and had her her statue or image on horseback set up for a memoriall. Ap. Claudius abandoned the Sabins, and fled to Rome, of whom the Tribe Clauſia took the name, and was added to the rest. The number of tribes was encreased to be one and twenty. Against Tarquinius Superbus, who with a power of Latines waged war, A. Poſthumius the Dictator, obtained a prosperous battell at the lake Regillus. The Commons rising, for being enthralled unto their Creditors, retired themselves into the mount Sacer, and were by the policy and counſil of Menenius Agrippa, reclaimed from their ſedition, and appeased. The same Agrippa being deceased, was by reason of his poverty, buried at the Cities charge. There were created five Tribunes of the Commons. Corioh, a town of the Volſcians, was taken by the valour and industrious means of Cn. Martius, who thereupon was surnamed Coriolanus. T. Latinus, a mean Commoner, was warned in a dream to make relation to the Senate of certain religious ceremonies: and for neglecting the same, lost his son, and fell himself to be lame of his limbs, and being brought in the Senate in a chair, after he had declared the same, returned sound on his feet home again. Cn. Martius Coriolanus, after he was banished, became Generall of the Volſcians, and with an Army of enemies approached the City of Rome: unto whom, first Embassadors were of purpose sent, and afterwards the Priests and whole Clergy perswaded with him, not to make war against his native Countrey, but all in vain. Howbeit Veturia his mother, and Volumnia his wife entreated him and obtained, that he should depart back again. The Law Agraria, concerning division of lands among the poor Commons, was now first put up and proposed. Sp. Cassius an Alderman, after he had been Consul, was condemned for aspiring to be King, and suffered death therefore. Oppia a Vestall Nun was for incest buried quick. Against the Veientians near enemies and ill neighbors, yet indeed troublesome rather than noisome and dangerous, the house alone of the Fabii, required to be employed in service: and set out three hundred and six armed men to the field, who every one were by the enemies slain near the river Cremera, and left but one only at home alive of that name, under fourteen years of age. Ap. Claudius the Consul having fought unfortunately against the Volſcians, and that, by means of the stubbornness and unwilliness of his Army, cudgelled every touch man of his soldiers. Over and besides (this book) containeth the exploits against the Volſcians, Equians, and Veientians, and the seditious discords between the Nobility and Commons.

The Second Book of T. Livius.

NOW will I describe from henceforth, the acts both in war and peace of the people of Rome, a free state now from this time forward: their yearly Magistrates and Governours: the authority and rule of Laws, more powerfull and mighty than that of men. Which freedom of theirs, the last Kings pride made more acceptable and welcome. As for the other Kings before him, they reigned so, as that they might be counted all of them, and that worthily, builders of sundry parts of the City one after another, according as they every one by himself added still one new place or other, for the multitude by them encreased to inhabit. Neither is it to be doubted, but that even the very same Brutus, who deserved so great honor and glory for expelling the proud King Tarquin, should have done the same to the exceeding danger of the weal publique, if for desire of unripe and untimely freedom, he had wrested the royall dignity and government from any of the former Princes. For what would have come of it, if that communalty consisting of herdmen and fugitive strangers, resorting out of their own countries there to dwell, having under protection of a sanctuary and privileged place gotten liberty, or at leastwise impunity; being now freed and past fear of a royall Majesty, had begun to be troubled and disquieted, with the ruffling storms and seditious tempests of the Tribuns, and in a new and strange City sown debate, and entertained variance with the Nobility, before that the surest pledges of wives and children, the dearest affection of the very place and soil, which requireth long time of liking and loving, had united and knit their hearts together? Certainly, the state not yet come to full growth and maturity, had by discord faded and come to nought, which a peaceable and gracious government cherished and fostered, and by cherishing and nourishing brought to that pass, that now being come to ripeness and perfection of strength, it might be able to bring forth and bear the good and wholsom fruits of liberty.

The beginning of this freedom you must account in regard hereof, That the Consulary regiment was annual, and from year to year, rather than that the royall power and jurisdiction that the Kings had, was any whit abated and diminished. For the first Consuls had the same absolute authority, held all the former royalties, and retained still the regall ensigns and ornaments of supreme dignity. This only provided that they should not both have the rods born before them, for avoiding a twofold fear and dread of their Majesty. Brutus with the good liking and consent of his companion in office, had the preheminance and prerogative of that honour to be done unto him alone: who had not been aforetime a greater instrument, and more forward to procure and recover the liberty than he was afterward a sure maintainer and protector of the same. And first above all other things, whilst the people were yet greedy of this new freedom, for fear lest they might any time after be won by entreaty or moved by gifts on the Kings part, he caused them to swear that they would never suffer any to be King at Rome. After this, because the Senate might be of more power and greater reputation, by the frequent company of that degree and order: he encreased their number (which had been impaired much by massacres, committed by the said King) to the full complement of three hundred: by choosing the chief and principall of the degree of Knights

A Knights or horsemen. And hereof came, as they say, this custome, to admit into the Senate both them that were before time of the ancient Nobility, and also those that were newly chosen for the supply: naming these that were last enrolled, the new Senate. And a wonder it was to see, how much good this did to the concord of the City, and to the knitting of the hearts of Nobles and Commons together.

This done, they went in hand with Religion and Church-matters: and for that there were certain publike sacrifices that had been usually executed by the Kings themselves in their own persons: lest therefore they should not find the mis of Kings in any respect, nor long after them again, they create of purpose a King-Priest or sacrificer: which sacerdotall dignity they ordained to be under the Arch-Prelate, lest that this new addition and title of honour, might prejudice their freedom any jot, whereunto they had then a special regard above all other things. And I wot not well, but I think verily they went beyond all measure, and were over-precise in the maintenance and strengthening thereof every way, even in the smallest trifles, and toies of no moment. For when as nothing else was offensive unto them, the name forsooth of one of their Consuls became suspected and odious unto the City, without any other scandall whatsoever. And thus they murmured and said, "That the Tarquinius had reigned over-long, and too much already: that Priscus first

C "began, and when after him succeeded King Servius Tullius, Superbus Tarquinius not having in that time and space between, forgot the Kingdom, as seeing another invetted therein: by wicked practice and violence claimed and recovered the same again, as the inheritance properly to his house belonging. And now that Superbus is driven out and gone, the rule and government is devolved unto Collatinus, and there resteth. These Tarquins belike (say they) cannot skill how to live as private men: giving out among, that the very name was dangerous to a free State, and in one word, they could not endure it. These and such like speeches at first were whispered abroad throughout all the City, by them that under-hand sounded by little and little the hearts and dispositions of men: and when these surmises & suspitions were once buzzed into the Commons heads, and they thereby disquieted, Brutus called them to a generall assembly. Where first and formost he reciteth the oath of the people, That they should suffer none to be a King, nor ought else in Rome, from whence might arise any danger to their liberty. "This oath is the thing (quoth he) that

D "with all diligence, & by all means possible is to be maintain'd, & nothing thereto appertaining is to be despised and lightly regarded. As for me, I am unwilling to speak, in respect of the person, neither would I speak at all, but that the love and affection to the Common-weal doth overrule me. The people of Rome is not thoroughly perswaded, that they have recovered their entire and perfect liberty. For as yet the Kings bloud, yea, and the Kings name, not only remaineth still, but also beareth soveraign rule in the City: This is it that hurteth, this is it (I say) that hindered their true freedom. Now (quoth he) L. Tarquinius willingly of your own accord rid them of their fear. We remember well, we confesse and acknowledge, you it was that expelled the Kings. Finish therefore and perfect this great benefit of yours: take away from hence the Kings name also. As for your goods and substance, your Citizens and Countymen, if they will be advised by me, shall not only yeeld unto you again, but if ought be short and wanting, shall by my

E "consent supply the same to the full right liberally. Depart I say, and friendly take your leave: deliver the City and disburden them of this their fear, that peradventure is but vain and needles: Howbeit, this their minds give them, that together with the stock and house of the Tarquins, the Kings rule and government will likewise void and depart for ever. The Consul at this so strange and sudden a motion, first wondred much, and was not able to open his mouth. But afterwards as he addressed himself and began to make a speech, the heads of the City came about him, and with many prayers besought the same at his hands. As for all the rest, they prevailed full little with him. But after that Sp. Lucretius, a more grave and elder man than himself, of greater worth aforetime, and his father in Law besides, took him in hand and dealt with him sundry waies, one while by way of intreaty, otherwhiles by perswasions and reasons, that he would condescend unto that which the City in one general consent required: then the Consul searing lest hereafter being once out of his place and a private man again, he should chance to be forced thereunto, with the loss of his goods and some disgrace perhaps besides; resigned up the office of the Consulship, and removing all that he had away to Lavinium, quit the City and departed. Then Brutus by an act and decree of the Senate, proposed unto the people, That all the race and lineage of the Tarquins should be exiled. And in a generall Session of the Centuries, he created for to be his Colleague in government, P. Valerius, by whose assistance he had driven out the Kings.

No man doubted now that the Tarquins were about to take arms: yet that war hapned not so soon as men looked for: but see (a thing that no man feared) they had like by fraud and treason at home to have lost and forgone their freedom again. There was of the flower of Rome, certain youths, & those of no low degree nor base parentage descended, who in the Kings daies had lived like young Princes more loosely and at pleasure, as companions and playfellows with the young Tarquins, the Kings sons: who seeking to enjoy the same licentious life still, in this equality of estate wherein all others then lived, made moan and complained one to another, That the liberty of others turned to their servitude. "The King, say they, is a man, at whose hands one might obtain somewhat, as need required, were the cause right or were it wrong: where a man might find favour and friendship, as who could both be displeased and angry, and also forgive and remit a

"fault, and knew well how to make difference between a friend and a foe. As for laws, they are H "things deaf and inexorable: more wholsome and commodious to the poor than to the rich and
 "mighty, affording no release nor pardon, if one chance to trespass and transgress: And a ticklish
 "point it is and perilous for a man among so many errors whereto our frailty is subject, to bear "himself only upon his innocent life. Being thus of their own accord already discontent, suddenly unlooked for, there came Embassadors from the Kings, who without any mention at all of return, demanded only their goods again. Upon their message being delivered and heard in the Senate-house, this debate and question held them for certain daies in councill, fearing lest that the goods not restored might minister occasion of quarrell, and being rendred, yield maintenance and nourishment of war. In the mean time the Embassadors dealt and treated with divers persons diversly: in open shew, claiming only their goods, but secretly and under-hand, contriving how to compass the Kingdom for their Masters. And under colour of procuring friends for the accomplishment of that which they pretended, and was in question, they sounded oftentimes the minds of certain noble young Gentlemen, how they stood affected to their designments. Whose words and reasons were of them gently entertained: and thereupon they delivered unto them letters from the Tarquins, and withall conferred together, and practised the receiving of the Kings privi-ly by night into the City. The execution of this plot was principally committed to certain of the Vitellii and Aquilii, that were brethren. A sister of the Vitellii was married unto the Consul Bru- tus, by whom he had two sons that were youngmen, Titus and Tiberius, whom their uncles by the mothers side made partakers with them likewise of their counsell. Besides, there were divers K young Gentlemen (whose names long time hath worn out quite) made acquainted therewith. In this mean season, their opinion in the Senate-house prevailed, who thought it best that the goods should be restored: and the Embassadors upon that occasion made stay in the City, for that they had gotten time of the Consuls to provide carriage for to have away the Kings stuff, and other movable goods. All that time spent they in consulting with the Conspirators, and so importunately laboured them, untill they had procured their letters also unto the Tarquins: for otherwise (say they) how will they beleieve but that their Embassadors make wrong report of matters so important. The giving of those letters in pledge of their truth and plain meaning, proved to bewray and reveal their purposed enterprise. For the day before the Embassadors were to take their leave, and return to the Tarquins, they fortun'd to sup with the Vitellii: and whilst the conspira- L tors there, were in sad and close talk together, conferring at large about this new devised practise, and no man by but only themselves (as the manner is:) a certain bondslave chanced to overhear them, one that before had an inkling whereabout they went, but waited the opportunity when the letters should be given to the Embassadors, which being found upon them, might directly prove the treason. This slave after he understood the letters were delivered, gave intelligence of all unto the Consuls: who immediatly departed from their houses to take the Embassadors, and the Conspirators in the manner, and without any stir or tumult light upon them unawares, and dashed all. But of the letters they had a speciall care, that they should be forth-coming and not miscarry. And committing the traitors forthwith to prison, they made some pause and doubt about the Embassadors, what to do with them. For albeit they seemed to have deserved no less M but to be used as enemies, and to have no favour at all, yet had they regard to the law of Nations.
 Now concerning the Kings goods, which they thought meet before to be restored, the matter came about wholly in question again before the Senators: who being overcome with ire and indignation, denied flatly the rendring of them, yea, and forbad they should be confiscate and converted to the common treasury: but they were given away among the Commons to make spoil and havock thereof: to the end, that they having one touched or seised on the Kings goods as a booty, might for ever after be past all hope of any peace or favour with them. The field of the Tar- quins lying between the City and Tyber, was consecrated unto Mars, and after called Campus Mar-
tii. i.e. Mars field. It hapned (as men say) that there was at that time standing corn there, now ripe and ready for the harvest: which crop of ground, because they made some scruple of consci- N ence otherwise to consume, therefore it was cut down, corn, straw, stubble and all, and a great number of people sent thither at once to carry it away in baskets and skeps, and pour it down the Tyber, running then but shallow, as it useth to do in the midst and heat of Summer. And so the heaps of corn, together with the mud stuck still and rested in the ebbe places and foords of the river: and by little and little encreased with one thing or other that came down the stream, untill it became an Island. Afterwards, I suppose, there were dams and piles made thereunto, and by mans hand it grew so high, and so firm a piece of ground, that it was able to bear even Temples and stately Galleries that stood thereupon.

The conspiracy detected.

Campus Martii.
i.e.

When the Kings goods were thus spoiled, rifled, and made away, the traitors were condemned and put to death. Which suffering of theirs was the more notable, for that the father by his place O & vertue of his office was bound and charged to see execution done upon his own own children:
 and he who otherwise ought not to have been a spectator and looker on, even he (such was his fortune) was forced of necessity to be the principall actor in this tragicall execution. Then stood these most noble youths bound fast to a stake. But among all, the Consul his children, turned upon them the eyes of every man, from all the rest, as unknown persons and of no reputation:
 all men pitied them, not so much for being punished, as for deserving by their fact to be punished:

A punished: That they could find in their hearts and once let enter into their thought, to betray into the hands of Tarquinius, sometimes a proud Prince, and then a cruell enemy, and banished rebell, their native countrey, lately and in that very year set free from captivity: their naturall father who set it free: the Consulship sprung first out of the family of the Juni: the Nobles, the Commons, and in one word, all things whatsoever in Rome belonging either to God or man. Then came the Consuls forth, took their places and set them down on the tribunall seat. The Licitors were sent to do their office, who first stripped them naked and scourged them with rods, and then with an axe chopt off their heads. All which time, the father himself, his countenance and visage was a wonderfull spectacle to behold; considering how a fathers affection could hold out and abide the performance of this publike and exemplary punishment. When the offenders had once suffered, to the end there might be shewed noble examples on both sides, for to debar wickedness, and stop the course of sin: the informer and revealer of treason, had for his reward a peece of money out of the common treasury, obtained his freedom, and was enfranchised a Citizen of Rome. This was the first man, as they say that was made free by the rod Vindicta: for that the party his name was Vindictus, from whence, as some think, the word Vindicta was derived: after whom, this was observed, That whosoever in that sort got their freedom, were suppoled withall ended.

The traitors executed,

Brutus putteth to death his own children.

When tidings hereof came to Tarquinius, with the manner of proceeding in every circumstance, he not only grieved that so great hope of his was frustrate and come to nothing, but also was set on fire with hatred and indignation: and seeing the way shut up and stopped against all deceitfull courses, he thought there was no dealing now but by meer force and open war. Whereupon he went up and down, solicited and made humble suit unto the Cities of Etruria, and besought the Veientians especially, and the Tarquinians, that they would not suffer him, being come of their own bloud, a banished man, forlorn, poor, and needy, dispossessed so lately of so goodly a Realm and Kingdom, together with his children (forward young men) to perish even before their eyes. "Alledging that others had been sent for and set out of forraign parts unto Rome for to be Kings: and he their Liege King, and such an one as advanced still the Roman Empire by martiall prowesse, was by the wicked conspiracy of his nearest kinsfolk and friends deposed from his imperiall dignity and expelled: and they now, because there was no one man thought sufficient and worthy to raize, had parted between them the Kingdom, and given among the people his goods as a spoil: that there might not be any one who had not his finger, and whole hand in so foule a fact. Saying moreover, that his mind and intention was, to seek means to return into his own countrey, to recover his Crown, yea, and to persecute, and to be revenged of those unthankfull subjects: and therefore prayed them, to set to their helping hand, and yield him assistance: and not to sit down with so many old wrongs of their own part received, namely their legions so often hewen in pieces, their lands and livings taken from them: but to go with him for revenge. These suggestions moved the Veientians, and every man for himself muttered and gave out in threatening wise, that now at length, having a Roman Captain especially to be their Leader, they were to do away the foul dishonours sustained, and win again what by former war they had lost. As for the Tarquinians, they were soon incited in regard of name and consanguinity, and thought it was a godly matter and an honour unto them, to have of their own name and house to be Kings of Rome. Thus two armies of two Cities banded with Tarquin, for to restore him to his Kingdom again, and to make sharp war upon the Romans: who being entred the Territory of Rome, were met with by the Roman Consuls. The footmen marched under the conduct of Valerius, marshalled in a battallion four square. Brutus with the horse went before to espy and discover the coasts: In like sort the men of arms of the enemies rode formost under the leading of Aruns Tarquinius the Kings son, and the King himself in person followed with the Legions. Aruns espying by the Licitors, the Consul afar off, and as he approached nearer, knowing Brutus more certainly by his face, all inflamed with ire: "This is the Gallant (quoth he) this is he, that hath driven and banished us out of our native Countrey. Lo, how bravely he setteth forward, all gorgeously to be seen and dight in our royall ensigns and ornaments. Now help ye gods that are revengers of wrongs done to Kings: and therewithall set spurs to his horse, and ran amain with full career upon the Consul his own person, intending certainly to speed him. Brutus perceived likewise that he made directly toward him: (Now was it a noble and worthy fight for the Captains themselves to begin the battell.) Whereupon with resolute courage he encountreth him. And so fiercely they charged one another, and so deadly were they bent, that neither of them had regard to save himself, so he might wound and mischief his enemy, but were both with a counterpunch that quite pierced their targets run into the sides, and thrust through, and so having one anothers lance sticking in their bodies, fell from their horses ready to dye. Herewith began on both sides the other horsemen to fight, and within a while the footmen also seconded them. And so equally were they matched, and the battell so indifferently fought, that it was very doubtfull whether side had the better. For on both parts the right wings got the upper hand, and down went the left. The Veientians, unto whom it was no news to be overcome of Romans, were discomfited and put to flight. But their new enemies the Tarquinians, not only held their own and stood to it, but also from their battell put back, and forced the Romans to give ground, and gave them the repulse. After this conflict there fell such a fear and terrour upon Tarquinius, and the Tuscans, that both Armies as well of the Vei- entians as the Tarquinius, gave over their enterprise with doing just nothing, and by night dislodged and departed every man to his own home. This battell was more notable by reason of certain miracles that men report: namely, that in the dead time of the night next following, when all were at rest, there was heard a mighty voice of Sylvanus (as men thought) out of the wood Ar-fia to utter these words, [That there was slaine on the Tuscans part more by one, and that the Romans won the field.] Thus verily and no otherwise departed they asunder: the Romans as winners, and the Tuscans as having the worse. For the next morrow, so soon as it was day, and that none of the enemies appeared in sight, P. Valerius the Consul gathered up the spoil together, and returned from thence with triumph to Rome, and performed the funerals of his brother Consul, in all sumptuous manner and solemn pomp, as possibly at that time he could devise. But, that which did him the greatest honour after his death, was the publike sorrow and heaviness of the City, in this respect above all singular and memorable, for that the dames and Matrons of Rome mourned a whole year for him, as for their own father, in that he had been so sharp a revenger of violence done to the chastity of women.

After this, the Consul that survived, presently upon the great liking and favour that he was in (see how wavering and unconstant the minds are of the common people) was not only envied, but also suspected, yea, and charged with an odious and horrible crime. The voice went and bruited it was abroad, that he aspired to the Crown. And why? because, forsooth, he had not chosen unto him a new fellow Consul in the room of Brutus: and began to build aloft on the top of Velia, K where (say they) in an high place and strongly scituate he may make a Castle impregnable. These things commonly spoken and credited too, vexed much, and mightily grieved the Consul in his very soule, as a great indignity offered unto him. Whereupon he assembled the people together, & causing the rods to be held downwards to the ground, went up into the pulpit to make an Oration unto them. That sight pleased the people passing well, taking it for a plain demonstration, that the marks and ensigns of rule and government submitted unto them, was a very acknowledging and confession that the people was of greater majesty and power than the Consul. Where after silence made, and commandment to hearken and give ear, "the Consul began highly to ex- toll the fortune and good hap of his Colleague deceased, who having with great honour set his "Country free, ended his daies, fighting manfully in defence of the Weal-publike, even in the L "prime, height, and best time of his glory, ere that he became subject unto envy: but he himself "outliving it, remained alive, exposed unto criminous slanders and spitefull malice of men, and "of a deliverer and redeemer of his Countrey was now reputed no better than the Aquilii and "Vitellii. And will you never indeed (quoth he) approve the vertuous and honest conversation of "a man so well, but it shall be tainted with unjust suspicion? What? would any man think, that I "being so fierce and fell an enemy of the Kings, should ever feare to incur the jealousie of men, for "seeking to be King? What if I dwelt on the top of Tarpeie cliff, even in the very Capitoll, "should I beleeve and think it possible, that my countrymen, neighbours, and Citizens, would "stand in fear of me? and will so small a matter as this turn the ballance of your opinion and "conceit of me? Is your affiance and confidence in me grounded so slightly, and standeth it upon M "so nice terms and ticklish points, that you force more and make greater reckoning of my dwelling place, than of the quality of my person. Well, P. Valerius his house shall be no hindrance or "impeachment unto your liberty, O Quirites, ye shall not need to feare any harm from Velia for me. "I will remove my house not only down into the plain, but even to the valley under the hill foot, "that you may dwell above me, and overlook me (a suspected Citizen.) Let them a gods name "build in Velia, who may be better trusted with the Cities freedom than P. Valerius. Then was immediatly the timber and all carried down beneath Velia, and where as now Vicus Publicus is, in the very bottom of the hill, was his house reedified.

After this were laws enacted, which not only acquit the Consul and cleared him of all suspicion of affecting to the Kingdom, but also contrariwise wrought such effect, that he became exceeding popular again, whereupon, he was surnamed Publicola or Poplicola. And first and formost the Statute passed as touching the appeal unto the people, against the Rulers and Magistrates. Item, concerning the cursing and condemning of him both body and goods, that should intend or plot to usurp Princely dominion over them. These acts the Commons liked well of. Which when he had alone ordained, that all the thanks and praise might be his therefore, then assembled he a generall Session for the substituting of another Consul unto him, in the room of his Colleague departed. So, Sp. Lucretius was created Consul: who being an aged man and of great years feeble withall, and not able to execute the office and function of a Consul, within few daies paid nature her debt and died. And in place of Lucretius was M. Horatius Pulvillus chosen. In some ancient writers I do not find that Lucretius was Consul. For immediatly after Brutus they make mention of Horatius. But I think verily because no act of his made his Consulship memorable, thereupon he was forgotten and left out. Now as yet was not the Temple of Jupiter in the Capitoll dedicated. And when Valerius and Horatius the Consuls, cast lots whether of them twain should perform that duty, the charge fell unto Horatius, and Publicola went forth to the Vei- entian war. But the kinsfolk and friends of Valerius took it more grievously and impatiently than reason was, that the honor of the dedication of so famous a temple, was given unto Horatius.

Devising

P. Valerius the Consul, unto the people.

Valerius surnamed Publicola or Poplicola.

A Devising therefore by all means possible they could, to impeach it, and seeing they had assailed all in vain and nothing took effect: even at the very instant, whiles the Consul was holding a post of the Temple, and in his solemn prayers to the gods, behold they brought unto him heavy and wo-full news, that his son was dead, and that he might not lawfully, whiles his household mourned and was polluted with a dead corps, consecrate the Temple. Whether it were that he gave no credit to the messenger, or rather was of heart so stout, neither is it for certain reported, nor easie for a man to divine. But for all these tidings, never a jot was he turned from his purpose, nor said ought else to the messenger, but willed that he should bid the corps to be had forth to buriall, and so holding the pillar or post still said out his prayer, and dedicated the Temple. These were the acts B done both at home and abroad in the first year after the expulsion of the Kings.

Then were P. Valerius the second time, and T. Lucretius created Consuls. By this time were the Tarquins fled for succour to Lartius Porfena King of Clusium: "where, by many reasons and remonstrances, intermingled with prayer, one while they besought him not to suffer them, deicended from the Tuscans, of the same bloud and name, to live needy and forlorn in perpetuall exile;
"other while they advised and warned him not to put up without revenge this new fashion of "expelling Kings, now comming up. Saying, that liberty in it self had sweetness enough: and un"less Kings would defend and maintain their Crowns with as great might and main, as Cities "desired to enjoy freedom, there would be a general confusion, and all things turned upside down:
"neither would there be in States and Common wealths any thing aloft and eminent above o-C ther endured: whereupon would issue a finall end of Kingly regiment, a thing with God and "man of all other most excellent and beautiful. Porfena supposing it would be an honourable mar-rager unto the Tuscans, both to have a King at Rome, and a King too of the Tuscans line, came with a cruell army against Rome. Never was the Senate at any time afore put in such fear: so mighty in those daies was the puissance of Clusium, and the name of Porfena so renowned. Moreover, they feared not their enemies only, but also their own subjects at home, lest peradventure the Com-munalty of Rome for fear of war should receive the King into the City, and accept of peace, though it cost them their liberty. During which time the Commons were entertained of the Nobles with all kindness, and many favours and courtesies they had at their hands. And above all things order was taken for provision of grain and victuals. And for to purvey store of corn, some were D sent to the Volsces, others to Cumes. Over and besides the licence of selling salt, because it was fold at an exceeding high price, (was taken from private salters, and was undertaken by the City, with all the cost and charges thereto belonging by them defraied, and salt delivered out to the people at an easie reckoning.) The Commons were also freed of portage, tollage, and tribute: and rich men that were able to bear the burthen were assessed at all payments and contributions: the poor were thought to be charged enough with the bringing up of their children. This kind dealing and indulgency of the Nobles kept the City afterwards (notwithstanding their hard distress of siege and famine) in such concord and unity, that the meanest as well as the highest abhorred and detested the name of KK. And never after was there any one private person, so popular, so devoted to the people by crafty means and indirect courses tending to their particular designs, as the whole Senate was at that time, by their good government of the Commonweal. Now when the enemies approached near at hand, every man made shift for himself, forsook the Country and came into the City. Which they fortified with strong guards round about, so that what with wals and bulwarks on the one side, and what with the Tiber on the other side, it seemed sure enough, and sufficiently defended. The wooden bridge had like to have given the enemy entrance, had not the valour of one man been, even Horatius Cocles (who that day by the good fortune of the Romans was a fortress unto the City of Rome.) He as good hap was, appointed to ward and keep the bridge, seeing the Janicle by a sudden assault won, and that the enemies ran down so furiously from thence upon him, & contrariwise, the multitude of his own companies for fear, to forgo their weapons, break their arraies, and to be gone: took hold of every man, F opposed himself against them a-front: and calling God and man to witness, protested, shewed and declared unto them, that forsaking and abandoning thus their quarter, all their flying was but in vain: for if they left the bridge on their backs, to yield passage to the enemies, there would anon be more of them in Palatium and the Capitol, than in the Janicle: and therefore he willed and commanded them, yea, and gave them direction to break down the bridge, by hewing, by firing, or by what means they possible could: assuring them for his own part, so much as the body of one only man was able to do, he would receive, and withstand the violence of the enemies. Then advancing he himself unto the first entry or foot of the bridge, and all goodly to be seen, amongst those that would in no point fight, but shewed their backs, he so bent his sword and target in their very faces, resolute to encounter with them hand to hand, that even with his G wonderfull hardiness and incredible courage, he astonished and amazed his enemies. Howbeit two there were, that for very shame carried still and stood to him, namely, Sp. Lurgius and Tit. Herminius.
These have men both as well for noble birth as worthy deeds. Assisted for a while with these gallants, sustained he the first storm of danger and most cumbersome push of the skirmish. But as they that were hewing down the bridge called upon them to come back, he constrained those two also to retire and save themselves, whiles some little part of the bridge was left behind free and uncut. Then casting all about in menacing manner his fiery and terrible eyes towards the Captains

and principals of the Tuscans, one while he challenged them one by one to single fight: other while he rared them all in general, calling them the hirelings and slaves of proud Kings and tyrants; who forgetting and making no reckoning of their own freedom, were come to oppugn and impeach the liberty of others. The enemies stood at a bay and in suspense a good while, looking about them one upon another who should first begin to fight. At last, very shame made the whole troop to stir and come forward, and so setting up a loud cry, from all sides they let flie their javelins at him one man alone and their only enemy. All this while bare he off their shot which light upon his target, and there stuck; and nevertheless with full resolution kept the bridge still, walking his stations, and stalking like a giant. Then assailed they with all their force to bear the man down and to turn him over into the water: but by this time the crack of the bridge broken under him, and the shout withall of the Romans, for joy that they had finished their work, staid with sudden fear their violent assault. Then praised Cocles in this wise: "O father Tiberinus (quoth he) O sacred river, with devout heart I thee beseech, receive with thy gracious and mercifull stream this hameless, these weapons, and this thy souldier. And so all armed as he was, he leapt into the Tyber: and albeit many a dart was flung from aloft and light upon him, yet he swam over and escaped safe to his fellows. A brave adventure for all posterity another day to talk of, rather than to beleieve. For this so great fortitude and resolution of his, the City was thankfull, and in token thereof his Image or Statue was set up in their common Hall, named Comitium, and as much ground given him in compass, as he was able with a plough to break up in one day. Amongst these publike favours and honours done unto him, the kind affections and good wills of private persons also well appeared: for in that extreame want and scarcity that then was, every man out of his house store and provision spared from himself and for to give him one thing or another, defrauded his own belly. Thus Porfena with the repulse of this his first enterprise, changed his mind from assaulting to besieging of the City: and after he had placed a garrison in the Janiculum, he planted himself and encamped on the plain; even upon the banks of the Tyber. And sending for boats and craiers from all parts, both to stop the mouth and passage of Tyber, that no corn should come in and be conveyed to Rome: and also that the souldiers, as they saw occasion, might cross the river, and fetch booties in divers and sundry places at their pleasure, in short space he brought the whole countrey about Rome to such streights, that not only other things were brought in, but all their cattell also was faine to be driven out of the fields into the City, and no man durst put any creature forth out of the gates. The Tuscans were permitted to be thus bold, nor so much for fear as for a policy: for Valerius the Consul, waiting for some vantage and opportunity, suddenly to set upon many of them at once and at unawares, as they straggled abroad disorderly, making little regard to revenge small matters, kept himself to be revenged of them thoroughly, and to pay them home one time or other. To the end therefore he might draw forth these forragers, and toll them abroad, he gave his men in charge, and proclaimed, That the next day in great companies they should put their cattell forth at the gate Esquilina, which was farthest from the enemies: supposing that they would have intelligence thereof, by reason that in this extremity of long siege and pinching hardships, some false knaves and disloyal rogues would flie unto them. And so fell it out indeed: For they had knowledge thereof by a fugitive slave. Whereupon they in far greater multitudes pass over the river, in hope to make a general spoil and havock once for all. Then Valerius commanded T. Herminius with a sufficient company to lie close in ambush at two miles end, in the Sabin high way; and Sp. Lartius with a power of lusty tall fellows lightly armed, to keep the gate Collina, untill the enemy were gone by and past: with direction, then to put himself between the river and them; and so to intercept them in their return. The other Consul L. Lucerius issued forth with certain bands of footmen at the gate Nevia: and Valerius himself in proper person set forth from mount Calvus certain ensignes of his best and choice souldiers. These first were detected and discovered by the enemy. Herminius so soon as he heard some noise and din, arose and ran at once out of the ambush, and whilst the Tuscans turned to set upon Lucerius, he charged them lustily at their backs: so that on every hand from the gate Collina on the one side, and from the gate Nevia on the other, the alarm was given. Thus the robbers were slain and cut in pieces in the midst of them: both for that they were overmarched in fight, and also because all the waies were stopped up, that they could not escape by way of flight. And never after durst the Tuscans range about the countrey so audaciously. Howbeit the siege continued nevertheless, with great scarcity of corn, and exceeding death within the City. And Porfena had good hope by sitting still, to force it in the end, and be master thereof. At what time one C. Mutius a noble young gentleman, who thought it a dishonour and foul shame, that the people of Rome, who all the while they were in bondage under Kings, were in no war nor by any enemies beleaguered, should now, being the same still in time of their freedom, be of these Tuscans besieged, whose armies they often had defeated, and supposing that by some hardy and adventurous piece of service this reproachfull indignity was to be revenged, devised at first on his own head to enter into the enemies Camp: but fearing afterwards to go without commission from the Consul, and the knowledge of any other person, lest peradventure he might be taken by the watch of the Romans, and brought back for a traiterous runagate, at such a time especially, when the hard estate of the City was enough to bring him into a deep suspicion, and to be reputed for no better: presented himself before the Council into the Senate house. "I am right willing, and I have a purpose rest, he made no great account of them: but afterwards, upon further consideration he admired H the enterprise, and plainly said, it surpassed far all the adventures of the Coclæes and the Mutii: so as he pretended that if the maid were not rendred again, he would take the league as broken, and being yielded, he would send her back to her friends, undefiled, and without any abuse or violence done unto her. On both parts was promise faithfully kept: For both the Romans restored the pledge of peace according to covenant, and seen also it was, that vertue was not only secured safe, but also highly regarded and honoured with the Tuscan King. For after he had commended and praised the damosel, he promised to give her part of the hostages, chuse whom she would. And when they were all brought forth before her, she made choise (they say) of those young boies that were under 14 years of age: which was not only most besitting her virginity, but also by the accord of the hostages themselves best approved: namely, that that age especially should be delivered out of the enemies hands, which was most subject to injury and taking wrong. The peace thus renewed and confirmed, the Romans rewarded this rare valour in that sex, with as new and strange an honour, for, in remembrance of her, in the top of Via sacra, there was erected her statue, [A maiden sitting on horseback.

There remaineth yet even unto our daies amongst other solemn ceremonies, this one custome received from our ancestors, far differing and disagreeing from this peaceable and friendly departure of the Tuscan King from before the City of Rome, and this it is: In the portsale of goods they use to proclaime first aloud, The sale of King Porfena his goods. This ceremoniall custome must needs either begin in time of war, and so was not afterwards forgotten in peace: or else arose from some more gracious and gentle occasion at the first, then this title or outward form pretendeth, of selling goods by way of hostility, and after the manner of enemies. But the likeliest conjecture and nearest to the truth of all those that are given out is this: that Porfena dislodging from the Janicle, gave freely unto the Romans, (the City at that time being after long siege distressed and in great straits) his rich Camp furnished with victual and provision, conveyed thither out of the plentiful countries of Heiruria near adjoining, which goods, for fear there should have been some havock and spoil made thereof in warlike wise, in case the people had been let loose to the rifling of the tents, were after sold, and called Porfena his goods: which title signified rather their thankful acceptance of the gift, and remembrance of the giver, than any open and overt sale of the Kings goods, which were not so much as in the Romans power, nor at their disposition.

This Porfena having given over the Roman war, because he would not seem to have brought an host of men into those parts, and performed no exploit, sent his son Aruns with part of his forces to surprize and assault Aricia. At the first this sudden and unexpected enterprize much troubled the Aricins, but afterward when they had gotten aid both from the Latine nations & also from Caures, they took such heart again, that they durst enter into the field & bid the enemy battell. In the beginning of the conflict, the Tuscan charged them so hotly, that at the very first encounter, they brake the arraies of the Aricins. But the troups of the Cumans setting policy against force, went a little aside, made way and gave some ground, and when the enemies had outtripped them, & were rashly and disorderly passed beyond them, they turned their ensignes, and set upon their backs: so were the Tuscans, being in the very train of their victory, beset round about, and slain in the midst between. Only a small remnant of them after the loss of their Captain, because they had no other place of refuge nearer, were faine to trudge to Rome without weapons and disarmed, like suppliants both in deed and shew. Where they were kindly entertained and bestowed in several lodgings. Some of them when they were cured of their wounds repaired home, reporting the hospitality & courteous usage they have found. Many remained still at Rome for love of their hosts and the City, who had a place allotted them to dwell in, which after they called Thuscæ vias, the Tuscan street.

After this, were P. Lucretius and P. Valerius the third time created Coss. In that year, for a small end, there came Embassadors from Porfena, to treat about the restoring of the Targunt into their Realm: to whom this answer was returned: that the Senate would send Embassadors to the King himself, whereupon there were immediately addressed unto him in Embassie the most honourable personages of all the Nobility, who in the name of the people of Rome delivered this speech: That the chief of their Nobles were sent, rather than any dispatch given by word of mouth unto his Embassadors at Rome: not for that they could not have shapen them this short answer. They would no Kings have: But to this end, that for ever after there should be no suit renewed of that matter, nor in so great mutual benefits, and favours passed between them, some discontent arise on either side, whiles he might be thought to request that which was repugnant and prejudiciall to the liberty of Rome, and the Romans again, unless they would be executors of their own wrongs, and seek their own mischiefance, to make denial unto him, whom by their good wills they would not seem to deny ought for any thing in the world. But as to the substance in the matter, this was the point: namely, that the people of Rome were not under the regiment of a King, but were a free state: and fully settled in this purpose To set open their gates to the enemies, sooner than to Kings: and were all generally of this mind and resolution, That look when the freedom of that City had an end, then should the City come to an end also. To conclude therefore, they were to entreat him, that if he tendered the weal and safety of Rome, he would permit them to be free still and at their own liberty.

The Roman Embassadors to King Por-fena.

A The King overcome with very modesty, and much abashed in himself, answered thus again: "Since you are so fully minded and stiffly bent (quoth he) neither will I importune you, nor dull your ears with harping still upon this unpleasant string, and do no good: nor bear the Tarquins any longer in hand, and deceive them of that hope of aid, which nothing at all is in my power to perform. Let them from henceforth seek some other place of exile, either for peace or war, as they shall think more expedient, that there may be nothing to let and hinder the free course of amity, and alliance between me and you. To these good and kind words he joyned better and more friendly deeds. For all the hostages that remained in his hand he sent home: and the Veientians lands which by the covenants indented at Janiculum, were taken away, he restored to the Romans again. Thus Tarquin seeing all hope of return cut off, removed unto Tusculum to his son in law Mamilius Octavius, there to live and spend the rest of his daies in banishment. So there continued faithfull peace between the Romans and King Porfena.

Then were Coss. M. Valerius and P. Posthumius. In that year the Romans fought with the Sabins fortunately, and the Consuls triumphed. But afterwards the Sabins made greater preparation of war: to withstand whom, as also for fear of some sudden danger that might arise from Tusculum, from whence they suspected war, although none was openly seen, were P. Valerius the fourth time, and T. Lucretius the second time created Coss. But among the Sabins there grew some civill discord between that part that would have war, and the contrary that sought peace: which gained the Romans some strength even from thence. For Appius Claudius (who afterwards at Rome was surnamed Appius Claudius) a persuader himself of quietness and repose, being overmatched and not able to make his part good with the adverse faction that minded and stirred troubles, accompanied with a great power of friends and followers, from Regillum fled to Rome, who were enfranchised Citizens, and possessed of those lands that lye beyond the river * Anio. And from thence came the name of the old trade Appia: after that other new Citizens were put unto them, those I mean, that descended of that race, and out of the same territory. This Appius was admitted into the number of the Senators, and not long after advanced to be one of the chief men and heads of the City. The Coss. went with a strong power into the Sabins land, where after they had first wasted the Country, and after in battell abated the strength and puissance of the enemy: so, as for a long time after they needed not to fear any rebellion from thence, they returned D to Rome in triumph.

Appius Claudius.

* At this day Teveron.
Tribe Appia.

The year following, when Agrippa Menenius and P. Posthumius were Coss. P. Valerius ended his daies in great glory, reputed the only singular man in those times, by all mens judgment, for skill and knowledge as well in martiall feats, as in civill affairs: but so poor was his estate, that he had not wherewith to defray his funerall expences, and was therefore at the Cities charge right honourably enterred. And the Dames of Rome mourned for him as they did for Brutus. The same year two Colonies of the Latines, Pometia and Cora, revolted to the Auruncans. The Romans first began to war upon the Auruncans. And after they had discomfited a great host of them, who met with the Consuls as they entred the borders, and fiercely made head against them, then all the Auruncan war was driven and translated wholly to Pometia. The slaughter and execution E was no less after the conflict, than during the fight: for whereas there were many more of them slain outright in the place than taken prisoners, those also that were prisoners, they spared not, but murdered every where as they went: neither itaid the furious rage of war therewith, but even the very hostages whom they had received, to the number of 300, they put to the sword. In this year also was a triumph at Rome.

The poverty of P. Valerius, 4 times Consul.

The Consuls Opiter Virginius, and Sp. Cassius, that followed the next year, assailed Pometia, first by meer force to scale the wals, after with pavoises, mantelets, platforms, and other fabricks, raised against it. Upon whom the Auruncans sallied forth, rather of a cankered and malicious hatred than for any hope or vantage given them of good exploit: the greater part of them furnished better with fire-works than armed with sword and spear, killed and burned all afore them: and having F thus fired their fabricks aforesaid, hurt and slain a great number of their enemies, one of the Consuls also (but his name precisely is not by any author set down) was sore wounded, stricken down from his horse, and well-near slain. Whereupon the Romans returned back to Rome thus unhappily defeated, leaving the Consul behind them amongst many that were hurt, like to dye. Soon after, and no longer than whilst their wounds might be healed, and a new supply of souldiers made, they came against Pometia, in more furious manner than before, and also with a stronger power. And when by making of new mantelets and other warlike instruments of assault, they were proceeded thus forward that the souldiers were ready to scale and get up the wall, then they within yielded: and notwithstanding the Town was thus surrendered up, yet there was no more mercy shewed unto it, than if it had been forced by assault. The chief and principal Citizens shamefully G lost their heads, the rest of the inhabitants were sold at the spear in open market like slaves, the Town sacked and razed to the ground, yea, and money made of the lands belonging to it. The Consuls for that they had so wreaked their anger, and sharply revenged themselves, more than for any great war they had finished, obtained triumph.

The year following, were Posthumius Caninius and T. Largius Consuls. In this year, during the games and plaies at Rome, certain yonkers of the Sabins, went about in a wanton jollity to carry away and ravish the Curtezans and common Strumpets of the City. Whereupon the people ran together together, and made a riot, grew to words, and from words to brawls, inso much, as they went together by the ears, and made a fray in manner of a battell: upon which small occasion there was a rebellion like to ensue. Over and besides the fear of the Latines war, (for to encrease their troubles the more) news came, and it was certainly known, that by the soliciting and practise of Ottavius Mamilius, there were already thirty nations banded together against the Romans. The City thus being perplexed for the event and expectation of these so great occurrences, there arose the first occasion and mention made of creating a Dictator. But neither in what year, nor in what Consuls time (for that it can hardly be beleaved, that they should be of the Tarquins faction, and yet that also is reported) nor yet who was first created Dictator, is it certainly known: Howbeit, in the most ancient writers I find that T. Larginus was created the first Dictator, and Cneus Cassius General of the horsemen: and Consular men (i.e. such as had been Consuls afore) they were that elected him: for so the law provided that was enacted, concerning the creation of a Dictator. And this induceth me the rather to beleieve, that Larginus an ancient man, and one who had been Consul before, was appointed as a Controller and Master over the Consuls, and not M. Valerius the son of Marcus, and grandson of Volesus, who as yet had not attained to the Consuls dignity. For if these Consular men afore said had been minded to have chosen a Dictator out of that house above all other, surely they would have made choice rather of his father M. Valerius, a noble personage, of approved prowess and valour, and one besides that had been Consul. When the Dictator was once chosen at Rome, and the axes were seen born before him, the Commoners stood in great awe, and took better regard to be obedient at every beck and command. For neither could they make account of any help (as they might under the Consuls, who were both in commission alike, and of equall authority, when they had recourse from the one to the other) nor yet appeal unto the people: no nor look for succour at all, but in their own double diligence and care of obedience. The Sabins likewise were afraid of the Dictator thus created at Rome: and so much the more, because they were verily perswaded he was made of purpose for them; and thereupon, they sent Embassadors to treat for peace, who beseeching the Dictator and the Senate to pardon so small a fault, and being but a trick of youth, received this answer: That youth indeed might well be pardoned, but such old babes as they might not, who never rested to sow debate, and minister occasion of one war after another. Howbeit, they sat in consultation about a peace, and obtained it had been, if the Sabins could have found in their hearts and condescended to make good and repay the expences that the Romans had disbursed about the war: for that was the thing demanded at their hands. So, defiance was sent and war proclaimed. And yet for that year all was quiet, as it were in time of a secret truce, during the Consulship of Servius Sulpitius, and M. Manlius Tullus, in whose year there was nothing done worthy of remembrance.

battell at the Lake Regillus.

After them were T. Eburinus, and C. Vetustus. In their time * Fidene was besieged, * Crustumeria won, and Præneste revolted from the Latines unto the Romans. And the Latine war, which had been a breeding and budding for certain years, was no longer delaid, but brake forth. A. Posthumus the Dictator and T. Eburinus General of the Cavalry, with great power of foot and horie, set forward and advanced as far as the Lake Regillus, in the Territory of Tusculum and there encountered the Army of the enemies in their march. And because they heard say that the Tarquins were in the host of the Latines, they could not for anger forbear any longer, but presently fell to it, and began battell. This field was fought right fiercely, and cost more bloudshed a good deal, than others usually before: because the Generals and chief Commanders were there present, not only to give direction by their counsel and advice, but also in person themselves hazarded their own bodies, and fought bravely in the medley. And not one almost of the principall leaders escaped out of the skirmish, either of one side or of the other, safe and sound, save only the Roman Dictator. For as Posthumus was encouraging his men, and setting them in array in the vanguard, Tarquinius Superbus (albeit he was now very aged and unweildy, and not able to bestir himself) set spurs to his horse, and ran full butt against him. But having caught a thrust from aside, was rescued by his men that came about him, and retired to a place of safety. And in the other wing, Eburinus General of the horsemen, set upon Ott. Mamilius: but he, the Captain I mean of the Tusculans, was well ware of him, and espied him coming, and ran his horse with full career likewise upon him, and so desperately they bear their Lances one against the other, that Eburinus was run quite through the arm, and Mamilius wounded in the breast, whom the Latines succoured and received into the middle ward. As for Eburinus not able any longer to bear his staff, with his arm sore hurt, withdrew himself out of the battell. The Leader of the Latines nothing dismayed for all his hurt, maintained fight still: and seeing his souldiers somewhat distressed, he sendeth for the Regiment of the Roman exuls, that were under the leading of L. Tarquinius his son: who sticking more courageously unto it, for anger that their goods were spoiled, and they driven out of their own country, renewed the combat afresh for awhile. And as the Romans from that quarter began to reule and give ground, M. Valerius, the brother of Publicola, espying young Tarquinius vaunting himself gloriously in the fore-front of the exuls, inflamed also with a desire of domesticall glory of his house: that the same family which had the praise of expelling the Kings, might likewise win the honour of killing them, spurred his horse, and with deadly spear ran against Tarquinius, who giving way to his mortall enemy, retired back to his own Regiment. But Valerius by this time was disbanded from his company, and rashly ridden into the battell of the exiles, and

A and there a common souldier hapned to charge upon him a flank, and run him through. The horse staid not a jot for all the rider was wounded, and so the Roman Knight ready to die, fell to the ground with his armour upon his body, and paid nature her debt. Posthumus the Dictator, after he perceived so valiant a man slain, and the banished man advancing lustily forward with full trot, and his own souldiers distressed, and at point to turn their backs, gave expresse commandement unto his own band, which he had about him of chosen tall men for to guard his person, that as many of their fellows as they saw flie, they should take them for enemies, and kill them in the place. Thus by reason of a counter-fear the Romans made head again and renewed the battell. Then began the Dictators cohort to fight, and coming with fresh bodies and couragious stomacks, charged upon the wearied ekiles, and killed them on every side. Whereupon began another combate also between the Colonels and Captains of quality and mark. The Generall of the Latines seeing the battalion of the banished well near environed round by the Roman Dictator, speedily taketh with him in to the forefront of the battell certain squadrons of those that were appointed in the rear-guard to succour and aid: whom T. Herminius, a lieutenant, espied to come marching in good order, and knowing amongst them Mamilius by his gorgeous harness, and goodly coat-armour, with far greater violence than the Generall of the horsemen a little before encountered the Colonell of his enemies so hotly, that both he ran Mamilius through his sides, and slue him outright, and also whilst he was disarming and rifling his body, he was wounded himself with a short javelin, and being brought back with victory into the Camp, and at first dressing yeilded to nature and died. Then rode the Dictator apace to the horsemen, and earnestly cried unto them, that seeing the footmen were toiled out and wearied, they would alight from their horses, and take the matter into their hands. The horsemen soon obeyed, leapt from horseback, and set forward, as if they had flown, to the forefront, where they exposed their targets in defence of them that fought before the ensigns. Whereat presently the Infantry began again to take heart, seeing the principall men of arms, and noble young Gentlemen in the like kind of service, exposed to the same danger, and ready to take part with them. Then at the last were the Latines put back, and their whole battell began to shrink. The Gentlemen had their horses brought to them again, and they mounted on horseback to pursue their enemies. The footmen likewise followed after. There the Dictator omitting no help of God and man, vowed, as men say, a Temple to Castor, and openly promised and propoed rewards to that souldier that made either first or second entry into the enemies Camp. Whereupon they bestirred themselves so courageously, that the Romans at one brunt both vanquished their enemies, and also were possessed of their tents. This was the noble field fought at the Lake Regillus. The Dictator and the Generall of horsemen returned into the City with triumph. For three years after, there was neither assured peace between them, nor yet professed war.

Consuls were Q. Cloelius, and T. Lartius. After them A. Sempronius, and M. Minucius. Whiles these two were Consuls, the Temple to Saturn was dedicated, and the feast called Saturnalia instituted. After them succeeded A. Posthumus, and T. Virginus. And in this year and not before, I find in some authors, that the said battell was stricken near the Lake Regillus, and that A. Posthumus suspecting the fidelity of his brother Consul gave over his place, and so was made Dictator. The account of times doth so vary and is so intricate and confused, whiles writers diversly set down the chief Magistrates, that in so great antiquity, not of acts only, but also of authors, a man cannot orderly and directly distinguish, according to some writers, who were Consuls, and what was done in every year.

Afterwards were Ap. Claudius, and P. Servilius created Consuls. This year was famous for the news of Tarquin his death. He died at Cumes, to which place after the defeature of the Latines power he went to Aristodemus the Tyrant. At which tidings the hearts of the Nobles were well lightened the Commons also began to look up. But the joy in the Nobility was above measure too excessive and licentious. For why? the great men began now to wrong and wring the community, whom untill that day they had favoured and pleased to their full power. In the same year the

F Colony Signia, which King Tarquinus had erected, was now stored again the second time, and the number supplied with new inhabitants. And the tribes or wards at Rome were now made up 21. The temple of Mercury was dedicated in the * Ides of May. With the Nation of the Volscians in the time of the Latine war, neither was there peace, nor war: for both the Volscians had levied a power for aid to send unto the Latines, if the Roman Dictator had not made good speed: and also the Roman Dictator hastned the more for fear he should in one battell have to deal with Latines and Volscians both at once. Upon this quarrell, the Consuls led forth their Legions into the Volscians Country. The Volscians fearing no revenge for their designment (that was intended only, and never came in action) were much troubled with this sudden and unlooked for occurrence. Not minding therefore to make resistance, and forgetfull of warlike prowes, they delivered

G 300 of their Noblemens children out of Cora and Pometia for hostages. Whereupon the Roman Legions from thence without any fight were withdrawn. But not long after the Volscians being somewhat eased and delivered of their fear, came again to their old biace & returned to their wonted nature. and secretly under-hand made preparation anew for war, joynung with them as confederates in this quarrel the Hernikes. They send also their Embassadors all about to move and solcite Latium. But the Latines, for their late overthrow at the Lake Regillus, took such a spleen and harred against him whosoever, that should once put into their heads and perswade them to take arms, that they could not forbear the very Embassadors, but offer them abuse. They apprehended H therefore the Volscians, conveyed them to Rome, and delivered them to the Consuls: where they revealed and gave intelligence, that the Volscians and Hernicks were out in arms, ready to war upon the Romans. Which being reported unto the Senators, they were so well pleased and contented therewith, that they set at liberty 6000 Latines, prisoners, and sent them home. And concerning a league to be concluded with them, which was like before to have been denied for ever, they referred the consultation thereof, unto the new Magistrates that should next enter. And in good sooth, pleasant & glad were the Latines then, for that they had done, and the authors of peace were magnified and had in great reputation. They send moreover a Crown of gold into the Capitoll, for a present to Jupiter. With these Embassadors and the present, those prisoners which before were I set free, came in greater number. Who repaired straight waies to every man his house, where they had been prisoners, yielding them great thanks for their kind usage and friendly entertainment in time of their calamities and miseries, and promised therewith the like countesse and mutuall hospitality. Never were the Latines at any time afore, both publikely and privately, united more neerly to the Roman Empire.

But as the Volscian war was now at hand, so the City was at discord among themselves. The Senators and Commons hated one another at the heart, and all this arose by occasion especially of certain persons that were indebted, and in danger of their creditors: who muttered and gave out in murmuring wise, how that abroad they adventured themselves and fought for the liberty and dominion of the City, and at home by their own neighbours they were held prisoners and K oppressed: saying that the freedom of the Commons was more safe in time of war, than of peace, among the enemies rather than their own fellow Citizens. This inward grudge and heart-burning, which of itself still kindled more and more, the notable calamity of one man above all others, set on a light fire. A certain aged person chanced to break prison, and with the arms, badges, and ornaments of all his ancestors, ran into the market place. His apparrell was all to tattered, foule, and loathsome, but the habit or plight of his body much more filthy: so pale, so wan, so lean withall, as if he had been over-pined and starved, his long side beard and hair of his head so overgrown, that they made his visage and countenance wild and gasty. Howbeit, for all he was thus disfigured by this deformity, he was a man well known, and as some said, he had done good service in the wars, had been a chief Centurion, and had the charge and leading of bands in the I field: and the common people, as pitying his estate, and to move compassion, recounted many worthy exploits of his, to his great credit and singular commendation. Himself likewise shewed the scars of wounds, which in his breast and fore-part of his body in divers places he had received that might testifie his valiant service. The people flocking about him as it were in a common assembly to hear a solemn Oration, enquired of him, how he came to be in that taking, so poor, so disfigured and deformed? He answered, that whiles he served in the Sabine war, he by reason of the continuall foraging, and waiting of the Territory, not only lost the revenews and encrease of his lands, but also his Mannor-house was burnt, all his goods ransacked and spoiled, his cattell driven away: and when a levy and tribute was exacted in a time when he ill might, he was driven to take up money and run in debt: which growing more and more by payment of in- M terest, first he was constrained to sell his land, that his father and grandfather had left him, and to turn himself out of all, by making a clean hand of the rest of his goods: untill at length his body also began to winder away in a consumption. Complaining moreover how by his creditor he was not only brought into bondage and thralldom, but also imprisoned, and whipped, and tormented in most cruell and butcherlike manner. With that he shewed before them all, his back lately scourged, with the fresh wales of the lashes newly given him. At the sight and hearing hereof, there arose a great outcry of the people, so that anon the uprore kept not within the compass of the market place, but spread over all the City: in such sort, that as well they that were bound, as they that were loose, came forth from all parts into the open streets, calling the Quirites and the people pitifully to help. In no corner wanted any companions to take part willingly in this seditious rout, and N every where in all the streets they run by companies into the common place. Those Senators who chanced to be abroad, at their no small perill light upon this multitude: and had not the Consuls P. Servilius, and App. Claudius, made the better speed, and come upon them to appease the commotion, there would have been some knocks, for hardly could they have held their hands. At whose comming the multitude turned unto them, shewing their irons and all their other shameful misusage and misery, saying, This is all the good we have gotten for our warfare: upbraiding every man the services they had performed, some in one place, some in another, requiring them in threatening wise, rather than by way of supplication, to call the Senate together, and they the while stood about the Curia, as if they would be judges and moderators of their publike counsell. Very few of the Senators, such only as by chance came that way, could be brought to repair to the Consuls: as for the rest, they were afraid not only to come into the Councill-house, but also to venture abroad into the market place, so that by reason of their small assembly, there could be nothing done nor determined. Then thought the people indeed they were mocked and dallied withall, and driven off with delays, surmising, that the Senators which were away, absented themselves not by chance, nor for fear, but only to hinder the proceeding of their cause: and that the Consuls themselves did dissemble and shrink, and without all question made

A made but a scorn and game at their miseries. This broil so increased, that hardly could the reverence and Majesty of the Consuls restrain the peoples rage. But the Senators standing in doubtful terms, whether to tarry behind or to come forward would be more dangerous, at length they resolved to repair into the Senate, and being now at last a full and sufficient house gathered, neither the Lords there assembled, no nor yet the Consuls, could well agree amongst themselves what to do in this case. Appius a man of a hot spirit, was of opinion to order the matter by Consular authority and commandment, saying, That if one or two of them were laid hold on, the rest would be quiet. But Servilius more inclined to mild and gentle remedies, thought it a more safe and easy course too, rather to bend than to break their angry and fell stomachs. But amidst these troubles there hapned a greater and more fearful occurrence: For certain Latins on horseback rode in post, and brought news in hasty and tumultuous manner, that the Volscians were coming with a mighty and cruel army against the City to assault the same. Which news being heard (see how discord had of one City made twain) wrought far other effect in the Nobles, than in the Commons. The commons leapt for joy, and said the gods were now come down from Heaven to be revenged of the Senators pride, and encouraged one another not to take prestimony, or to enter their names in the Muster-masters book, saying that they had rather dye at once with all, than perish alone and none but they: "Let the Nobles (quoth they) serve as souldiers; let them take weapon in hand, and abide the brunts and hazards of war, who receive the profits, the prizes and rewards thereof. But contrary-wile the Senate pensive and surcharged with this twofold fear, as well from citizen as enemy, beought the Consul Servilius (a man by nature more affable and popular) That he would provide for the safety of the Common-wealth, beset as it were round with so fearful perils. Then the Consul dismissed the Senate, and came forth into the assembly of the people, where he shewed what care the LL. of the Senate had for the good of the commons: "But whiles they were (quoth he) busy in consultation for the greatest part (I confess) of the City, and yet in truth no more but a part, it fell out so in the mean while, that of necessity they must see to the whole body of the Common-wealth, whereof they stand in exceeding fear. Seeing therefore the enemies were almost hard at the gates, they could not possibly do or intend any thing before war. Neither (if there should be any respite and leisure granted) were it either for the commons credit and honesty, nor to fight for their Country, unless they had their pay before hand; nor well becoming the Nobles and for their reputation, to look unto and take order hastily, to redress the miseries and calamities of their citizens upon fear, rather than afterwards with good deliberation, for love and of willing mind. This speech of his he confirmed with an edict, by vertue whereof, he gave straight commandment: In primis, that no man should keep bound or in prison, any citizen of Rome, but that he might be enrolled before the Consuls. Item, that no person should hold in possession, or sell the goods of any souldier, so long as he abode in the camp, nor arrest his children or childrens children. This edict being once published and proclaimed, not only the enthralled debtors there present, were immediately by name enrolled, but also from all parts of the City, they leapt quickly out of their houses, seeing that now their creditors had no right nor power to detain and arrest them, and ran into the market place for to take a military oath of allegiance, to be true souldiers and faithful to the State. A number there was of these: neither was there any that more manfully behaved and quit themselves or took more pains in the Volscian war. Then the Consul led forth his power against the enemies, and within a litle of them incamped himself. The night following, the Volscians presuming upon the variance and discord of the Romans, assailed the tents, if haply in the night season any of them might have been wrought to abandon the camp and come to them, or to practise any treason. But the Sentinels descried them, and upon all alarm given, the whole army arose, and every man made haft to his weapons. Thus came that enterprize of the Volscians to nothing. The rest of the night both parts rested, and were quiet. On the morrow by break of day, the Volscians having filled up the trench, assailed the bulwarks and rampiers. And by that time they had on every side plucked up the fences, pallisadoes, and other fortifications, the Consul, who for all he was called unto instantly on every hand, but of the debtors aforesaid especially above the rest, to give the signal, and to sound the battel, made some stay on purpose to try the courage of his men: and seeing well now their forwardness and their stomachs, at length gave them a token to rush forth, and so letteth them loose, as eager to fight as might be. So at the very first onset the enemies were presently discomfited and put to flight: the footmen followed hard upon them in chase, and as they could reach, wounded them behind on their backs, and killed them: the horsemen likewise pursued them even to their pavillions, who still feared exceedingly what might become of them: and within a while their very camp also, environed about with the legions, and abandoned of the Volscians themselves for fear, were forced and rifled. The next day following, the legions marched to Suessa Pometia, for thither the enemies were fled: and within few dayes the Town was won, and put to the sack, and the spoil and pillage given away: whereby the needy souldiers were somewhat refreshed. The Consul in great glory and honour brought back his victorious army to Rome. In his way homeward the Ambassadors of the Ætrurian Volscians distrusting their own State, upon the losse of Pometia, came unto him. To whom after consultation had with the Senate, and a decree passed, peace was granted: but they were fined to part with their Lands. Immediately upon this, the Sabins also put the

Romans in a fright, and in every deed it might be called a tumult, rather than a war. For word was brought in the night season, that an army of the Sabins were come in a rode, as far as the river Anio, robbing, spoiling, and burning all the villages and hamlets as they went. Forthwith was sent thither the whole power of horses under the conduct of A. Posthumius, who in the Latin war had been Dictator. After him followed the Consul Servilius with a chosen regiment of footmen. Most of the enemies as they ranged abroad a foraging in scattering wise, were by the horsemen surprized and inclosed. And when the Infantry besides marched against the Sabins legion, they were not able to resist: for being tired out, partly with their long journey, and partly with plundering all night long, and many of them having overcharged themselves with meat and wine within the villages, had hardly strength enough to run away. Thus the Sabin war in one night was heard of and ended. The day following, when as now the Romans were in good hope, that they had peace on every side, behold the Auruncan Embassadors came into the Senate, proclaiming war, unless they would forgo the Volscian lands, and restore them to their rightful owners. And even at one time with the Embassadors was the army also of the Auruncans abroad, and had taken the field. The news whereof, and namely, that they were now in sight not far from Aricia, raised up the Romans in so great a broil and hurlyburly, that the Senators could neither be consulted with, and deliver their opinions in order, nor yet give a peaceable answer to those that came as it were with weapon in hand, being thus forced to take arms themselves. So to Aricia directly in warlike manner they march, and not far from thence they joined battle with the Auruncans. And in one day that war had also an end.

Thus when the Roman souldiers had gotten victory within so few days in so many places, and had now defeated the Auruncans, they looked for the promise of the Consul, and the faithful performance of it by the Senate. At what time Appius both upon a proud stomach, and arrogant spirit of his own by nature, and also to discredit and disdain the word of his fellow Consul, in all actions of debt proceeded, and gave judgement with rigor against the debtors. Whereupon, both they that had been before imprisoned, were delivered again into their creditors hands, and other also became prisoners anew. Whereat when as a souldier, whose case it was thus hardly to be dealt withal, called upon the Consul his fellow for help, they ran all at once to Servilius, at his hands they claimed a promise: every one upbraided and reproached him with their service in war, with their scars there gotten, requiring that he would propose the matter again unto the Senate, and as a Consul, succour and protect his Citizens; or like a General, maintain his souldiers. These matters no doubt, moved the Consul: but so stood the case that he could neither will nor chuse, but dissemble, deal double, and temporize with them: so fully bent, and wholly wedded to the other part, was not only his colleague, but also the whole faction of the Nobility. Thus by bearing himself as a Neuter, and going as they say, between the bark and the tree, he neither avoided the hatred of the Commons, nor yet won favour with the Nobles: whiles the Nobles took him for a soft and base minded Consul, seeking to please all parties, and the Commons for as crafty and false dissembler: insomuch as within a short time it appeared he was as much hated of the people as Appius. For, the Consuls hapned on a time to strive, whether of them twain should dedicate the Temple of Mercury. The Senate put over the deciding of this matter from themselves unto the people: and decreed withal, that to whether of them the dedication of the Temple was by the peoples election granted, he should over and besides have the charge to purvey corn and victuals, he should erect and institute a Colledge or fellowship of Merchants, and he in stead of the high Priest, should undertake the solemn feasts or festival days. Then the people gave the dedication of the Temple to M. Leclorius, a principal Centurion of the vanguard: which as it easily appeared, was done not so much to grace the man, as who had an higher office bestowed upon him, then was fit for one of his degree and calling; as to disgrace and deface the Consuls. Hereat, one of the Consuls, yea, and the Patricii stormed and fumed exceedingly against the Commons. But the Commons took heart unto them more and more, and began to proceed far otherwise, and to take another course then they purposed at the beginning: for despairing of the Consuls and Senats help, when they saw a debtor sued and brought to the bar, they would run flocking from all parts together, so that the Consuls sentence and decree could not be heard for the noise and clamour. And decree or judge what he would, no man would obey. And so violently they went to work, that in presence of the Consul, the creditors were singled out, evil entreated, and misused of the Commons, being many together. So the whole fear and hazzard of the main chance, even of liberty it selfe, was now altogether translated from the debtors to the creditors. In the very neck of these troubles, there arose a fear of the Sabin war, and when it was determined, there should be a muster of souldiers, no man would answer to his name and be enrolled. All this while Appius raged and took on, "inveying bitterly against the nicety and popularity of his brother Consul, who with his keeping silence for displeasing the people: by his soft carriage of himself, had betrayed the Weal-publick, and over and besides that, he had not ministered justice for the loane of money, nor dealt according to law in that behalf, he had brought the matter so to pass that he could take no musters by vertue of the decree of the Senate. Howbeit (saith he) the Common-wealth is not wholly forsaken and forlorne, nor yet the Consular authority utterly cast down and trodden under foot: for he would himself alone, if there were no more but he, defend and maintain both his own place, and the Senators dignity. When as the multitude

A multitude therefore stood thus malapertly, as their daily manner was, about the bar, he commanded one principal Captain, of sedition to be attached and had away: and as he was haled to prison by the Sergeants and Lictors, he appealed. Neither would the Consul have given place to the appeal (for all he knew the people how they were bent; and what their doom would be) had not his obstinate stiffness with much ado been overwayed more through the discreet advice & authority of the chief nobles & Lords of the Senate, than by the clamorous noise & menaces of the multitude: so resolute was he, and his heart so courageous, to undergo their ill will and heavy displeasure. Thus grew the mischief more & more daily, testified not with open mouth & broad speeches only, but also (which was more pernicious and dangerous) by conventicles, secret meetings, and contentions. At length these Coss, so odious unto the Commons, went out of their office, to wit, Appius a man wonderous well affected of the Nobles, Servilius liked neither of them nor the Commons. After whom A. Virginus, and T. Vetusius entered their Consulship. But then the Commons not knowing what manner of Consuls they should have, began to assemble together by night, some in Esquilie, others in the Aventine: to the end, they might not be unprovided and to seek upon a sudden, what to do in the common place, nor manage their business hand over head, and at a venture. Which the Consuls supposing (as it was indeed) a perilous example, and of ill consequence, propounded the matter before the Senators: but when they had proposed it, they could not orderly ask their advice what was to be done: they took so on, and kept such outcry and clamour at it, on all hands fretting and fuming, that the Consuls should lay upon the Senate the burden and heavy load of that, which properly they by virtue of their authority and office should execute and perform themselves: and surely, if there were any Magistrates in the City (say they) there would not be thus suffered in Rome any other counsel but publick: whereas now the State is divided into a thousand Courts and conventicles: whiles some have their meetings and assemblies in Esquilie, others in Aventine: Assuredly, one only man indeed (for that is more than a Consul) such a one as Appius Claudius was, would soon dispatch, and in one minute of an hour scatter these their unlawful assemblies. The Consuls upon this rebuke and check, replied again and demanded in this manner: And what would you have us to do (quoth they) for we are resolved to do nothing slackly and coldly, but with as great courage and diligence as shall be well liked of the Senators. Whereupon an order passed, that they should take muster, and levy souldiers with all rigour and severity: adding moreover, that the Commons with idleness and ease were grown over-malapert and too licentious. And when the Senate was dismissed, the Consuls went into the Tribunal & took their places, and summoned by name all the younger sort to appear: and none making answer to his name, the multitude standing about as it had been to hear some publick Oration, said plainly, that the Commons from thenceforth would be no longer deluded, and that the Consuls should never get so much as one souldier, unless they would stand to their word, and make good the promise that publickly before was made, and restore to every man again his liberty, before they caused them to take weapon in hand: to the end, they might fight for their country and country-men, and not for their Lordlike Masters. The Consuls saw well what they had in commission from the Senate & that of all those who within the Councel house walls spake so stoutly & gave out so great words, there was not one present to take part of this odious malice of the people. And like they were to have a bitter fit and cruel broil with the Commons. They thought good therefore ere they tried the worst, and dealt by extremity, once again to ask advice of the Senate, and to confer with them. But then all the younger sort of the Senators, approached by multitudes, hard almost to the Consuls seats, willing them to give over their Consulship, and to resign up their rule and authority, to the maintenance whereof they lacked courage. Now when the Consuls had sufficiently weighed and tried both ways, thus at length began they and said, A great sedition and commotion is toward my LL. To the end therefore that ye pretend not ignorance, and say another day ye were not foretold of it, there is a great sedition and commotion toward. We require therefore that they who find greatest fault with our remissness and lack of courage, assist us and sit with us while we take the musters: and since you will needs have it so, we will execute it according to their minds, that are most earnest and severest. Then come they back again unto the Tribunal, and commanded on set purpose, one of them that were there in sight to be cited and called by name. But he stood still and held his peace, with a company of men gathered round about to guard him, for fear he should have some harm or violence done unto him. The Consul then sent a Sergeant to attach him, who being repulsed off, then those Nobles which sat there on the bench to assist the Consuls, cried out upon the shameful indignity, and said it was intollerable, and so ran down in hast from the Tribunal seat, for to aid the Sergeant. But the violent rage of the multitude, who let the Lictor alone, and only stayed him from laying hold on the man, turned upon the Patritians. So that the Coss, were fain to step between, and then the fray was appeased. In which, there being no stones flying about their ears, nor weapon drawn, there was more clamour, brawling and chafing than any hurt done. Then was the Senate house called in a great hurry: and with more confusion sat they there in Councel: whiles they that pretended how they were beaten and misused, required that commissioners should sit upon this riot and make due inquisition: and the stoutest of them gave their determination, as much by clamor and noise, as by sentence and opinion grounded upon reason. At last, when the tempest was overblown and their heat allayed, and that the Coss, hit them in the teeth, and reproved them, saying there was a little discretion and gravity in their Court and Councel-house, as in the common Hall, they began in the end to consult orderly H and three opinions there were amongst them, P. Virginius would not have it a common and general case (to wit, that all debtors should be released from their creditors) but his advise was, that they should only be considered, who relying upon P. Servilius the Consul his word and faithful promise, had served in the wars of the Volscians, Auruncians and Sabins. T. Larginus, he supposed and thought this, that it was not a time then to make amends only for good deserts, and to respect them alone that had done well, and to recompence good service: but for as much as the whole commonalty was deeply engaged and plunged in debt, unless they were all provided for, and good order taken for them every one, there would be no quietness nor end of troubles: yea, and (that which more is) in case they be not all alike regarded, but some debtors in better condition than I others, the discord would rather be more kindled than quenched. Appius Claudius a man both of natural disposition fierce and cruel, and also by occasion made more outrageous, nettled with the Commons hatred against him on the one side, and tickled with the praise and commendations of the Nobles on the other side, who ever magnified him and lift him up to the skie, spake to this effect: "These so great stirs and mutinous huriburlies, my Masters (quoth he) is not long of the "misery and calamity, but only of too much liberty of the Commons: who rather upon fatness "are grown wanton and unruly, than for any want impatient and discontent: and all this mischief "no doubt is sprung of this, that they have liberty to appeal. For so long as it is in their power to "flie for help unto those that have erred as well as they, well may the Consul threaten and give "out menacing words: as for any rule else or command they shall have none among them. Come K "on therefore, let us create a Dictator from whom they cannot make their appeal. Then shall "this furious rage, which now setteth all on a light fire, be soon hushed and quite extinguished. Let "mesee then, who dare beat a Lictor, when he shall well know, that he alone whose honor "and Majesty he shall offend and abuse, hath power to scourge him and take away his life. Many men thought this sentence of Appius to be very hard and cruel: yea, and dangerous withal, in regard of the late precedent of Virginius and Vetustius. That other likewise of Larginus was thought inconvenient, in taking away all keeping of credit with the creditors. The opinion and advise of Virginius was supposed as well in one respect as in another most indifferent and mean between both. But by reason of the faction and regard of private benefit, which alwayes hath done hurt and ever will, to publick Counsel, Appius prevailed, and he missed very little but he himself had been made Dictator. Which if it had come to pass, it would surely have estranged and alienated quire the hearts of the Commons, in that most busy and dangerous time: when it happened that the Volscians, Equians, and Sabins, were all up at once in arms. But the Consuls and elder Senators, had great care and consideration to chuse such a one, as might by mildness of his own nature allay and qualify the exceeding rigour and sternness incident to Sovereign and absolute authority. They elect therefore to be Dictator, Marcus Valerius the son of Volejus. The Commons albeit they saw well enough this Dictator created for to curbe them, yet having got by his brothers law, the benefit of Appeal, they feared no severe and insolent proceeding from that house and name. The Edict besides, that the Dictator set forth, which was welneer all one with that other of the Consul Servilius, much confirmed and settled their minds. For supposing now, they M had more hold both of the man, and also of his authority, and that they might with more confidence rely themselves on the one and the other, they gave over all debate, and entred their names into the muster book: so there were enrolled full ten legions. The like army for number was never levied afore. Of which legions, the Consuls had the conduct of three a piece, and the Dictator commanded the other four: and high time, it was: for the war might not be deferred any longer. The Equians had already invaded the territory of the Latins, and their Embassadors were petitioners to the Senate, either to send succour, or to give them leave to put on armor themselves for the defence of their confines, and frontiers. It was thought the safer and surer way, that the Latins without arming themselves should be defended, than to permit them again to take weapon in hand. So the Consul Vetustius was sent thither, and he stayed them from further foraging and wasting. For the Equians were departed out of the plains, and trusting rather N in the vantage of the ground, than in their weapons, stood upon their guard, kept themselves safe from danger, upon the high tops of the Hills and Mountains.

The other Consul who was gone against the Volscians, because he would not also lose any time, drew the enemy forth (by wasting the country especially) to encamp himself neerer, and so at length to fight a field. Now was there a plain in the mids between both camps: where each army stood before their rampiers, embattelled, and ranged in array, with banners displayed ready to fight. The Volscians were somewhat more in number, whereupon they began battail disorderedly and as if they set light by the enemy. But the Roman Consul neither advanced forward, nor suffered his men once to shout and answer again, but charged them to stand still with their javelins fast in the ground, until the enemies were come within the reach of hand fight, and then to lay about them lustily with their swords, all that ever they could. The Volscians out of breath with running and shouting, charged the Romans, who seemed for fear to stand astonied: but after they once perceived that they were hotly reencountred by them again, and saw their swords glittering in their eyes, they were troubled therewith, as if they had been entrapped and fallen into some trains layed for them, and so turned their backs. And by reason they came running before O

A to battail, their strength would not hold out now to run clear away: The Romans contrarywise, because against the beginning of the fight they had stood quiet, were fresh of body, and soon overtook them thus overtoiled, won their camp by force, and after they had driven the enemies out from thence, chased them into  Velitru*, and entered the Town pellmell one with another in a medley, the Victor together with them that were vanquished. More bloudshed there was by execution of them one with another, of all ages and sexes, as they came in their way, than in the very battail. A very few, even such as without weapon yielded themselves, were spared and pardoned.

Whiles these things were a doing amongst the Volscians, the Dictator discomfited and put to flight the Sabins; with whom he had much cruel war: yea, and forced them to abandon and quit their camp. For having sent his horsemen into the main battail of the enemies, which they had but slightly strengthened within, and bestowed the ranks there very thin, and all to stretch out the wings on both sides more at large, he brake their arraies: and when they were once disordered, the footmen came in upon them: and in the same brunt were they Masters of their camp, and so the war ended. There was not in those dayes a braver battail fought and more renowned, setting aside that only at the lake Regillus. The Dictator rode in triumph unto the City. Over and above the accustomed honors, both he and his posterity after him, were allowed a certain place in the great Race or Theater, called Circus, for to behold at ease the solemn games; and there was set the Ivory chair of estate, called Sella curulis. The Volscians thus vanquished, lost the territory about Velitru, and new inhabitants were sent thither from the City to people and to till the grounds; so that it became a Colony.

C Somewhat after this, there was a field fought with the Equians, but in truth, full against the Consul his will, for that they were to climb up a steep Hill (to their disadvantage) for to meet with the enemy. But the Souldiers blaming him for trifling out, and making delays, to the end that the Dictator might be out of Office before they made return to the City, and so his word and promise, like the Consuls before him, should come to nothing, drove him perforce to lead up his army; rashly and at adventure against the Hills. This being an enterprise ill ordered, and an error escaped, fell out notwithstanding very well through the cowardise of the enemy: who before they were come within shot and the darts cast, amazed at the venturousness of the Romans, forsook their holds which they had in most defensible places, and leapt down into the valleys over against them. There was booty & pillage good enough, and a bloudless victory.

D Having sped thus fortunately abroad in three several wars, the Senators and Commons were not careless of home-affairs, what would be the issue thereof. The Bankers and Urrers, what with favor, and what with subtil and cautious policy, had devised aforehand and wrought such means, as might frustrate and disappoint not only the Commons, but also the Dictator, and put them by their expectation. For Valerius, after the return of Vestusus the Consul, dealt first and above all other matters and causes at the Councel table, in the behalf of the people that had achieved such victories, and propounded to know their minds, What should be done with those ended, endangered, and imprisoned persons. "Which motion of his being disliked and rejected: I see well (quoth he) that I cannot please you, so long as I perswade to concord and unity: with ye will (trust me truly) ere it be long, that the commonalty of Rome had more

E Patrons and Advocates like my self. As for me, I will neither bear my Citizens any longer in hand to deceive them, nor be a Dictator in vain, to effect nothing. Civil discord at home, and forraign war abroad, caused the State to have need of this office. Now, when peace is gotten without, behold it is crossed and hindered within: yet had I rather be present at the sight of a mutiny and insurrection when I am a private person, than whiles I am a Dictator. Thus went he out of the Councel-house, and yielded up his Dictatorship withal. The Commons saw plainly what the matter was, and how upon a discontentment and grief that he took in their behalf, for very pity and compassion of them, he gave over the place: and therefore, as if he had fully discharged himself of his faithful word to them given, (for that there was no default in him, but it had been performed indeed) they accompanied him along home to his house with hearty affection, praising and commending him all the way they went. The Lords of the Senate began then to fear, lest if the army were broken up and discharged, there would be some secret conventicles, and new conspiracies contrived: therefore, albeit the matters were taken by the Dictator, yet because the souldiers had sworn allegiance to the Consuls, supposing they were still bound to warfare by virtue of that oath, and pretending a colour that the Equians renewed war, they commanded the legions to be led forth of the City.

F This hastened the sedition the sooner and set it forward. At first, as men said, they conspired and laid their heads together about murdering and making away the Consuls. To the end they might be acquit of their oath unto them: but afterwards being better schooled and advised, that no mans conscience can be cleared of scruple, and discharged of an oath once taken, by committing a sinful act and working mischief, they withdrew themselves out of the way by the perswasion of one Sicinius, and without congrue of the Consuls, departed as far as Mount Sacer, on the farther side of the River Anio, three miles from the City. This is the more common report, and goeth more current, than that whereof Piso is the Author (namely, that the Commons retired themselves to Adventum.) There, without any head or Captain, they encamped and fortified themselves within a trench and rampier, and kept quiet for certain dayes, neither taking nor doing

harm: as having caried with them such things only as were necessary for the sustenance of their H life. Great fear there was in the City, and in this mutual and reciprocal fear, all men were perplexed and to seek what to do. The Commons forlorn of their fellow Commoners doubted the violence of the Senators: the Senators again stood in fear and jealousie of the Commons that remained still behind: and were in suspense whether it were better they abode still among them, or followed after their fellows. For how long trow ye, will a multitude once disbanded: rest in quiet? Again, in case any forrain war should arise in the mean time, what might ensue thereupon in the end? In conclusion, there was no hope behind to be looked for, but in the concord of citizens: and therefore the commons one way or other, either by reasonable conditions or unreasonable, were to be reconciled again and reduced into the City, there was no remedy. So it was thought good and agreed upon, that one Menenius Agrippa (a fair spoken and eloquent man, gracious withal and well-beloved among the commons, for that he was from them descended) should be sent as an Orator to treat with them. Who being received into the camp, after that old and harsh kind of eloquence in those dayes, spake as men saith to this effect, and told this tale and parable: "Upon a time (quoth he) when as in mans body, all the parts thereof agreed not, as now they do in one, but each member had a several intent and meaning: yea, and a speech by it self:
so it befel, that all other parts besides the belly, thought much and repined that by their careful-ness, labor and ministry, all was gotten, and yet all little enough to serve it: and the belly it self lying still in the mids of them, did nothing else, but enjoy the delightsome pleasures brought unto her. Whereupon they mutined and conspired altogether in this wise, That neither the hands should reach and convey food into the mouth, nor the mouth receive it as it came, nor yet the teeth grind and chew the same. In this mood and fit, whiles they were minded to famish the poor belly, behold the other limbs, yea, and the whole body besides, pined, wasted, & fell into an extreme consumption. Then was it well seen, that even the very belly also did no small service, but fed the other parts, as it received food it self: seeing that by working and concocting the meat thoroughly, it digested and distributed by the veins into all parts, that fresh and perfect blood whereby we live, we like, and have our full strength. Comparing herewith, and making his application, to wit, how like this intestine and inward sedition of the body, was to the fell stomach of the commons, which they had taken and born against the Senators, he turned quite the peoples hearts. Then began some treaty of unity and concord: and among other articles, it was conditioned and granted, that the Commonalty should have certain sacred and inviolable Magistrates of their own, among themselves, such as might have power to assist the Commons against the Consuls:
that it might not be lawful for any Senator, to bear that office. So there were created two Tribunes of the Commons, C. Licinius and La. Albinius. And these elected three other fellow officers unto them. Of whom Seinius, the Author of the sedition or insurrection was one, who were the other twain is not for certain known. Some say there were but two Tribunes created and no more in the mount Sacer, and that the sacred law was there made concerning their immunity.
During this insurrection and revolt of the commons, Sp. Cassius and Posthumus Cominius entered their Consulships. In whose time a league was made with the people of Latium. For the establishing whereof, one of the Consuls stayed behind at Rome: the other was sent unto the Volscian war, who discomfited and put to flight the Volscians of Antium, chasing and driving them into the Town Longula, which he won. And immediately he took Mucamires a Town of the Vol-scians, and after that with great force assaulted Corioli. There was in camp then among the flower of gallant youths, one Caius Martius, a Noble yong Gentleman, right politick of advise, active besides, and tall of his hands, who afterwards was named Coriolanus. While the Roman army lay at siege before Corioli, and were amazed wholly upon the Towns-men within, whom they kept fast shut up, and feared no present danger at all from any forrain war without: behold, all on a suddain, the Volscian legions that came from Antium, assailed them: at which very instant the enemy also sallied out of the Town. Which Martius seeing, who by good hap quartered and warded there, with a lusty band of chosen men not only repressed and stopped the violence of those that issued and brake upon him, but also whiles the gate stood open, fiercely rushed in himself, and having made a foul slaughter of people thereby, at his first entrance into the City, and caught up fire at a venture, slung it upon the houses that stood upon and about the walls. Whereupon arose a great outcry of the folk within the Town, together with lamentable weeping and wailing of women and children, last commonly is seen in such a fright. Which at the very first, both hardened the Romans, and also troubled the Volscian ans: and no marvel, seeing the City taken before their face, for which they were come to relieve.
Thus were the Volscians of Antium defeated, and the Town Corioli won. And Martius through his praise, so much obscured and stopped the light of the Consul's fame, that had it not been ingraven in brass for a remembrance and monument, that there was a league with the Latines, and the same made by Sp. Cassius alone: (for that his companion was absent) there had been no record at all, but forgotten quite it had been, that ever Sp. Cominius warred with the Volscians.
The same year died Menenius Agrippa, a man all his life time before beloved indifferently of the Senators and the Commons: but after the insurrection, much more dear unto the Commons than before. This enre-maker, this mediator for civill attonement, this Ambassador and Messenger from the Senators to the Commons, this reconciler and reducer of the Commons home

A home again into the City; had not as his death sufficient to defray the charges of his funerals: the Commons therefore made a purse and a contribution of all Sextant by the poll, and were at the cost to inter and bury him worshipfully. After this were made Consuls, T. Gerganius, and P. Minutius. In which year when all was quiet abroad, for any war, and the dissension at home healed up clean, and skinned: another calamity far more grievous entered the City. First, a dearth of corn, and all manner of victuals, by reason that the grounds upon the departure of the Commons were neglected and untill'd; hereupon ensued famine, even such as usually is incident to men besieged. And verily the household of bondservants, yea, and the commons too, had utterly perished for hunger, if the Consuls had not in time made the better provision: by sending purveyours all abroad to buy up corn, not only into Hetruria, by coasting along the river on the right hand from Hestia, and on the left hand by Sea, (passing through the Volscian Country) even as far as Cumes: but also into Sicily, there to lay for grain. Such was the hatred of the borderers, that Rome was enforced to have need of succor and relief from afar. Now when they had bought certain corns Caperdit: was no looter embarked, but the ships were stayed and arrested there, by Aristodemus the sycant for the goods of the Tarquins; who held their in remainder he was. In the Volscian Country and Pamphilius, they could buy none standing. There, the very Purveyours themselves were in danger of violence, by the men of the Country. Out of Tuscane there came corn up the Tyber, wherewith the Commons were suit timed and refreshed. And considering the freights they were in for want of victuals, they had been sore distressed and vexed with wars besides, and that in a very ill time, and unreasonable for them: but that the Volscians, who now were in readiness, and upon the point to make war; had a pestilence that rained hot among them. Which heavy cross and affliction, the enemies were so discouraged with, that when the plague began to stay, even then they continued still afraid. The Romans both at Velitra augmented the number of the inhabitants, and also at Narba, sending a new Colony into the Mountains, to be a Fortress and strength for all the territory of Pamphilius. Moreover, when M. Minutius, &c. A. Sempronius were Consuls, great store of corn was brought out of Sicily; and it was debated in the Senate-house, at what price the Commons should be served there with. Many thought the time was now come to wining the Commons, and keep them under, and to recover again those royalties, which by their departure were forcibly whittled and diminished from the nobility. But above all others, Publius Coriolanus, an unkind and capital enemy to the Tribuns power and authority. If they will (quoth he) have their own and victuals at the old price, let them restore unto the Senators their ancient right and prebend: hence, Why see I (as one brought under the yoke of servitude, and put as it were unto my shame, by Robbers and Theeves) these Magistrates of the Commons? Why see I Siculus so mighty? Shall I endure these indignities longer than I needs must? I that could not bear Tarquinus to be King; shall I brook and suffer Siculus? Let him depart aside now, and take his Commons with him: the way is open to Mount Sacer and other Hills: Let them carry away with them their corn, out of our possessions, and Lordships; as they did three years ago: let them enjoy, take for their use, and spend the store, which they in their foolery and fury have reposed: bid me be bold to say, that when they are by his calamity bowed and cowed, they will gather till and husband the ground themselves, then with weapon in hand, and by way of insurrection forbid and hinder the tillage thereof. I cannot so soon say, whether it had been as meet, as I suppose it was possible and easy to be effected, that the Senators by offering more gentle conditions in the prices of corn and victuals might have eased themselves of the Tribuns authority, even then: and also have been disabused of the suppositions which will they, said they, were laid upon them. Well, this seemed to the Senate a sharp rebuke and severe sentence of Coriolanus; and for very anger also, he had like to have caused the Commons to sit up in arms. For they murmured and gave it out in their ears, That now they were blind and blindfolded with famine like entities, devalued and bereft of their meat and pittance: that the great kind of corn, the only sustenance and food which formerly had admitted unto them beyond all hope, was searched and plucked from their mouths: unless the Tribuns be delivered and yielded Prisoners hand and foot bound to Coriolanus, unless he might have his penny worth of the back and shoulders of the Commons of Rome. For he was now risen up and become their tormentor and hangman, to command them either to death, or to servitude. As he went out of the Council house, they had run upon him with violence, but that the Tribuns, as good luck was, served him with process in time, to appear at a day, and come to his answer. Hereupon, their furious anger was suppressed. For now every man saw, that he was himself to be the judge and Lord of his enemies life and death. Coriolanus at the first scorned the Tribuns threatening, and gave the hearing, as though he made small reckoning thereof, saying: That their authority had power granted by Quintus, only to sit and not to punish: that the Tribuns were pitiable to the Commons, and not to the Senators. But so highly were the Commons bent, and all so set upon mischief, that there was no other remedy, but one main must pay for it to save the execution of the Nobles. Howbeit the Senators did what they could to withstand them by opposing hatred and displeasure again, and making all means, what either privately they were able of themselves, or jointly by their whole Order and debate, to purge. And first, this cause they assayed assayed to stop and overthrow the suit commenced; namely, by setting their followers and retainers in sundry places to deal with the Commons severally one by one, & what they could to affright them from meetings and assemblies together. Afterwards, they came all forth at once into the Forum or common place. A man that had seen them would have said they had been the parties themselves in trouble and accused, ready to hold up their hand at the bar: such praying, such a beseeching they made of the Commons, in the behalf of this one citizen, this only Senator; that if they would not in their love acquit him for their sakes, as innocent and unguilty, yet they would give him unto them as an offender and faulty person. In conclusion, when his day came, he made default and appeared not, yet continued they still in their angry mood against him. And being condemned in his absence, for contumacy, departed into banishment to the Volscians, menacing his own country as he went, and carrying even then with him the revenging stomach of an enemy.

The Volscians at his coming received him courteously, and friendly intreated him every day more than others, as they perceived his anger more and more toward his country-men, by many complaints he made of them, and threats which that he oftentimes gave out against them in their hearing. He made his abode and sojourned in the house of Accius Tullius, who at that time was a mighty great man among the Volscians, and one that ever bare mortal malice unto the Romans. And while the one of them was provoked with an old cankred grudge, and the other set on and pricked forward upon a fresh quarrel and occasion of anger, they both laid their heads together and plotted to make war upon the Romans. This only thing stood in their way to cross their designs: They thought verily their Commons would hardly or scarcely at all be brought, to rise and take arms again, which they had so often unhappily attempted: And besides, their courages were well cooled, and their stomachs abated by the loss of their youth in many and sundry wars often times afore, and now at last, by the late pestilence and mortality. They were therefore to go cunningly to work: that forasmuch as the old hatred against the Romans was grown out and worn away, their hearts upon some new anger might be chased and galled again. There were by chance at that time in Rome, the great Games and Playes in hand, to be set out anew the second time, the occasion whereof was this: A certain householder one morning betimes before the shews and games began, had beaten with rods a poor slave of his under the fork which he carried on his shoulders, and driven him along through the mids of the Circus or Theatre: and with that began the playes, as if there had been no matter therein of scruple or Religion. But not long after, one T. Latinus, a mean Commoner had a dream or vision. In which he thought that Jupiter complained and said, that the Dancer before the playes pleased him never a whit: and unless those games were newly exhibited again, and that very stately and sumptuously, some great danger should befall the City: willing him withal, to make relation hereof unto the Consuls. The man albeit in truth he was not without some sense and feeling of Religion and the fear of God: yet made he no such great scruple at the matter, but that the reverence he had of the Majesty and countenance of the Magistrates surmounted and dashed it clean: for fear lest haply he should become a talking stock in mens mouths, and be mocked for his labours. But this delay and sleeping of the matter, he bought full dear. For within few dayes his son happened to dye. And because he should be out of doubt what was the cause of this his losse and suddain misfortune, while he was troubled in spirit, with anguish and sorrow, behold, the same vision appeared to him again in his sleep, and seemed to ask him whether he had not yet sufficiently paid for this disobedience and contempt of God: threatening moreover, that in case he made no greater hast to certify the Consuls thereof, there was a greater judgment and plague toward, and that very near. Now was the thing more evident than before, and past all peradventure. Howbeit he neglected and drave it off still, until he was himself overtaken with a grievous disease, and brought to great weakness in all his joints. Then verily the wrath of the Gods taught him to be wiser. And being overwearied with harms past, and in fear of more presently to sinney he conferred with his kinsfolk and friends to be advised by them. When he had declared unto them what he had seen and heard; namely, how Jupiter had so often appeared unto him in his sleep, and that the fearful displeasure and threatnings of the heavenly Gods were shewed plainly by sundry mischances fallen upon him: by the full consent of all them that were about him, he was brought in a litter to the Consuls, into the Forum or common place, from whence by the Consuls commandment he was carried into the Council house. Where, when he had made report unto the Senators of the self same things, to the exceeding wonder and admiration of them all, see another strange miracle: He that was brought into the Senate house a lame creeple of all his limbs, after he had once delivered his errand, returned home to his house (as it is recorded) sound upon his feet. Hereupon the Senate decreed, That the Games should be set out as magnificently as could be devised.

To these solemnities resorted, by the motion and perswasion of Accius Tullius, a great number of Volscians. But before they were begun, Tullius according to the complot between him and Martius at home, made a step or errand unto the Consuls at Rome, saying, that he would willingly commune and treat with them apart, of important affairs concerning the State. When the room was clear, and every man gone, he began in this wise: Loth I am (quoth he) if other wife I could chuse, to speak ought but well of my country-men and fellow citizens. Yet come I

- A "not to complain of any action of theirs already passed, but to give a caveat, and provide that nothing be practised hereafter. The nature and disposition (I may tell you) of our people, is too too unconstant and unstayed, more I know than I would they were, a great deal: that have we found and felt to our great cost and manifold damage, we say, who verily at this day by your long sufferance, and not by good desert of ours, do stand in good terms and peace of safety. There is now here a great multitude of Volscians, the Playes and Games ready to be represented and celebrate. Your City will be wholly amused in the beholding thereof: I remember upon the like occasion, what was sometimes enterprised and wrought in this City by the youth of the Sabins; and my heart doth tremble and quake for fear, lest some inconsiderate, rash and foolish part be played by ours: thus much, O ye Consuls, I thought good in our behalf and yours both, to give you notice of beforehand. As for me, I am minded presently to go from hence home, lest I being here seen, might be thought in some word or deed accessary unto them, and so culpable. Having made this speech he departed. When the Consuls had declared in the Senate this thing so doubtful, and yet proceeding from the mouth of so sure and certain an Author: behold, the credit of the man (as commonly it is seen) rather than the likelihood of the matter, caused them to be wary and circumspect, yea, although there was no such need or cause at all. Whereupon the Senate made an Act, that the Volscians should be jogging out of the City. And divers cryers or Bedles were sent out sundry wayes, to command them to avoid and be packing before night. At the first, the Volscians were only much affrighted, and ran every man to and fro into his Inne to fetch away his things. But afterwards in the way homeward, they began to think more and more of it, and to grow melancholy: thinking it a great indignity, that like polluted and profaned persons, they should be driven from the Games, on festival holydayes, discarded (as a man would say) and excommunicate out of the company both of God and man. Thus as they went along all on a row, as it were in one continued and joynt train, Tullius (who was gone afore as far as the Ferentine head) received the foremost and chief of them, as every one came, and entertained them with complaints and words of indignation, and drew both them who willingly gave ear to his words so fitly framed and tending to stir more coles, and also by their means the rest of the multitude into a plain field, lying hard under the high way side. Unto whom, assembled together as it were to hear a sermon, he thus began to speak: "Admit (quoth he) you could forget the old wrongs and abuses offered you by the people of Rome, the losses and overthrowes of the Volscian Nation; yea, and all the other quarrels whatsoever; how can ye put up this dayes spightful reproach and dishonour received at their hands? who to our great disgrace and shame, have begun their solemn Games? Perceived you not how they have triumphed over you to day? how as ye departed, ye were a spectacle and pageant to all men, citizens and strangers, and to so many neighbour nations adjoining? how your wives and children were brought as it were in a shew to make them sport and to laugh at? what conceit was in their heads (think ye) that heard the voyce of the Bedle? what thought they that beheld you as you dislodged? what imagined they that happened to meet this ignominious troupe as they marched? Even this & no other, that there was some wicked sin among us, not to be named, whereby we should as malefactors, have stayned and polluted their games if we had been present at the sight of them, & have committed some haynous act, that would require by some satisfaction or sacrifice to be purged; and for that cause were driven from having any conversation, fellowship, and society of good and godly men? Over and besides, how can you chuse but think of this, That we enjoy our lives still, only because we hastned our remove, (if this may be called a remove, and not rather a plain taking of a flight and running away.) And yet you reckon this no enemy City, where, if ye had stayed but one day longer, you had dyed for it every one. Defiance is given already, and war denounced against you; but if ye be men indeed of courage, to their great cost and mischief that have denounced it, Thus being of themselves kindled enough with indignation, and by these words enflamed and set on fire, they went every man his way from thence home: and so effectually solicited each one the people where he dwelt, that in fine the whole nation of the Volscians revolted and rebelled. To manage this war, were chosen General commanders by one consent of all the Cities, Accius Tullius, and Cn. Martius the banished Roman: in whom of the twain they reposed greater hope and this their hope failed them not. So as it soon appeared that the puissance of the state of Rome consisted more in the dexterity of good Captains, than in strong armies of souldiers. For first he went to * Circeios, from whence he expelled the Roman Coloners, and delivered the City cleer and free unto the Volscians. Then by croise wayes he passed into the Latin street, called Via Latina: and regained from the Romans, these their Towns newly gotten afore, Satricum, Longula, Pollustia and Corioli. After this he wan Lanuvium again, and so forward he forced * Corbio, Vitelia, Trebia, Labicos, and Pedum. And last of all from Pedum, he marched on toward the City of Rome. and at Cluvia Fossa, five miles off, he encamped and foraged the territory about, sending with the forragers certain guides, to keep them from spoiling and doing harm in the Noblemens Lands: were it that he were more spightful to the Commons, or that thereby some discord might arise, between the Commonalty and the Senators: which doubtles had soon grown, so mightily had the Tribuns already by their complaints and accusations, provoked the Commons forward (who of themselves were shrewd enough) against the heads and Magistrates of the City, but that the fear of forrain dangers, the greatest bond of civil concord that that can be, held them in and knit their hearts together, were they never so jealous, suspected, H and hateful afore one to the other. Herein only was all their difference, that the Senate and Consuls, reposed hope in nothing else save only in war: the Commons on the other side were desirous of any thing whatsoever, but war.

Now were S. Navius, and Sex. Furius Consuls: who as they were surveying and mustering the legions, and disposing of a good Corpus de guard upon the walls, and other places wherein they thought it expedient to keep a standing watch and ward: behold a mighty number called and cryed hard for peace, and with their seditious clamors, put them in exceeding fear: yea, and afterwards forced them to assemble the Senate-house together, and to propose concerning the sending of certain Embassadors to Cn. Martius. The Lords of the Senate seeing evidently the commons I hearts to fail them, accepted and granted the motion propounded. Whereupon were Oratours sent unto Martius to treat for peace. At whose hands they received this heavy and stout answer: "If so be the Volscians had their Lands restored to them again, then there might be some parle and treaty of peace: but if they will needs at their pleasure still enjoy that booty which by war they have gotten, then would he in remembrance of private wrongs done unto him by his country-men, as also of the friendship and courtesy shewed him by strangers that had given him entertainment, do his best to make it known unto the World, that his courage and stomach is incensed, and not abated and quailed by his banishment. Then were the same Embassadors sent again the second time, but they might not be admitted once to set foot within the camp. It is reported moreover that the very Priests in their Pontificalibus, in their rich vestiments and goodly K ornaments, went with supplication to the tents of the enemies, and turned his heart no more than the Embassadors had done before them. Then the dames of the City came flocking all about Veturia the Mother, and Volumnia the wife of Coriolanus. Whether this proceeded from any publick Counsel and was done in Policy, or came only of womens fear, I find but little in any records. But howsoever it came about, this one thing is certain, they perswaded so effectually with them, that both Veturia an aged woman, and also Volumnia with her two little sons that she had by Martius, went toward the enemies camp, to see if women by their prayers and tears, might save the City, which men with spear and shield could not defend. When they were come into the camp, and word brought to Coriolanus, that there was an exceeding great train of women thither arrived: at the first, he, as one that had relected, neither for that publick Majesty in the Embassadors, nor yet at the religious reverence, which he both conceived in mind, and saw with his eyes in the clergy, stood much more stiffly bent against the tears of fifty women. But afterwards one of his familiar friends, who had seen and known Veturia there, mourning and bewailing exceedingly above the rest, as she stood betwixt her daughter in law and her little Nephews: "If mine eyes be matches (quoth he) and deceive me not, here is your mother, your wife, and children. Whereat, Coriolanus, turning like a man well near beside himself, arose from his seat, and ran to meet his mother, and to embrace her. But the woman falling in stead of prayers into a fit of choler: "Let me know (quoth she) before I suffer thee to embrace me, whether I am come to an enemy or to a son, whether I be in thy camp as a captive prisoner, or as a natural mother. And have I lived indeed so long, and rubbed on still in this miserable old age of mine for this, to see thee first M "a banished man; and after that to become an enemy? Couldst thou find in thine heart to waste and spoil that countrey which bred thee, which fostered thee, and brought thee up? And be "it that thou hither marched with a cruel intent and full of threats, would not thine anger and fell wrath slake, when thou didst set foot within the borders and marches thereof? And being come within the sight of Rome, arose not this in thy mind and thought, Within those walls yonder is my house, there are my house-gods, my mother, my wife, my children? Why then, belike if I had never been a mother, and born a child, Rome had not been assailed. And if I had no son at all, I might have died well enough in my native countrey, whiles it remained free. But as for me, neither can I suffer ought, more for thy dishonesty and shame; nor more to mine own calamity and misery than this: and most wretched cause though I be, yet long time so I N "cannot continue. But for these here, look thou well to it, I advise thee, and have pity of them, who if thou go on as thou beginnest, are like to feel untimely death, or endure long captivity. Then his wife and children hung about him, and clipped him: whereat the women fell a weeping on all sides, bewailing their own case and the state of their countrey. So as at length the man was overcome. And after he had taken them in his arms likewise, he let them go: and himself dislodged and removed his camp backward from the City. When he had withdrawn the legions out of the territory of Rome, he gat himself, men said, such hatred and displeasure for this action, that it cost him his life: and murdered he was, some report one way, some another. But I find in Fabius a most ancient writer, that he lived until he was an old man: who reporteth this of him: That oftentimes in his latter dayes he used to utter this speech, A heavy case and most O wretched, for an aged man to live banisht. The men of Rome envied not those women their due deserved praises. So free was the world in those dayes, from depraving and detracting the glory of others. For in memorial hereof to all posterity, there was a Temple built and dedicated to Fortuna Muliebris, i. Womens fortune.

After all this, the Volscians joyned the Equians unto them, and returned into the territory of Rome. But the Equians would no longer abide Acains to be their Commander. And upon this

A this strife between the Volscians and Equians, whether of them should appoint a General over the army raised jointly of them both, first they grew to a mutiny, and afterwards to a cruel battel. Such was the good fortune of the people of Rome, that two armies of their enemies, were thus by civil discord and contention, no less mortal than obstinate, overthrown and brought to naught. Consuls then, were T. Sicinius and C. Aquilius. To Sicinius were allotted the Volscians, and to Aquilius the Herniks (who also were out and up in arms) for their several Province. That year were the Herniks vanquished, but with the Volscians they fought to, as they departed on even hand, giving and taking the like.

After them were Sp. Cassius, and Proculus Virginus made Consuls. Then was there a league concluded with the Herniks, and two third parts of their Lands were taken from them. Whereof the one moiety, Cassius the Consul was minded to distribute among the Latins, the other among the Commoners. To this donation he laid too also a good portion of ground, which being Commons by right, he found much fault, that it was in the tenure and possession of private persons. This act of his made diverse of the Senators, namely, such as were great landed men and interested therein, to startle for fear of hazarding their estate. Over and besides, the Senators all in general were in great perplexity, lest that the Consul by this largess should rise by popular favour to such greatness, as might prejudice their free holds, yea and endanger the very main chance of publick liberty. And this was the first time that the law Agraria was published: and so forward unto this present hour, it was never debated of, but with exceeding great fears and

C troubles of the State. The other Consul withstood this largess, with the general consent of the Senators, and without contradiction of some Commoners: who at the very first began to mislike, and utterly abhor, that the donation was so common, and from the natural citizens, extended to their allies and confederates. Moreover, they might oftentimes hear even the Consul himself, Virginus, openly in his solemn Orations before the people, to deliver by way of prophesie, and as it were to prognosticate, "That this was a pestilent largess of his brother Consul, and that those grounds would in the end enthrall the takers thereof, and that it was the very high way to set up a Kingdom again. For to what other intent (I pray you) were their allies, and the nation of the Latins associate in the same? To what purpose either, was a third part of the Lands won by conquest, given again to the Herniks, professed enemies but a while before, but that these nations might have

D "Cassius to be such another Captain of theirs, as Coriolanus was. And thus by disswading and crossing the law Agraria, he became now to be popular and gracious with the people. Then both Consuls strived much, who might please and gratify the Commons most. Virginus, by giving out that he would maintain and suffer the Lands to be divided, so they were assigned to none but to the citizens of Rome: Cassius again, who in the largess of the Lands, seemed to Court and insinuate himself with the allies and thereby was of the citizens less regarded and reputed to the end, that by some other benefit he might regain the hearts of his country men was of opinion, and made a motive, that the money which was received for the Sicilian corn, should be repayed unto the people. But the Commons refused and abhorred that, as a very bribe and ready bait for a Scepter and Crown. So greatly were all his gifts, for the deep rooted insipition and jealousy

E of his aspiring to a Kingdom, loathed in the conceits of men, as if they had flowed in wealth, and been rich enough. And for certain it is recorded, that so soon as he left his Office, he was condemned and put to death. Some report, that his own father did the execution: and that upon examination privately had at home within his house, he finding him faulty, whipped him first, and so killed him, and consecrated the goods and chattels of his son, as a Deodand to Ceres, whereof a Statue or Image was made, with this Inscription or Title, Given out of the house of Cassius. I find in some records (which soundeth nearer to the truth) that he was by the Quæstors of Casus Fabius, and L. Valerius, endited of treason, and being convicted, was by a verdict of the people condemned, and his house by order from the whole City, rased and pulled down. And at this day, it is the voyd yard that lieth before the Temple of Tellus. But howsoever he had his tryal and

F judgement, privately or openly, condemned he was when Ser. Cornelius and Q. Fabius were Consuls. Long continued not the peoples anger and spight against Cassius. So sweet was the law Agraria in it self, that when the Author and Upholder thereof was out of the World, they longed to have it on foot again. Which desire of theirs was the rather set on fire, through the pinching niggardise of the Senators, who having that year subdued the Volscians and Equians, kept the souldiers fasting, and defrauded them of the spoil. For what prizes soever were gotten from the enemies, the Consul Fabius sold and brought into the Exchequer or Chamber of the City.

Now was the name of Fabius already odious to the Commonalty, for the last Consuls sake: yet obtained the Senators so much, and held their own so, as Casus Fabius was created Consul with L. Emilius. This made the Common more malicious and bent to mischief. And sedition at home caused war abroad. For rain war restrain'd civil discord for a while. Both Senators and Commons with one accord, under the conduct of Emilius, fought fortunately with the rebellious Volscians and Equians, and defeated them. Howbeit more enemies perished in the chase, than were slain in the battel: so hotly the horsemen pursued them when they were once discomfited and gave not over. The same year was the Temple of Cæstor, consecrated in the Ides of Quintilis. It had been vowed aforesaid in the Latins war by Posthumus the Dictator. His son was created Dumvir, for that purpose, and dedicated it.

This

This year also the Commons hearts were set upon the law Agraria; and longed afresh after the sweetness thereof. The Tribuns of the Commonalty graced and credited their popular authority, with propounding a law as popular and acceptable to the people. But the Senators supposing verily that the multitude was furious and outrageous enough, and too much of themselves, without any hire and reward, stood in great dread and horror of these largesses, as the very allurements and provocations, of rash and heady attempts: & the stoutest champions of their side to withstand the law, were the Consuls. That part therefore and State of the City had the better hand, not only this present year, but for the next ensuing. For they chose M. Fabius Casso his brother, for the one Consul, and L. V. Ierius for the other, a man of the swain more odious in the eyes of the Commons, in regard of his late accusation of Sp. Cassius. In which year also there was strife and much ado with the Tribuns. But both law and law-makers with their glorious bragging and vaunting of their goodly donative, which they could not effect, proved vain and came to nothing. Upon this, the name of Fabij, who after three Consulships together one after another, by them born continually without intermission, were inured and tried in the broils and contentions of Tribuns, was in great request and reputation: and in their house and family remained still for a good while after, that dignity, as an honor well and worthily bestowed upon them. Then began the Veientian war, and the Volscians likewise rebelled. But for any wars abroad whatsoever, they had strength enough and to spare, if by jars at home among their own selves they had not abused the same.

Besides this disquietness and affliction of all mens minds, occasioned by these dissensions, there happened (to amend the matter well) prodigious, and strange tokens from Heaven, daily in a manner threatening both in City and Country the heavy hand of God. And when as the soothsayers and wizards were sent out unto, to search forth the cause of Gods wrath and indignation both in publick and private, as well by inspection of the inwards of sacrificed beasts, as by aspect of birds and fowls, they could assign it to nothing else but this, that there was some error committed in their sacrifices and divine liturgie: Those fearful and prodigious signs proceeded still so far, that one Oppia a vestal Nun, convicted and condemned of incest, suffered death.

After this, followed Q. Fabius and C. Tullius Consuls. In which year the discord at home was nothing leis, and the war abroad far greater. For the Equians rose up in arms: the Veientians also entered the confines, and made much spoil. And while they were more and more careful about these wars what order to take, Casso Fabius and Sp. Furius, were made Consuls. By this time the Equians assaulted Artonaa City in Latium. And the Veientians having sped themselves with prizes and booties, made great cracks that they would give an assault upon the very City of Rome. These fearful news, which ought to have abated and taken down the stomachs of the Commons, made them much more fierce and fell, and they returned of themselves unto their old bias of refusing warfare: but Sp. Licinius their Tribune, thinking now the time was come to enforce upon the Senators the law Agraria, upon this exigent and extream point of necessity, had taken upon him to stop the levying and setting out of an army. But he drew upon his own head the whole hatred and displeasure of the Tribuns themselves and their authority. For the Consuls opposed themselves against him no more bitterly than his own companions in office: by whose assistance the Consuls went through with the Muster. And for two wars at once, there were enrolled two armies. The one under the leading of Fabius, against the Equians, the other, against the Veientians commanded by Furius. Against whom there was nothing done worthy of remembrance. As for Fabius, he had somewhat more to do with his own men than with his enemies. That man himself alone was he, that being Consul upheld the Common-weal, which his army for hatred of their Consul, had as much as in them lay, utterly betrayed. For when as he (above many other warlike feats and parts of a right worthy General, whereof he shewed singular proof, both in preparation, and also in managing of the war) had so marshalled and ranged his battail, that with sending out the horsemen only, he disordered and brake the ranks of his enemies host: behold, the footmen would not follow on after that disaray: neither, when the exhortation of their leader whom they hated, prevailed not, could their own shame at least-wise, and the publick dishonor for the present: no, nor yet the imminent danger like to ensue (in case the enemy had taken heart again and made head) force them to amend their pace one jot, and make more speed. Neither could he possibly make them (if to do nothing else) so much as to march still in battail array: but full against his commandment they retire with their ensigns: and as men sory in their hearts and ill apaid, (he that had seen them would have said they had lost the field) cursing their General one while, and the valiant service of the horsemen another while, they return to their Tents. Neither wist the General what way to remedy this so pestilent an example and dangerous precedent. Thus we may see, that brave men, of singular and excellent wits, have been more to seek and fail in their skill, how to govern a subject than to vanquish an enemy. The Consul returneth to Rome, having purchased more hatred of his froward and stubborn souldiers, than won honor by his martial prowess. Nevertheless, the Senators prevailed so much that the Consulship kept residence still in the name of the Fabij. So, they created M. Fabius Consul, and joyn with him Cn. Manlius for his colleague.

This year likewise, had one patrone and maintainer of the law Agraria, to wit, Tiberius Pontificius a Tribune. He taking the same course, and following the steps of Sp. Licinius, hindered the

The disobedience of soldiers to their Captain,

A the musters for a while. And when the Senators were herewith disquieted again, then Ap. Claudius arose up and said, "That the year before, the Tribunes power was overmatched, and the neck of it broken in proof, only for that present, but in example for ever hereafter: forasmuch as it was well seen then by experience, that of it self even among their own selves it fell apieces: and never will there want at any time one good Tribune or other, that would be glad to get the start and victory of his fellow, yea, and the favour also of the better part, for to purchase the good of the weal-publike. And that there would be more Tribunes, if more were needfull; ready to assist the Consuls: and if there were but one, even that one were sufficient to stand against all the rest. So that the Consuls and LL. of the Councill would but do their endeavour, to win unto the State and Senate, some certain of the Tribunes, if they might not compass all. The Senators being thus schooled and taught their lessons by Appius, both all ingenerall would courteously salute and friendly intreat the Tribunes, and also in parricular as many of them as had been Consuls, according to that interest that each man had in any one of them privately, partly by favour and friendship, and partly by countenance and authority, prevailed so with them, that they were willing and well content to employ the Tribunes authority to the good and safety of the Common-weale. So by the help of foure Tribunes, against one that hindred the good of all, the Consuls took muster of the souldiers. Then set they forward on their voyage to war with the Veientians: unto whom from all parts of Hetruria they came, to aid and succour; not so much for any love that they bare to the Veientians, as in hope that the puissance of Rome through intestine and civill dissention, would decay and come to nought. For in all the Diets and Assemblies of the States of Hetruria, the Princes and Peers gave it out and said, That the power and greatness of the Romans was everlasting, if through mutuall discord they warred here so among themselves: which hath been found the only bane of wealthy and flourishing Cities, where y mighty Empires became mortall and subject to a finall end. "Which mischief (say they) this long time hath been prevented and delayed, partly through the sage advise and prudent government of the Senate, partly by the patience and long sufferance of the Commons: but now they are come to a great extremity. Divided they are, and of one City become twain: each part have their severall Magistrates and laws by themselves. At the first, however they were wont to be at odds, and to fall out at the mustering of souldiers, yet in war they would hold together, and obey their Captains. Howsoever they fared at home in the City, were the State never so far out of order, yet so long as martiall discipline was on foot and took place, they might be reclaimed, and all troubles staid. But now, the former use and custome of disobeying Magistrates within the City, is taken up by the Roman souldiers in the very Camp. For no longer since than the last war of all, in the time of battell and conflict, their whole Army agreed of their own accord, not forced by any extremity that they were put unto, for to give the Veientians, as much as in them lay, even after they had lost the field, the entire victory and honour of the day. For they abandoned their ensigns, left their Generall alone in the skirmish, and against his will, retired themselves into the Camp. And surely, if they hold on still this course, Rome may be won by means of her own souldiers: there needs no more to do, but to proclaim and make a shew of war: For even the very destinies and gods themselves would performe all the rest. Upon these hopes and deep perswasions, the Tuscans, who afore were wont otherwhiles to have the better, and sometimes to take the worse in their wars, put themselves in arms. The Roman Consuls likewise were in fear of nothing else so much, as of their own power, their own force and weapons: being affrighted at the remembrance of that foul and shameful example, and that lewd part plaid in the last war: lest peradventure they should put it upon this point of hazard, as to be in danger of two battels at once. And therefore in so doubtfull and perillous a case, they held off fight, and kept themselves within their Camp, if haply time and space would assuage their anger, bring them into the right way again, and reclaim them to good and reasonable order. The enemies hereat, as well Veientians as the other Tuscans, made the greater haste, and were more sharp set, and provoked them to the field: first by riding up and down before their Camp, hard at the gates thereof, braving and challenging them forth, at the last, seeing they could not prevail, they fell to rating and railing, one while upon the Consuls themselves, another while upon the whole Army, in these and such like terms: "A gay matter indeed, and a proper device to save their cowardise, and under a colour of civill dissention to cloak their fearfulness: and the Consuls forsooth mistrust more the faithfulness and loyalty of their souldiers in service, than they doubted their valour and sufficiency of service. Mary, here is indeed a new kind of mutiny. What? Armed men to hold their peace, and sit still? Hitting them in their teeth besides, with their new start-up rising, and late sprung base beginning letting fly against them lies and truths, one with another, and spared not. For all this foule stir they kept, flouting and reviling them under their very trench, and hard at their gates, the Consuls themselves were not one jot troubled. But the foolish and ignorant multitude what with anger, and what for shame of these reproachfull terms, was much distempered: and one whiles wholly gave over to regard and thinke upon home troubles and dissentions, and had rather than their lives be revenged of their enemies: Anon again, they would not in any case gratifie the Nobles and Consuls, nor wish them good success. Thus the hatred both against the enemies without, and the Consuls within, trove together in their hearts: untill at length forrain occasions got the mastery over them: so proudly,

The politike practise of Appius Claudius to abate the Tribunes authority,

The speeches of the Tuscan Princes in their Councils, so insolently, the enemy scorned and made a game of them. Whereupon they came thick by troops to the Generals pavilion, calling upon them for to fight, requiring to put forth the banner and signall of battell. The Consuls laid their heads together, and as taking good advisement, conferred on the matter a good while. To fight they were most willing and desirous: but this desire was to be kept back and dissembled, and thereby augmented: to the end, that by holding off, by opposing themselves, and making some stay, they might set the souldiers on, and being once set on it, they might make them follow more eagerly at once. In conclusion, this answer was returned unto them: That they made too much haste: it was not yet full ripe, nor the time come, to give battell: they must hold themselves contented, and keep within their tents: proclaiming moreover, that no man be so hardy as to fight: and whosoever attempted it, without their warrant and commission, they would proceed against him with all rigour, as a professed enemy. Thus were they dismissed. And the les willing they thought the Consuls were, the more eager were they, and set upon a battell. The enemies besides, when they had intelligence, that the Consuls were not disposed to fight, and had taken order to the contrary, were inkindled and inflamed so much the more. For now they supposed they might brave it, and insult upon them safely without danger. For why? The Consuls durst not trust the souldiers with weapon in hand: "now were their mutinies come to the height, and to break forth in extremities: now and never before the Roman Empire and Dominion was at an end. Presuming confidently upon this ground, they run together unto the gates, redoubling a thousand villanous and opprobrious terms, and much ado they had to forbear assaulting the camp. Now could the Romans on the other side hold no longer, & endure this contumely and indignity, but came running from all parts of the camp unto the Consuls. And now not leisurely as before, make they request, and by mediation of their chief centurions, but all at once on every side plied them with outcries and clamors. Now was the matter come to ripeness, yet slow were the Consuls, still and hold off. Then Fabius, seeing the tumult increased & that for fear of a mutiny, his brother Consul had yielded already, caused silence to be made by sound of trumpet, and thus he spake: "I know full well O Manlius, that these fellows are able to win the victory: but that they will so do I know not, and they themselves have caused me to doubt. I have therefore set down my rest, and fully resolved not to give the signal of battell, unless they swear to return out of the field with victory. Once did the souldiers in battell deceive a Consul, of Rome: but the gods in heaven shall they never deceive. Then M. Flavius, a Centurion, one of the foremost that called for battell so instantly, "Return will I (quoth he) O M. Fabius, victor out of the field: and if I fail, then I beseech father Jupiter, Mars, Gradivus and other gods to make me a fearful example, and shew their wrathfull displeasure upon me. The same oath after him took the whole army, every man against himself. Thus when they had sworn the trumpet sounded. Then buckle they themselves toward battell, full of anger, full of hope. Now they bid the Tuscans revile and rail their fill: now being at all points armed, they wished they had afore them man to man their enemies, those that were so lively and lusty with their tongues. Right valiantly bare themselves that day, as well the Commons as the Nobles. But the name of the Fabii, the Fabii I say, passed all the rest and won the spurs. Who in this piece of service purposed to gain again the hearts of the Commons, which in many civil contentions were set against them. And so they embattelled themselves. The enemies likewise, both the Veientians and also the Tuscan legions were nothing behind, as making almost sure reckoning that they should be fought, withall no more than the Equians had been. Nay they were in hope of some greater disorder amongst them, and that, considering they were so malecontent, and the occasion so doubtfull they would play a more shamefull part, and shew their leaders a beastly cast. But it fell out far otherwise. For never in any other war afore, gave the Romans a hotter charge upon the enemies: so much had they of the one side with spitefull taunts and reproaches nettled them, and the Consuls on the other side with their long delays whet them on. Scarce had the Tuscans any time to put themselves in battell array, but at the very first encounter, and shock, casting their javelins carelessly from them (I know not how) rather than levelling and charging them against the enemy, they came presently pell-mell to hand-strokes, and to deal with their swords, which is the cruellest fight of all other. The Fabii among the foremost in the forefront fought valiantly, shewing their countermen a brave sight, and a noble example to follow. Where Q. Fabius who had been Consul the third year before, the leader and forwardest of them all, whiles he advanced himself and rushed amongst the thickest of the Veientians, and scuffled with many of them together, was not aware of his deadly enemy so near: but behold a certain Tuscan, a mighty man of strength and skilfull at his weapon, ran him through the breast with his sword: Which was not so soon drawn forth of his body, but Fabius fell down headlong upon his wound and died. Both armies felt the fall of that one man: and therewith the Romans retired. With that M. Fabius, the Consul stepped over his body as it lay along, and holding forth his target between: "Why, souldiers (quoth he) is the oath ye took to run away and retire thus into the Camp? And are ye more afraid indeed, of these most dastardly enemies, than of Jupiter and Mars, by whom ye swear? But I, who was not sworn at all, will either make return with victory, or else O Q. Fabius, fighting here by thee, I will live and die by thy side. To whom, Cassius Fabius, who the year afore was Consul, replied again: "Think you brother, with these words to make them to fight? Nay, the gods are they that must do it, by whom they have sworn. And let us like noble Knights, and for the honour of the Fabian house,

brother Consul.

A "stir up and animate our souldiers by fighting rather than by exhorting. Thus rode the two Fabii with lance in rest into the forefront, and drew the whole battel with them. The fight of one side being thus renewed, Cn. Manlius the Consul in the other wing bestirred himself, and did for his part as valiantly: Where hapned almost the like fortune. For as in the one wing the souldiers followed Q. Fabius, so in this they cheerfully went with the Consul himself Manlius, chasing the enemies afore him as discomfited. And when he was sore wounded, and thereupon gone out of the battel, his men supposing him to be slain, drew back, and had indeed lost ground and given way to the enemy, but that the other Consul with certain Cornets of horsemen, galloped amain into that quarter, and cried aloud that his fellow Consul was living: and that himself who had defeated the other point, was ready with victory to assist them, and so upheld the middle of the Army, that now began to shrink. Manlius also, to encourage his men, shewed himself in open fight. Thus the knowledge and presence of the two Consuls made the souldiers take heart afresh. Herewithall besides, were the enemies batralions the thinner and weaker, because they trusting upon their exceeding number, had drawn out those that were to serve for succour and supply, and sent them away to assaile the Camp. In the surprising whereof, finding no great ado and small resistance, whiles they had more mind to rattle for pillage, than to fight for the victory, they lost time. In the mean space the Roman Triarii, who were not able to hold out the first assault and entrance, having dispatched to the Consuls certain messengers, to give knowledge in what terms they stood, cast themselves round in a ring, and retired themselves to the Prætorium or Generals lodging, and of themselves alone, made head and renewed the fight. Likewise Manlius the Consul being ridden back to the Camp, at every gate set certain souldiers in guard: and so enclosed them within, that they could not get forth. The Tuscans being in this desperate case, fared more like mad men than hardy souldiers. For when as they ran here and there every way, according as they had any hope to find issue and to escape, and had made sundry offers and attempts in vain: behold one troupe of tall fellows in a body, made no more ado, but knowing the Consul, who by reason of brave and goodly armour was a fair mark, charged upon his own person. The first volley of their shot was received by those that stood about him, but their violence afterwards could not be endured. The Consul himself was wounded to death and fell down in the place, and all the rest were discomfited. Whereupon the Tuscans took more heart unto them, but the Romans were so distressed, that they ran all about the Camp in great fear. And in extrem jeopardy had they been, but that the Lieutenants caught up the Consul his body, and made passage at one gate for the enemy. Through which they rushed forth, and dismarched disorderly, untill they light upon the other Consul presently after his victory: where they either fell again upon the edge of the sword, or were scattered and put to flight. This brave Victory thus achieved, was heavy yet and sorrowful for the death of two so noble personages. And therefore when the Senate had decreed a Triumph, the Consul returned this answer: "That willingly he could allow thereof in regard of the passing good service performed in that war, in case an Army might triumph without a General. But as for himself, seeing that his house grieved and mourned for the death of his brother Q. Fabius, and that the Common-wealth was half fatherless as it were, for the loss of a Consul, he would not accept the Lawrell so deformed and foully blemished, both with publike and private sorrow. This Triumph thus by him refused, was more honourable than all the Triumphs in the world. By which we may see that glory despised in due time returneth otherwhiles in greater measure. Then solemnized he with great honour the obsequies one after another, first of his fellow Consul, and then of his own brother. And he himself made the funeral Orations for them both. But so as in yielding unto them their due commendations, he went himself away with the greater part. And not unmindful of that rule which he had learned in the beginning of the Consulship, namely, to win again the hearts and love of the Commons, he divided the cure of his hurt and wounded souldiers among the Senators. With most of them the Fabii were charged, and of none were they better tended and looked unto, than of them. Whereupon the Fabii now waxed popular, and that, for no other policy and intent, but only to do the Common-wealth good: and therefore with the favour and good will of the Commons, as well as of the Nobles, Cæso Fabius was created Consul, with T. Virginus: Whose principal care above all was this, even before war, before musters, before all things else, that seeing now in some measure there was good hope of concord begun already, the hearts of the Commons might be perfectly linked and united together with the Nobles, and that with all speed possible. In the beginning therefore of this year, before that any Tribune of the Commons should prefer the law Agrovia, he thought good and gave his advice, that the Nobles should prevent all, and go in hand first themselves to perform their part, and shew their bounty: namely, in parting the lands gotten by conquest, and freely bestowing the same as equally as might be, among the Commons. For it was meet and requisite that they should be possessed thereof, whose sweat of brows, nay, whose blood had paid for the purchase. But the Senators could not hear of that ear, but misliked of the motion: yea, and some of them complained and said, that the lively spirit, and couragious disposition of Cæso, which sometimes he had, was now by reason of excessive glory, grown to be toyish and full of vanities. And there an end of civil factions for a time.

But the Latines were much troubled with the incursions and inrodes of the Equians. Thither was Caso with an Army sent, who invaded and overran the very country of the Equians, foraging and spoiling as he went. The Equians thereupon retired, & put themselves into their towns; and kept close within the walls, whereby there was no memorable field fought. But at their enemies the Veientians hand, they received an overthrow, and that through the rashness of the other Consul: and had not Caso Fabius come to the rescue in good time, the whole Army had been utterly lost. From that time there was neither war nor peace with the Veientians: but their dealing was much what after the manner of robbing. For when the Roman Legions were abroad, they would leave the field & take to their Cities: when they perceived the Legions were removed and gone, they would make excursions and waste the country. Thus plaid they mock-holiday, and dallied with them, shifting off war with quietness, and quietness again with war, by turns. So as the Romans could neither all wholly rest careless and secure for them, nor yet go through-stitch, & make an end once for all with them. Besides, other wars were either presently at hand, to wit, from the Equians and the Volsicians, who could no longer sit still, than until their fresh grief, and pain of the last defeature was over-past; or else the Sabins, never other but enemies, yea, and all Herruria, were like all shortly to rise and take arms. But the Veientian a continual enemy, rather than dangerous, provoked them to anger with reproachful taunts, oftner than with any great peril or hurt. And yet as little as it was, it might no time be neglected, nor gave them leave to be employed in the mean while elsewhere. Then came the whole house and kindred of the Fabii unto the Senat, in the name of them all spake the Consul in this wise: "My Lords of the Senat, the Veientian war had need rather of a resident garrison, as ye know well enough, to keep the frontiers, than great forces for expedition. As for you, see ye to other wars. Let the Fabii alone to deal as private enemies with the Veientians. We dare undertake and warrant, that the State of Rome shall receive no dishonour nor danger there. We are fully minded and resolved at our own proper cost and charges, to maintain and manage that war, as appropriate and peculiar to our name and family: the City shall be charged neither with men nor money there. Great thanks were given them for this their forwardness. The Consul being come out of the Senator house, was attended home with the whole generation of the Fabii who stood at the porch of the Council Court, expecting the Senats decree. And being commanded to be ready in armor well appointed the next day, and to give attendance at the Consuls door, they departed from thence home to their own houses. The bruit hereof spread all over the City. All men extoll the Fabii up to the skie, saying, "That one family had taken upon them the whole burden of the City. The Veientian war now is become (say they) a privat charge, and requireth the power and force only that privat persons could make. O that there were two such families more in Rome of that stomack and valour: that one of them might take the Volsicians in hand, and another the Equians. Surely all the nations bordering hereabout might soon be subdued, and the people of Rome sit still the while and rest in peace. The day following, the Fabii armed themselves, mounted on horseback, and repaired to the Rendezvous aforesaid, as they were commanded. Then came the Consul forth, clad in a rich coat of arms, and standing in his porch, beheld his whole blood and lineage armed and marshalled in order, and being received in the midst of them, caused the guidons and Cornets to be advanced. Never marched three along the City an Army either less in number, or more renowned for their fame and the admiration of men. Three hundred men of arms they were and six, all nobly descended, of one stock, of one race and name all. And of all them there was not one that a sage and prudent Senate would have refused at any time as insufficient to be a Leader and Commander in the field. Thus furnished with the force and strength that one only Family could make, they advanced forward, threatening and menacing the ruin and destruction of the Veientians. There followed a number and multitude of Citizens: one private company by themselves of kinsfolk, allies, friends, and fellows, casting in their minds no mean matters, neither of hope nor fear, but all exceeding measure and surpassing: another, of the common people, moved with a carefull regard, and astonished again in a favourable applaus and admiration of their enterprize, crying with one voice, Hold on right valiant Knights, March on a Gods name in happy hour; God grant lucky speed, answerable to your magnanimous attempts and designments: and look for, at our hands from henceforth, Consulships, triumphs, all rewards and honourable dignities whatsoever. And all the way as they passed along the Capitol, the Castle and other Temples they besought the gods, as many as were presented to their eye, as many as they could conceive in their minds, to vouchsafe that Squadron to be attended upon with good success and fortunate felicity, and soon to return home again in safety to their native country and loving parents. But, alas the while, in vain were all these prayers made. Then set they forward on their journey, leaving Janus Church on their right hand, taking the ungracious and unlucky way, from the gate Carmentalis, untill at length they came to the river * Cremera. That was thought a convenient place to fortifie in, and there to plant a garrison. After this were L. Aemilius and C. Servilius made Consuls. And so long as they adventured no farther than foraging the Country, the Fabii were good enough, not only to defend their hold and fort; but all their frontier parts and marches where the Tuscan Territory adjoyneth to the Roman, they so scoured and traversed, between the one confine and the other, that they kept all their own in safety, and mightily endamaged the enemies. Then surceased they a while, but it was not long, from waisting and spoiling. By which time both the Veientians had gathered

A power out of Hetruria, and assaulted the fort of Cremera, and also the Roman Legions, under the conduct of the Consul L. Emilius, encountered the Tuscans in open field. And yet the Veientians had hardly time enough to put themselves in order of battell: so suddenly at the very first skirmish, while the files were entering into array under their colours in the vanguard, and the succours and supplies a placing and disposing in the rereward, a Cornet of Roman horse charged them so hotly on the flank, that they had not room and space either to begin fight, or to keep their standing sure. Thus were they discomfited, and chased back as far as Saxa rubra, i.e. Red rocks (for there they were encamped) where they humbly craved peace. Which when they had obtained, (see their inbred inconstancy so naturally engrafted) they were weary of it, and repented thereof before the Roman garrison could be withdrawn from Cremera. And so the Fabii once again skirmished with the Veientian Nation, without preparation of greater war. Neither made they inroads only, and sudden violent incursions into the Territories but sundry times they encountered with banners displayed, and joined battell in plain field. And that one house and kindred of the Roman people carried oftentimes the victory away from that most mighty and rich City (in those daies) of all the Tuscans. This took the Veientians at the first for a foul disgrace and indignity. But afterwards they devised to lay traps, as occasion should serve, and entrap their fierce and hardy enemy: and well apaid they were and rejoiced, that the Fabii upon the good success that still followed them, were become more bold and venturous. And therefore divers times when the Romans were abroad a plundering, they would drive cattel in their way, but yet so, as they might seem to light upon them by chance. The rustical peasants made shew as if they fled out of the Country, and left the fields waile: yea, and the companies of souldiers lent out to restrain and stay their spoiling, made shew of running away, pretending other they were afraid than they had cause indeed. So as now the Fabii by this time set so light by their enemies, and thought so well of themselves, that they beleaved verily their power was invincible, and might not be withstood in any ground, or at any time whatsoever. This conceit and hope of theirs let them so afloat, and made them so bold, that espying upon a time cattel far from Cremera, (for there was a large plain between) although here and there they might descry armed souldiers of their enemies, yet from their fort they ran down, with bridle in their horse neck. And when unadvisedly without foresight, they were past the ambush, which was laid covertly about the very way that they were to pass, and were stragling here and there disorderly, driving the cattel away, which gadded in and out, as their manner is when they be scared and affrighted, then suddenly start the enemies all at once out of the ambushment: so as both before and behind, and on every side they were beset and environed with enemies. At the first the very shouting and outcry they made round about terrified them: afterwards flew their shot from all sides. And as the Tuscans gathered themselves together, the Fabii were soon hemmed within a round battallion of enemies, standing armed thick and close one to another: and the nearer the enemies approached about them, in so much less room were they enforced also to cast themselves into a ring. Which, considering their araises were thrust so thick together in so straight a compals, made their small number appear the less, and the multitude of the Tuscans to carry a greater shew. Then forbearing to fight as they first intended, on every hand alike, and with all at once, they made head to one only place. Thereto they endeavour with might and main, body and armour; and with a pointed pattel wedgewise pierced through and made themselves passage. And they took the way that led to a little hill, rising up with an easie ascent. From whence at first they made resistance only and kept their ground: but soon after, when by reason of the vantage of the hill, they had some time to breath themselves, and to take heart again after so great a fright, they forced the enemies also to give back that were mounting up the hill. And as few in number as they were, yet by the benefit of the ground they had gotten the better, if the Veientians had not set a compals about the hill side, and gained the very top and pitch thereof. Thus became the enemy again to have the upper hand. And so were the Fabii slain every man, and not one of them escaped, yea, and their fort overthrowne and raled. Three hundred and six there were that died, as all writers do agree. One only of the name was left behind at home, well near fourteen years of age, for to renew and encrease, as out of a stock, the name of the Fabii, and to prove in time to come the greatest prop and pillar that the people of Rome should have in their dangers and extremities many a time both at home and abroad.

But ere this heavy loss and overthrow hapned, C. Horatius and T. Menenius were Consuls. Menenius was sent forth with against the Tuscans, puffed now up with pride for this their victory: with whom then also he fought unfortunately and sped but ill. For the enemies surprised and got the Janiculum, and the City had surely been besieged, (considering that besides war they were greatly distressed for want of victuals, for the Tuscans were passed over the Tyber) but that Horatius the Consul was called home from the Volscians. And so near approached the enemies in this war, and pressed to the very walls, that first there was a skirmish on even hand at the Temple of  Sp.:* and another again at the gate Collina. Where albeit the Romans got but very small odds of the enemy, yet did that conflict upon a little recovery of wonted courage prepare the souldiers to better service in the battels ensuing.

Now were A. Virginus and Sp. Servilius created Consuls. The Veientians after this late defeat, came no more into the field, yet they robbed and wasted still. And from the Janiculum as from a fortress and place of safe retreat, they would make excursions out into the Territory of Rome all about, and neither cattle nor country people could any where be in safety for them. But afterwards, they were overtaken themselves in the same wile that they had taught the Fabii with. For as they followed after certain cattle, which were driven forth here and there of purpose to draw and trau them abroad, they were plunged themselves headlong into an Ambuscado laid for them. And the more they were, the greater was their slaughter. Upon this foil, their cruel and fell anger gave the occasion and overture of a greater overthrow. For having crossed the Tiber in the night season, they gave the attempt to make an assault upon the Camp of the Consul Servilius. But being discomfited, and many of them slain, the rest retired themselves from thence, and with much ado recovered the Janicle. Straight after this, the Consul also passed over Tyber, and encampeth himself strongly under the Janiculum. The morrow morning by Sun rising, so venturous he was by reason of his fortunate fight the day before, and more for the scarcity of corn and victuals, which drave him to take he cared not how rash and dangerous courses, so they tended to more quick and speedy expedition, full fondly he advanced forward, and marched up the steep hill of the Janicle, and charged the enemies hold: but being set back himself from thence more shamefully than he had the day before repelled the enemies: yet by occasion that his fellow Consul came in the while to rescue, he and his Army both were saved: and the Tuscans enclosed between both hosts, were forced to turn their backs, both to one and the other, and were killed every mothers son. Thus by a rash enterprise (which as good luck was) sped well, the Veientian war came to an end. The City then, as it enjoyed peace, so it came again to be better stored of corn and victual: both for that there was some grain brought out of Campania, and also because the old store that was hoorded up came abroad, by reason that no man now stood in fear of dearth to ensue.

Afterwards upon plenty and ease they began to be busie again, and their heads to work, seeking to broach old troubles at home, since they had none to occupy them abroad. The Tribunes they fell to sollicite and infect the Commons, with their venome and poyson, the Law Agria: inciting them against the Nobles that gain said it: not in general terms only, but also by touching particular persons. For Q. Confidius and T. Genutius, who were for the Law Agria, framed an inditement, and sued T. Menenius. And this was laid to his charge, to wit, the loss of the fort and garrison at Cremora: for that, he being Consul lay encamped not far from thence. But of this danger he soon stopped the course, both because the Nobles laboured and took his part, no less than they had done afore for Coriolanus: and also the affection and favour that men bare to his father Agrippa, was not worn out, and clean forgot. The Tribunes used moderation therefore in the penalty, for having commenced a capital action against him, and convicted him thereof, they set a fine on his head of * 2000 Asles. Howbeit this cost him his life: for he grew, men say, into such a melancholick fit for shame of this disgrace, that he fell thereupon from grief of heart unto a pining sickness which followed him to his dying day. Then was there another accused and brought into trouble, to wit, Sp. Servilius, so soon as he was out of his Consulship, at what time as C. Nautius, and P. Valerius were Consuls. In the beginning of whose year the Tribunes L. Cadius and T. Statius, called him straightwaies to his answer. Who sustained the violence of the Tribunes, not as Menenius did, by his own intreaty and the prayers of the Nobles, but bare himself confidently upon his own innocency, and the good grate wherein he stood. Blamed he was likewise, and charged for the battel with the Tuscans at Janiculum. But being a man of an hot spirit and stout courage, as he carried himself before in the publike danger, so now in his own private peril, by refusing in a bold and stout speech that he made, not only the Tribunes, but also the Commonalty, and casting in their teeth and reproving them, for the condemnation and death of T. Menenius, by whose fathers means the Commons being in times past restored, had obtained first those very Magistrates and Laws, whereby at this day they exercise such rigour: he went through all his troubles, and with much boldness avoided the present jeopardy he stood in. The testimony of his Colleague Virginus stood him in great stead, who produced forth as a witness, made him partner with himself in all his worthy acts. But that process of judgment which passed against Menenius (so altered were they now, and repented therefore) did him much more good, and struck it dead sure.

When this broil and contention was ended at home, the Veientians war began abroad: to whom the Sabins also had joyned their power. Whereupon the Consul P. Valerius, with the aid of the Latines and Hernicks, was sent out with an Army to Veii: and incontinently he set upon the tents of the Sabins, as they lay encamped under the wals of their confederates: and put such a terrour amongst them, that while they ran forth scattering by bands and companies, some at one gate some at another, to repell the violent assault of the enemies, it hapned that the gate which he first advanced his ensigns against, was won. And within the trench small fight there was, but more man-slaughter. The tumult and noise hereof was heard from out of the Camp into the City. And the Veientians in great fear ran hastily to their weapons, as if Veii had been surpris'd. Some make speed to succour the Sabins: others do what they can to assail the Romans, who were wholly busied about the pillage of the Camp. For a pretty while they were put to some trouble, disordered, and withdrawn from their purpose: but afterwards they themselves advanced their banners, and made head against the one side and the other. The horsemen with all, sent in by the Consul, brake

A brake the Tuscans array, and put them to flight. And thus in one hour two armies were defeated, two most puissant nations, and nearest neighbours to the Romans vanquished.

Sibins and Veientians vanquished.

Whiles these exploits were performed about Veii, the Volscians and Equians had encamped themselves in the Country of Latium, and harried the marches thereof. Whom the Latines of themselves, with the help only of the Hernikes, and without any Leader or aid at all from the Romans, forced to abandon their tents: and besides the recovery of their own goods again, achieved a great and rich booty. Notwithstanding all this, the Consul Nautius was sent from Rome against the Volscians. They were not well pleased, I believe, with the manner of it, that their allies should wage war at all with their own power and direction, without the Army and conduct of the Romans. He spared not to work all the mischief he could, all abuse and spite possible against the Volscians; yet could not they be brought to fight a set field. Then succeeded L. Furius, and C. Manlius, Consuls. To Manlius fell the charge of the Veientian Province. Howbeit, war there was none at all. But at their own suite, a truce was granted unto them of forty years. And they were enjoined to find corn and souldiers pay. Peace was not so soon procured abroad, but presently ensued discord at home. For at the instigation of the Tribunes, by occasion of the Law Agraria, the Commons were set a madding. But the Consuls skared neither with the condemnation of Menenius, nor yet with the peril wherein Servilius stood, resisted all they could. And when the Consuls were ouce out of their Office, Genucius a Tribune laid hold upon them, and arrested them: and L. Emilius with Opiter Virginus enter their Consulship. In some Annals or yearly records I find Opiter Julius Consul instead of Virginus. But in this year, whosoever then were Consuls, Furius and Manlius being indited before the people, went about arraigned in vile apparell and mournful weed to the younger sort of Senators, as well as the Commons perswading, advising, and warning them to forbear and refuse all dignities and offices of state, yea, and all charge of Common-weal. And as for the Consuls rods born afore them, their purpled robes with purple, and chair of state, they should esteem no otherwise of them than of the pageants carried in a funeral pomp. And that with these gorgeous ornaments and ensigns they were but destined to death: much like to beasts adorned with sacred white ribbands and labels, appointed to sacrifice. But if the sweetness of a Consulship were such, let them consider now withall, and perswade themselves, that it is become private and overswaied with the power of the Tribunes: and that the Consul, as if he were the Tribunes serjeant, must do all at his beck and command. For if he quetched never so little, if he seemed to regard the Senators, or make account of any thing else in the whole State but of the Commonalty, let him set before his eyes the exile of Cn. Marcius, the judgement and death of Menenius. The Nobles incensed with these speeches, from thenceforth began to consule and confer together, not openly and in publike council, but privately, and apart from the privy of many. And when they were resolved once upon this point, that those accused parties now in trouble, should be enlarged one way or other, by hook or crook: then the cruellest advice, and hardest course that could be delivered best pleased them: and for to put in execution the most audacious designments whatsoever, there wanted not one or other to give counsel. Well the law day of trial came, and when as the Commons gave attendance devoutly in the Forum, in great expectations of the sequel and issue, they began at first to marvel much, that the Tribune Genucius came not down in place: and suspecting somewhat because of his long tarrying & delay, they imagined that he durst not for the great men and chief Magistrates of the City: and so they complained, that the common cause was forlorn and betrayed. At the last, they that kept about the door & porch of the Tribune his house, brought word that he was found at home stark dead. Which news being once noised through the assembly, mark how an Army is dispersed and scattered when their General is slain, even so in all the world the Commons slipt aside every one, some one way some another. But above all others, the Tribunes were in bodily fear, being thus by their fellow taught how little help or none at all, their sacred and redoubted Laws afforded. The Nobles could not dissemble this their joy, nor use it with moderation, but shewed it excessively: and so little repented any one of them of the fact committed, that they avowed it, and took it upon them, and would not seem culpable in the action: but gave it out in plain terms, that the Tribunes by foul means were to be tamed & their wings clipped in a mischief. Upon this their victory, so shameful a precedent in times to come there went out an edict for the publishing of a muster: and whiles the Tribunes were in this feare daunted, the Consuls without any contradiction, went through with it clear. But then were the Commons much more offended at their Tribunes silence and sitting still then at the Consuls rule and imperious government: saying, "Farewell freedom now, farewell liberties and all: now is the old world come again, and the Tribunes authority is both dead and buried together with Genucius. Now they were to go in hand and berthink themselves of some other course, how they might withstand the Senators proceedings: and seeing they were destitute of all other help to rely themselves upon, the only way was for the Commons to trust to themselves, & stand upon their own guard. Whereas therefore, there gave attendance upon the Consuls 24 Lictors or Vergers, Commoners all and no better, none more contemptible and base minded, if they met with those that would set them at naught: they might thank themselves only, and their own timorous conceits & imaginations, that such things were so dread and terrible. Thus having animated & provoked one another with these speeches: there was a Sergeant sent from the Consuls to one Volero Publilius a Commoner, who because he had been a Leader in the field of certain bands, pleaded his immunity for being a common souldier again. Volero calleth for help to the Tribunes: but there being no man to rescue him, the Consuls commanded the man to be stript out of his cloaths, and the rods to be made ready for to scourge him. Then quoth Volero, "I appeal unto the people, seeing the Tribunes had rather have a Citizen and freeman of Rome beaten with rods in their presence, than be murdered themselves by you in their beds. But the more fiercely he cried on still, the more cruelly fell the Lictor to cut and slice his apparell for to uncase him. Then Volero being himself the stronger man, and assisted withall by some whom he called unto him, thrust the Sergeant from him: and where he perceived the mainest out-cry and loudest noise of his adherents, that fumed and chafed in his behalf, thither retired he, to shroud himself among the thickest, crying: "I appeal and beseech the Commons of their protection and succour. Help Citizens, help fellow-souldiers. Never stay and wait for the Tribunes, untill they come, who have themselves need of your assistance. Hereat folk were raised and gathered together, and addressed themselves as to a Battell. A foul piece of work was toward, full of exceeding danger, and like it was, that no man would have had regard either of common law or private honesty. When the Consuls in this so great a broil and storm of outrage came in, to prevent further mischief, they knew soon by experience how slenderly guarded against danger, the Majesty of Rulers is, where force is wanting. For their Lictors were beaten, misused, and ill intreated, their rods broken all a peeces, themselves driven out of the Common place, and forced to take the Senat house, doubting how far forth Volero would proceed in the train of his victory. But when the riot was well appeased, they assembled the Senators together, and complained there of their injuries received, the violence of the Commons, and the audacious presumption of Volero. After many opinions and sharp censures delivered among them, the Ancients and Elders prevailed at length, who thought it not good to set the anger of the Nobles against the head-strong rashness of the Commons. And the Commons so highly favoured and embraced Volero, that in their next election they made him their Tribune for that year, wherein L. Pinarus and P. Furius were Consuls. Who contrary to all mens expectation, that thought verily he would have exercised his Tribuneship in molesting and vexing the Consuls of the former year, preferred the publike cause before his own private grievance, and gave not the Consuls so much as one foul word. Only he preferred a Law unto the people, That the Magistrates of the Commonalty might be created in a ward-Leet, or Assembly of the Tribes and Wards. Thus under a title, which at the first sight seemed nothing hainous, passed a matter of no small consequence, but such as abridged the Nobles of all power and authority, to create Tribunes whom they would, by the suffrages and voices of their vassals and favourites. But when the Senators resisted with all their might, the going forward of this Act most pleasing and plausible to the Commons, and yet none might be found of the brotherhood of Tribunes, that by the authority either of Consuls or of Senators could be brought to joyn in his way by their negative voice, which was indeed the only means to cross it: the business, notwithstanding in it self so weighty to wield, and so hard to be compassed, held out with much debating the year through. The Commons then made Volero Tribune again. The Senators on the other side, supposing the matter would now come to a final triall once for all, created for their Consul Ap. Claudius, the son of Appius: who even for the old contentions maintained by his father, who was both hated of the Commons, and also hated them again: and he had for his companion in government T. Quinctius. At the very beginning no matter was treated of before that Law. But as Volero was the first deviser and broacher of it, so his fellow Leclorius was the more earnest and hot maintainer thereof, as he came more fresh unto it. The stouter he was besides, by reason of his great military glory, for that in those daies there was not a taller man of hands, nor more active than he. Now, when as Volero went straight to the substance of the Law in hand, without any circumstance of words, and forbore to inveigh against the Consuls person, Leclorius began his speech with challenging Appius and his house, as most proud, and cruelly affected to the Commonalty of Rome: avouching earnestly, "That the Nobles had made, not a Consul, but a butcherly tormentor, to afflict and mangle the Commons: but being a rough-hewn souldier, and not used to make Orations, his tongue could not frame to expresse his mind as freely as he would: and so his utterance failing him: Since that (quoth he) O Quirites, I cannot so readily deliver that in my speech, as I can make that good indeed which I have spoken: Be you here to morrow, and in this very place I will either get this Law enacted, or I will lie in the dust and die for it before you all. The next day the Tribunes were gotten into the Temple or hall first, The Consuls and Nobility abode still in the assembly of the people, for to hinder the passing of the Law. Then commanded Leclorius all the rest to avoid and depart, but those only that were to give their voices. The young Gentlemen of the Nobility stood still, and gave no place to the Tribunes Officer. Then willed Leclorius some of them to be attached. But the Consul Appius replied again, O "That a Tribune had authority over none but Commoners: forasmuch as he was a Magistrate, not of the people, but of the Commons. Neither could himself, of his absolute power (Consul though he was) observing the custome of his ancestors, command any man to avoid: for that the usuall form of words ran thus, May it please you my Masters, O Quirites, if you think good, to depart. Soon was he able, thus laying the Law unto him, by way of scorn and contempt, to outface Leclorius, and put him down. Whereupon the Tribune chafed, and set into an heat, sendeth an Officer

A Law proposed that Magistrates of the Commons should be chosen in a Tribes-Leet, or ward-Assembly, called, Tributa comitia.

Leclorius sendeth the preferring of Publius his Law.

A Officer to the Consul: the Consul likewise, a Licor to the Tribune, crying often aloud, that he was but a private person without command, without Magistracy. And doubtless the Tribune had been hardly used, but that both the assembly rose up in a rage, and took part with the Tribune against the Consul: and also there was a concourse of the multitude, raised out of all parts of the City into the Common Hall. Appius notwithstanding stood stiffely to it still, and abide the brunt of this tempestuous storm: neither had this broile staid without some bloudshed, in case Quintus the other Consul, had not set some of the Aldermen that had been Consuls, to get his brother Consul by force (if otherwise it might not be) out of the Hall, whiles himself was in hand, one while with the Commons, to appeale their iury, by way of intreaty and with fair words, other whiles besought the Tribunes to break up the assembly, perswading with them to take more leisure in this their heat and anger for that time and space would abridge nothing of their power, but would joyn counsel and advice thereto: concluding withal, that both Nobles should be ruled by the people, and the Consul ordered by the Nobles. Hardly and with much ado were the Commons quieted by Quintus, but far more trouble had the Nobles to still the other Consul. At the length, when the assembly of the people was dismissed, the Consuls called the Senat together. Where after much variety of opinions, proceeding from fear and anger according as the one or the other, waied among them: look how much longer time they had to reclaime their mind from violent courses, and sagely with deliberation to consider of the matter: so much the more their hearts went against all contention, and farther strue: insomuch, as they yeilded Quintus hearty thanks, that by his travel between parties, the discord was well allaid. And to Appius they were petitioners, "That he would be content, that the majesty of the Consull might be no greater than would stand with the unity and concord of the Citizens. For whiles the Tribunes for their part would needs have all, and the Consul on the other side draw all to them: between this this pucking and haling there was no strength left in the midit: and to conclude, the Commonwealth was rent, torn and dismembred between the rulers therof: who strove rather for the managing and rule, than for the safety and preservation of the State. Against whom Appius replied with a solemn protestation before God and man, and said, "That the weal publike was abandoned, forlorn, and betraied by nothing else but foolish fear: that the Senat wanted not a Consul, but the Consul wanted Senators: who now yeilded to harder conditions than they had before time in mount Sacer. Howbeit overweighed at length by the general consent and accord of the Nobles, he was content: and so the law passed quietly, was by royall consent authorized. Then and never before were the Tribunes created in a congregation of the tribes, and by their voices, Piso writeth, that there were three more made to the other as if there had been but twain before: and he nameth also the Tribunes, to wit C. Succi, L. Numitorius, M. Duellius, Sp. Icilius & L. Melcius. Then had the Volscians and Equians, between the civil sedition of the Romans, & the beginning of war, harried & wasted the country: that in case the Commons had made an insurrection, they might have retired to them, as to a sure place of receipt & refuge. But when all was busht & matters compounded between the Nobles and Commons, they removed their camp backward.

Appius Claudius was sent against the Volscians: and to Quintus fell the Province of the Equians. The same rigorous severity continued Appius still in warfare, that he used at home in the City: but so much more freely, for that he was not curbed nor held in by the Tribunes. The Commons he hated, more than his father had done afore seeing he was overwaied, and had taken the foil at their hands: and being the only Consul, opposed against the Tribunes power, yet manure his head, the law passed clear away, which the former Consuls his predecessors, with less ado, nor with so great hope and expectation of the Nobility, had ever hindred and staid. This his anger and indignation gave an edge to that fell stomach of his by kind for to plague and punish his souldiers with imperious and lordly command. But so let they were to spurn again and disobey, that by no forcible means they could be tamed, doing all things that they did lazily slowly frowardly, and stubbornly. Neither bashed they for shame, nor stood in awe for fear. If his will was they should march on apace, they would on set purpose go fair and softly: If he encouraged them in proper person to intend their business, they would all of them slack their former service, whereunto they were entred of themselves: whiles he was in place, they would hang down their heads and look on the ground: as he passed by they would secretly curse him in their hearts. So as that invincible stomach of his against all hatred of the Commons, would now and then grieve hereat. And when he saw that all the shrewdness and rigour, that he used was in vain, and that now he could do no good with his souldiers, he fell to checking the Captains and Centurions, saying, They had spoiled and marred the Army, terming them Tribunes of the Commons, and otherwhiles in taunting wise nicknaming them Voletoes. All these doings were the Volscians aware of, and therefore were they more eager and forward, hoping that Appius should find the Roman Army as froward and disobedient, as they had been against Fabius. And to say truth they were more crooked and unruly with Appius than with Fabius a great deal. For they were not only unwilling to have the victory as Fabius his Army was, but also desirous to lose the victory and be overcome. Being brought forth and set in battel array, they shamefully took their heels and fled into their tents: and never made head and resistance, before they saw the Volscians with banners displayed, advancing against the munitions of their Camp, and a foul slaughter committed upon the tail of their rereward. Then were they driven perforce to fight for very necessity, that that the enemy thus far forth Victor, might be kept from the Wall and Trench: and yet so, as it H was very apparant, that the souldiers passed for nothing else, but only to save the Camp for being won: for some of them rejoyced at their own loss and defeature. Whereat, the stout stomach of Appius was nothing daunted, nor his heart broken: but he minded to deal cruelly with them, and thereupon summoned a general assembly. Then the Lieutenants, Marshals, and Colonels, came running unto him, advertising him in no case to try masteries, and to enforce his authority. The very ground and strength wherof resteth wholly in the accord of obedient people: adding moreover, that the souldiers commonly gave out, that they would not go to the assembly: but rather they might be heard every where, calling upon them aloud, to dislodge and remove out of the territory of the Volscians: moreover, that the enemy now Master of the field, was but a while since advanced to the gates and rampier, and well near possessed of them: whereby, they were not only to suspect, but might evidently see before their eyes some great matter toward of dangerous consequence. Whereupon at last he was over-ruled, and (forasmuch as his souldiers thereby should gain nothing but delay of their punishment) remitted the assembly for that time: and after proclamation made, to set forward in their journey the next day, and to depart in the morning very early, he caused the trumpet to sound the remove, and to march away. The Army being gone out of the Camp, and ready to be set in order of a march at length, the Volscians who were gotten up by the same sound of the trumpet, plaid upon the tail of the reereward: the noise whereof passed from thence to the vanguard, & so disordered the ensigns, so troubled the ranks by reason of that fright, that neither could the direction and commandment of the Captains be heard, nor the Army be brought into battel array. No man minded any thing at all but to run away and disorderly in great numbers, they fled back over the dead carcases and armors that lay on heaps, and so escaped: and never stay they their flight, untill the enemy gave over the chase. At the last, the Consul having called his souldiers together that were run away so scattering, (for with all the speed that he made after to call them back, he could not reclaim them) encamped without his enemies ground in a place of security. Then he called them all together to an assembly, and inveighed bitterly, and not without just cause, against the whole Army, as having betrayed the discipline of war, and forsaken their colours: asking every one of them what was become of their banners? And what they had done with their weapons? And as many souldiers as were unarmed, as many ensign-bearers as had not their ensigns, the Centurions also, and those that received double allowance, and forsook their bands and companies, he caused to be scourged with rods, & to lose their heads. The whole number besides, were by lottithed, and every tenth man as it fell out, executed. But contrariwise, in the expedition against the Equians, the Consul and his souldiers, strove to exceed one another in curesse and kindnesse. Quintus was by nature mild and chearful, and the cruelty of his brother Consul, that never sped well, made him take more joy in that his gentle disposition. Whiles the General and his Army consorted thus together, the Equians durst not confront them, but suffered their enemies to range all abroad and forrage the country: so as in no former wars got they greater booties from thence: and all was bestowed among the souldiers. Over and besides these gratuities, they had their due praises and solemn commendations, wherein souldiers take no less delight than in rewards and gifts. So, that Army returned home better affected to their General, M and also to the Nobles for their Generals sake: reporting that the Senate had given to them a loving father, but to the other Army a lordly master. This year thus spent with variable fortune abroad in war: with grievous discord as well at home as abroad, was above all most memorable and famous for the Tribe-Leet. A matter of more note, in respect of their victory that entred into the action, than of consequence, in regard of commodity that grew thereof. For the very Leet it self lost more credit by excluding the Nobles out of that assembly, than either the Commons got strength, or the Nobles did forgo thereby. But more troublesome was the year following, whiles L. Valerius & T. Emilius were Consuls, both for the variance of the three States about the law Agraria, and also for the arraignment of Appius Claudius. Whom, being a most bitter adversary of that law, and a great maintainer and upholder of those that possessed and held the common N lands, as if he had been ever a third Consul, M. Duellius, and C. Siccinius arrested and endited. Never before that day came to the bar, a person to be tried before the people, so odious unto the Commons: charged with so many wrongs done of his own, so many of his fathers afore him, in regard whereof they were highly displeased and offended with him. The Nobles likewise had not lightly laboured so earnestly, nor strained themselves so much for any one as for him. Who being the patron and protector of the Senat, the maintainer and upholder of their port and dignity, a man ever opposed against all the troublesome broils of Tribunes & Commons, was now delivered as a prey to the Commons in their anger, and only for that he had overshot, and passed himself in heat of contention. But of all the Senators that ever were, Appius Claudius of himself alone was he, that cared not a rush, either for Tribune or Commoner, nor yet for his own arraignment. No menacing threats of the Commons no earnest prayers of the Senators could once make him, I say, nor to change his apparel, and in humble manner to seek and crouch unto men for to be good unto him: no nor so much, as when he came to answer for himself before the people, one whit to mollifie and let fall (as it were) that rough and sharp kind of speech that he was wont ordinarily to use. He kept the same sovre countenance still, the very same forwardness and crabbedness of visage, the same spirit of boldness in his apology and defence. Insomuch, as many of the Com-

A Commons were no less afraid of Appius standing prisoner, there arraigned at the bar, than they had been of him; sitting as Consul in his ivory chair of estate. In pleading of his cause, he spake briefly and at once to the point, with the same accusatory spirit, that he had ever used in all his pleas and actions. With his boldness and resolute constancy, he so amazed both Tribunes and Commons, that they themselves deferred the day of giving sentence, and suffered afterward the suit to hang and depend still undetermined. But not long after, even before the Law day appointed was come, he sickned and died. Whose funeral praises when as the Tribunes went about to hinder, the Commons would not suffer, that the death of so worthy a man, should be defrauded of the due honour and solemn obsequies, and gave audience as quietly and attentively to the commendation of the man now dead, as they did afore to his accusation while he was alive: and with a goodly train attended his corps to the grave.

died.

The same year Valerius the Consul made a voiage with an army against the Æquians, and seeing he could not train the enemy forth to fight, he made a bravado to assail the Camp: but there fell such a terrible storm and tempest from heaven, with hail and thunder-claps, that he was disappointed of his enterprize. And that which made it more strange and wonderfull, he had no sooner sounded the retreat, but the weather proved so fair and calm again, that he made some scruple and matter of conscience, to give a second assault unto the trench, as if it had been defended by the speciall power and providence of God. So, all the heat of war turned to the waiting only of the Countrey. The other Consul Emilius warred with the Sabins. And even there also, because the enemies kept within their walled towns, the Territories were spoiled. But afterwards, the Sabines raised with the firing, not only of their villages and hamlets, but also of the good towns and burroughs, whereof in those parts there were many, and thoe well peopled, encountered the forragers: and after a doubtfull skirmish, they departed asunder, and the morrow after raised their Camp, and retired themselves back into a place of more security, which the Consul taking for a sufficient argument and proof, that the enemies were defeated, left them so, and dislodged likewise, without any end of the war.

During these wars, and while discord continued in the City at home, were T. Numitius Priscus and A. Virginius created Consuls. Now seemed it that the Commons would no longer abide the deferring of the Law Agriaria. And as they were about to put it to a venture and to try the utmost by extremity, they took knowledge partly by the smoke and flame of the villages on fire, and partly by the running away of the villagers, that the Volsicians were near at hand. Which occurrence repressed and kept down the sedition which was now come to ripeness, and ready to break forth. For the Consuls forced by the Senate immediately to the war, by taking the serviceable youth with them out of the City, reduced the rest of the Commons to more quietness. And the enemies verily made no further attempt, but after they had given a false alarm, and set the Romans in a foolish fear, dismarched away as speedily as they could. Then Numitius went to Aniurn against the Volsicians, and Virginius against the Æquians: where having well-near received a great loss and defeat by a train laid for him: such was the prowess and manhood of the souldiers, that they recovered all again, which by the negligence of the Consul had like to be lost. But better was

E the conduct and government of the Army against the Volsicians. For there, at the first skirmish the enemies were disarrayed, put to flight, and chased as far as to Aniurn, a City (for that time) of right great puissance and importance. The Consul durst not assault it, but went from the Antiates, Canon, another town; but nothing so wealthy. While the Æquians and Volsicians thus amused the Roman Armies and kept them occupied, the Sabines were come robbing and spoiling to the gates of the City of Rome. But within few daies after, they themselves received more damage than they brought, by occasion that both Consuls with two armies were entred in great anger into their Confines. In the end of the year some peace there was, but disquieted, as at all times before, with the variance between the Nobles and Commons. The Commons in a peevish and angry fit, would not be at the Election of the Consuls. So, by the Senators only and their followers, there were elected Consuls, T. Quintius and Q. Servilius. The like year to the former these Consuls had seditions and troublesome in the beginning: but afterwards upon certain war, quiet and still. For the Sabines with a running Camp having passed over the plains of Crustumium, and put all to fire and sword about the river Anio, were chased back, well near from the gate Collina and the walls: howbeit they drave away with them exceeding great booties both of people and cattell. Whom the Consul Servilius followed hard with a power ready to bid battell, but could not overtake their main army in any even ground meet to pitch a field in. Howbeit he foraged and wasted the Countrey all about, so as he left no corner clear that felt not his fingers, and returned with purchase of many rich prizes of all sorts.

G Likewise among the Volsicians they sped well and had lucky hand by the good demeanour both of captain and souldier. First, they joynd battell upon a plain, and fought with very great slaughter, and exceeding much bloudshed on both sides. And the Romans (who for their small number were more apt to feel the loss) had lost ground and dismarched, if that the Consul by making a lie for a vantage, and crying that the enemies fled from the other wing, had not encouraged them and renewed the battell afresh. And so by giving a new charge, while they thought they had the better, they got the better in very deed. The Consul, fearing again, by pressing too hard upon the Army, to enforce them to turn and make head, sounded the retreat. Few daies passed between between, wherein they rested quiet, as though there had been a secret truce agreed between them. In which mean space, a great sort of people from all parts of the Volscians and Equians repaired to the Camp, thinking verily, that if the Romans were aware of them, they would depart in the night season. Whereupon, at the third watch they came to make an assault upon their Camp. Quintus after he had quieted the tumult, which upon this sudden alarm arose, and given commandment that the souldiers should keep themselves within their pavilions, brought forth a company of Hernicks to guard the gates, and caused certain cornettiers and trumpeters on horseback to wind and sound before the trench and counterscarpe, and so to hold the enemy in suspense and expectation untill day-light. The rest of the night all was so quiet within the Camp, that the Romans had time enough and good opportunity to take their repose and sleep. This shew of footmen in their harness, whom the Volscians imagined to be more than they were, and all Romans: the neighing besides, and noise that the horses made by reason of their strange riders that they were not used unto, and the sound also of their trumpets and horns that made them to set up their ears, and to stamp and fume outrageously, amused the enemies waiting ever when they would charge upon them. When it was day, the Romans being in heart and fresh, as having slept their fill, came forth and embattelled themselves, and at the first shock discomfited the Volscians, wearied with long standing and overwatched withall. And yet the enemies rather gave ground and retired themselves, than seemed to be driven from their standings, because they had at their backs certain hills, whereunto they might retire behind the Principia, and not break their ranks, and so save themselves. The Consul seeing he was come to a place of disadvantage, made a stand. The footmen hardly would be staid, calling and crying to the Consul to follow upon them seeing they were discomfited. The horsemen were more eager, riding all about the Consul, and with open mouth cried out, that they would advance before the ensigns. Whiles the Consul held off, in a hammering what to do, for as he was assured of the valour of his souldiers, so he little trusted the ground: they all at once set up a shout, that they would set forward, come what would: and as they cried, so did they in good earnest. And pitching their javelins fast in the ground, that they might more nimbly get up the steep place, they took their full career, and ran up the hill. The Volscians having in their first brunt spent all their darts, and other shot which they had let flie, and made no spare, took up stones that lay under their feet, let drive at the Romans as they climbed up, and so thick and threefold they bestowed them, that they annoyed them fore, and beat them down the hill. Thus the left wing of the Romans was well-near overcharged: had not the Consul at the point, when as they were ready to retreat, blamed them first for their rashness, and then for their cowardise, and made them for very shame to shake off all fear. First they stood to it stoutly, and kept their ground, and after, as their strength served them, considering the vantage of the place which the enemies had gotten, they adventured to set foot forward, and won ground with a fresh shout and outcry. And taking their career again the second time, they strain all they can, and at length overcame the disadvantage of the place. Now when they were almost at the point to win the very pitch and ridge of the hill, the enemies turned back. Whiles they ran on heaps in disaray, both they that fled, and they that followed, hapned both at once in one company into the enemies Camp, which in that fright was won. The Volscians, as many of them as could escape, ran as fast as their legs would carry them to Antium. And to Antium likewise was the Roman army conducted: and after a few daies siege, was surrendered upon no fresh and new force of assault, but for that presently upon their unfortunate conflict and loss of the Camp their heart were done, and utterly failed.

The Third Book

Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the Foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the third Book.

S Editions about the Laws Agraria. The Capitoll taken and held by banished persons and slaves. They were slain, and it recovered. A survey and Censment was taken twice. In the former there were found of Roman Citizens 124214, besides orphan children, and such as had no children at all, as well men as women. In the other following there were 132419. Upon a great overthrow received in the war against the Equians, L. Quintus Cincinnatus was made Dictator: and being in the country at his farme busie about his husbandry, was sent for to the conduct of that war. He vanquished and subdued the enemies. The number of the Tribunes of the Commons, arose to ten, thirty six years after their first institution. The Laws of Athens were set from thence by Embassadors, sent for that purpose: to the establishing and publishing whereof, there were ten personages elected in the room of Consuls, which were called Decemvirs, without any other Magistrates: and this hapned in the three hundred and second year

A year after the foundation of Rome. And as the Government of the state was translated from Kings to Consuls: so was it now from the Consuls to the Decemvirs. They having proposed ten tables of laws, and born themselves modestly in that high dignity, were therefore by the consent of the people, permitted to remain still in office the second year. But after they had committed many insolent parts, they would not give over their room of Magistracy, but held it still the third year: until such time as their obstinate and intollerable rule came to an end, occasioned by the filthy lust of Appius Claudius: who being inamoured upon a Virgin, suborned one to make claim unto her as his bondslave: whereupon her father Virginus was driven of necessity to catch up a knife from a butchers stall next by, and to kill his daughter: as having no other means to save her from the hands of him that purposed to abuse her body unlawfully. The Commons upon this foul example of filthy leachery, made an insurrection, and took the mount Aventine for their hold, and compelled the Decemvirs to leave their place, and give over their government. Of whom, Appius and one of his Collegues (which two had principally deserved punishment) were committed to prison, and there kept, the rest were driven into banishment. This book containeth besides the victorious wars against the Sabini, Volscians, and Equians. And the dishonest arbitrement or award of the people of Rome, who being chosen Arbitrators between the Ardeans and the Aricins, awarded to themselves the Land whereabout the strife and controversy was.

The third Book of T. Livius.

C After the winning of Antium, T. Emilius and Q. Fabius were created Consuls. This was that Fabius that only remained alive of all the name that perished at Cremera. Now had Emilius in his former Consulship perswaded to distribute certain Lands among the Commons. And therefore in this second likewise, both the favours of the law Agraria were in good hope of the foresaid law: and also the Tribuns supposing verily that now by the help of a Consul, that might be brought about and obtained, which oftentimes had been enterprised against the pleasure of the Consuls: took the matter in hand and gave the attempt: and withal, the Consul still continued in the same mind. But the great landed men and many of the Nobles, finding themselves grieved, and complaining that the chief and head Magistrat of the City busied himself, with the Tribuns suits, and was by large giving away of other mens possessions, become popular and gracious with the people, turned the whole burthen and odious heavy load of this action, from the Tribuns upon the Consul his head. And a cruel broil was toward, had not Fabius, by a device and policy to neither party offensive, made an end of the matter with expedition. For whereas there were certain Lands gotten by conquest from the Volscians the year afore under the conduct of T. Quintius: "There might (said he) a colony be brought to Antium, a City neer adjoining, very commodious, and seated by the Sea side: so should the Commons without any grudging or complaints of the possessors or Land-lords, be seized of Land, and the City rest in quiet and Unity. This opinion of his was accepted of all hands. And they created three especial officers or Triumvirs for the division of the said lands, to wit, T. Quintius, Aul. Virginus, and P. Furius. Then proclamation was made, That whosoever would hold any of the Land, should give up their names in writing. But plenty, as the manner is, soon caused lothing: for there were so few that presented themselves, that to make up the full number of the inhabitants, they were fain to adjoyn unto them certain Volscians. The rest of the multitude had rather (as it seemed) to keep a calling for Land at Rome, than be possessed of Land elsewhere. The Equians craved peace of Q. Fabius, who was come against them with an army: and they themselves by making a sodain inrode into the territories of Latium, cancelled the same and made it void: But the year next following, Q. Servilius (for he was Consul with Sp. Posthumus) being sent against the Equians, kept a standing camp in the Country about Latium. But by the reason of a contagious disease or a plague, that rained in his army, they were of necessity forced to keep quiet within their tents. So their war was deferred unto the third year, when as Q. Fabius and T. Quintius were Consuls. And forasmuch as Q. Fabius, had upon his victory before granted peace to the Equians, he had an extraordinary commission directed unto him for the rule of that Province. Who being thither gone with full assured hope, that the very fame of him and noise of his army, would quiet the Equians, sent Embassadors to the Council of that Nation, with this message: "Q. Fabius the Consul, saith, that as he carried before peace from the Equians unto Rome, so he bringeth now war to the Equians from Rome: having now his sword in the very same hand, which he gave unto them before in friendly manner unarmed. Whole treachery it is and perjury, that is the cause of this, the Gods can witness now, and in some measure will revenge hereafter. Nevertheless, he for his part, however the case standeth, desireth that the Equians would yet bethink themselves of their own accord and repent rather than stand to the extremity and abide those calamities and miseries that follow wars. If they would come in therefore and be sorry for that they have done, their submission should be received, and they taken into the safe protection of his clemency, whereof already they had experience. But in case they persist still in their disloyalty, and take pleasure in being forsworn: be they well assured, that they should have the ire and wrath of the Gods more than their enemies to fight against them. These words so little or nothing at all moved any men there, that the very Embassadors had like to have been very hardly used and evil entreated, yea,

and an army withal was sent forth as far as Algidum against the Romans. When these tidings were brought to Rome, the indignity of the thing and the shameful manner thereof, rather than any fearful peril otherwise, railed the other Consul out of the City. So two Consular or royal armies approached the enemy in order of battail, ready to try it out presently by the dint of sword. But the day being (as it fell out) welneer spent, there cried one aloud from out of the place where the enemy kept ward: "This is to make a shew of war only (ye Romans) and not to war indeed; ye set your battailions in array against night forsooth, that now draweth hard on: we had need of more daylight I wis, for the business in hand, and to try this quarrel. To morrow therefore at Sun rising, see you come again into the field, ye shall have fighting fear not, your hands full. The souldiers nettled and galled at these words, retired back into the camp until the next day, I thinking the night was long, that kept them from battail and so for that time they refreshed their bodies with food and sleep. On the morrow so soon as it was day, the Roman host being stirring somewhat more early, stood ready arranged in array: and at length the Equians likewise shewed themselves in field. A sharp fight there was on both sides, by reason that both the Roman souldiers fought in anger and deadly hatred, and also the Equians upon prickt conscience, that bare them witness how they embarked themselves into this danger, and were out of all hope ever to be trusted again, were forced to hazard all upon a cast, and venture the utmost. Yet were not the Equians able to endure long, the violent fight of the Romans, but were discomfited and put to flight. And being returned within their own Frontiers, the unruly multitude for all this, were never the more inclined to peace, but reproved and blamed their Captains, "That they put the tryal of the issue to a set field, in which kind of fight the Romans had singular skill, and surpassed them. As for the Equians, they were better at robbing, spoiling, and foraging, in making incursions and inrodes: and a better and safer kinde of service it was, here and there in sundry places, to skirmish with forces divided, than reduce all into one gross army, and to pitch a field. Leaving therefore a guard to defend the camp, they went forth, and with such a tumult invaded the confines of Rome, that the very terror thereof reached unto the City. This stir, especially coming so sodainly and unlooked for, made the Romans fear the more. For who would ever have doubted and suspected, that their enemies so lately vanquished, and in manner besieged within their own camp, could possibly think upon entering into the lands of others, and to drive booties. Besides, the rustical peasants came in at the gates, crying, and saying, That they were not petty companies, and small handfuls of thieves and robbers, but (such was their foolish fear, augmenting and making every thing greater) whole armies & legions of enemies were at hand, and marched apace with banners displayed full against the City. From their mouths, they that were next made report unto others, & as they heard news from they knew not whom, so they set them abroad they cared not how, but ever in the carriage they added somewhat of their own, and coyned lies good store. Here was running, there was crying al'arm & generally such a confusion every where, as if the City had been quite lost. By good hap Quintius the Consul was returned from Algidum to Rome. That remedy cured all and stayed the fear. When the tumult was appeased, he rebuked the people for fearing those enemies whom heretofore they had vanquished, and placed good guards over the gates. Then he assembled the Senate, and by the authority and assent of the Nobles, proclaimed Iustitium, or a general cessation or vacation in all courts of law: and went himself forth in person with a power to defend the marches, leaving Quintus Servilius Provost of the City: but the enemy he found not in the territory all about. The other Consul performed his affairs passing well: who having certain intelligence, which way the enemies would come, set upon them laden with prey, and (by that means marching more heavily in disorder) made it a dear booty unto them, even as much as their lives were worth. For few of them escaped the Ambush, and all the pillage was recovered. So the return of Quintius into the City, made an end of the publick Lawfead, or above-said vacation which lasted but four dayes. Then was a Censie or Assesment set of mens goods, and a muster or view taken of the number of Citizens, together with a solemn purging of the people, called Lustrum, celebrate by Quintius. And there were numbred of Citizens 124214 polles, over and above men and women that lived single, or had no children, and al orphans besides. And among the Equians after ward nothing was done worth remembrance: for they bereok them to their strong Towns, suffering their territory and villages to be consumed with fire, and spoiled. Thus the Consul, after he had divers times overrun the Country of his enemies, with a cruel army wasting and spoiling as he went, returned home to Rome with great honor and a huge booty. Then were Coss, Aulus Posthumius Albus, and Sp. Furii. Some have written them Fusii, who indeed are rightly named Furii. Which I note, lest any man should think they were sundry men, whereas the variety is only in the name. No doubt there was, but that one of the Coss. would war with the Equians: and therefore the Equians sought for aide of the Ectrane Volscians. Which being gladly granted and sent with speed, (such a perpetual hatred bare these Cities alwayes against the Romans) there was great preparation for war in most forcible manner. The Her-niks having an inckling and knowledge thereof, certified the Romans afore-hand, that the Ectrans were revolted and banded with the Equians. The Colony Antium likewise was had in jealousy, for that when the Town was lost, many people fled from thence to the Equians, who all the time of the Equian war, served in the field, and proved the most hardy souldiers and fiercest of all others. And now when the Equians were driven into their Towns, that multitude

A multitude being split away and retired to Antium, withdrew from the Romans the allegiance of the Coloners and inhabitants there, who were already of their own inclination unsound and not to be trusted. But before the matter was come to ripeness, and they entered into any action, the Senate upon intelligence given that they intended only, and were upon the point to revolt, gave the Coss. in charge to send for the chief men and head persons of that colony to Rome, and to enquire and learn of them in what terms Antium stood: who being come willingly enough, without any great intreaty, and convened by the Consuls before the Senate, made answer to their interrogatories in such manner, that they were sent away more suspected, than at their first coming: whereupon they resolved fully of war. Spurius Furius one of the Coss. to whom that province by lot fell, having taken his voyage against the Æquians, found the enemy spoiling and wasting in the territory of the Hernicks: and being ignorant what number they were (for that in no one place they were all discovered together) he rashly joyned battell, and hazarded his power, being in number and force inferior to the other. And at the first encounter he was driven back, and retired into the camp: and yet was he not past all danger and insecurity there: for both the night following, and the next day after, the camp was so streightly beset, and so hotly assaulted, that he could not dispatch so much as a messenger from thence to Rome. The Hernicks sent word both of the unfortunate fight, and also how the Consul and his army were besieged. With which news they so terrified the L.L. of the Council, that they granted Posthumius the other Consul the solemn commission, To see to the State, that it sustained no danger and damage.

C The form of which order and decree, hath been alwayes accounted to signify some great extremity of the Common-wealth. And thought best it was, that the Consul himself in proper person, should abide at home to enrol in the muster book, all those that were able to bear armes: that T. Quintius should be sent as Pro-consul or Vice-consul, with a power of confederate Allies to raise the siege and rescue the camp: and for the furnishing of this army, the Latines, the Hernicks, and Colony Antium, were commanded to send unto Quintius, Subitary souldiers (for so they termed at that time, the aids and supplies taken up in haste and on a sudden.) Many attempts were made, much skirmishing, and sundry assaults for certain dayes on each side were enterprised. For the enemies being more in number, assayed in divers places and sundry wayes to cut off and diminish the power of the Romans, as not sufficient and able to make head at all

D turns. For at one time they both made an assault upon the camp, and withal sent out certain of their forces to waste the territory of Rome, yea, and to give the venture upon the very City, if they could espie any good opportunity to offer it self. L. Valerius was left behind to defend the City, and Posthumius the Consul was sent out to restrain and withstand the wasting of the marches. No point of care or travail on any hand was slaked, watch and ward both night and day was set in the City, a good Corps de guard appointed afore the Gates, and souldiers bestowed upon the Walls: and (that which was needful in so great an hurlyburly) for certain dayes it was no Term, or interdiction of Law was observed. In this meanwhile, Furius the Coss. who at the first had quietly endured the siege and made no resistance, suddenly and at unawares sallied out at the broad gate called Decumana, upon the enemies: and whereas he might

E have chased them, he made some stay of that, for fear lest on some other side, they would have given assault upon the camp. But Furius the Lieutenant (who also was the Consul his Brother) engaged himself too far, and upon a hot desire of pursuit and following the chase, neither saw he his fellows as they retired, ne yet the enemies as they came to charge him on the back. Thus being shut out from all the rescue, after many essayes made (but all in vain) to make way through unto the camp, manfully fighting he was slain. The Consul likewise hearing that his Brother was environed all about with enemies, returned again to fight: but as he ran more rashly than warily into the midst of the skirmish, he was fore wounded, and being hardly and with much ado saved by those that were about him, he both disquieted and daunted

F the hearts of his own men, and made his enemies more fierce, lusty, and courageous. Who were so animated and set on fire, both with the hurt of the Consul, and also with the death of his Lieutenant, that nothing afterwards could stand in their way: no force was able to stay them, but that they beat the Romans again into their camp: where they were besieged afresh being now both in hope, and also for strength worse than they were before. So that their main State thus lying a bleeding, had utterly perisht, but that T. Quintius with a supply of strangers: namely, a power of Latines and Hernicks, came to the rescue in time: who charging the Æquians behind, whiles they were wholly busied in assailing the camp, shewing them within the Lieutenants head in a great bravery and pride, at the same instant caused a sally out of the camp, by a signal that he gave them a far off, and so inclosed round about a great number of the enemies. Small was the slaughter, but great was the flight and scattering of the Æquians in the territory of Rome: upon whom (stragling here and there and driving their booties afore them) Posthumius, who in divers convenient places had bestowed certain companies and bands of souldiers, ran violently. And as they fled every way in disorder, they lighted upon Quintius as he with the hurt Consul returned with Victory. Then the Consul's army bravely did their endeavour, and had a goodly day of them: and was revenged both for their Consuls wound, and also for the death of the Lieutenant and the Squadrons with him. Many losses and overthrowes were given and taken on each side for certain dayes. But in so ancient a matter as this was, hard it is for a man upon his credit, to set down precisely the certain number, either how many fought, or how many were slain. Howbeit Valerius Annius boldly reckoneth the exact numbers, namely, that there died of the Romans in the Hernicks Country 5300. and of the Equian robbers, who went up and down spoiling and pilling in the territory of Rome, were killed by A. Posthumius the Cos. 2400. The rest of the multitude, which laden with spoill fell into the hands of Quintius, were not so quit, nor escaped with the loss of so few mens lives: for of them the sword devoured 4000; and to account the number exactly, 200 (quoth he) and 30 just. Then returned they on all hands to Rome, and the foresaid vacation or law-need ended. The skie was seen much on a light fire, and other strange wonders either appeared indeed, or presented to the fearful people vain apparitions, and fantastical illusions. However it was, for to avert the dangers by these prodigious and terrible tokens presaged, there were proclaimed festival holy dayes for three dayes together. During which time all the Churches were replenished with men and women, making supplications and prayers for the favor and mercy of the Gods. The bands and squadrons of the Latins and Hernicks, after great thanks given them by the Senate for their good service in this war, were discharged and sent home. But the Antiate souldiers, 1000 in number, who after the battell was fought came tardy, and too late for to succour, were dismissed in manner with ignominy and shame.

of August

Then was the great Leet or assembly held, for the election of Magistrates: wherein L. Ebutius and P. Servilius were created Consuls: and on the * Calends of Sexilis (for on that day) began the year then, they entred their Consulship. A grievous and heavy time it was, and as it fortun'd, K. a year of plague and great mortality, both in the City and Country; as well among brute beasts as men. And the receiving of the Country peasants with their cattel into the City, for fear of robbing and spoiling, encreased the contagiousness of the sickness so much the more. For, that confused medly of all sorts of beasts, both annoyed and empoisoned the citizens with the uncouth and unusual stink, and also stifled with sultry heat and overmuch watching the rustical people, lying pestered together, and thrust up into close rooms and straight lodgings. The mutual recourse one to help and Minister unto another, and the very catching of the disease, set it all abroad. Thus whiles they had much ado to endure these present calamities, behold, to mend the matter, all of a suddain, the Hernick Embassadors bring word, that the Equians and Volscians having levied a power joyntly together, were encamped within their limits: and from thence with a mighty L. army wasted and destroyed their territory. Now, besides that the small assembly in the Senate-house, was to these their allies an evident token that the City was sore visited with the pestilence, they received also an heavy answer from them, namely: That the Hernicks themselves together with the help of the Latins, should defend their own: as for the City of Rome, it was with the heavy hand and visitation of the Gods, dispeopled by the plague: but in case the sickness decreased in some measure and took up in any time, they would willingly aid their confederats, as they did the year before, and as they had done at all times besides. Thus departed these allies, and for their ill news they brought thither, they caried with them home again a worse answer and message, to wit, That they should by themselves sustain that war alone which hardly they were able to support, if they had the power of the Romans to assist them. Long stayed not the enemy in M. the Hernicks countrey, but went forward from thence into the territory of Rome, desolate already (God wot) without the injury of war, and little need there was of calamity that wayes: where meeting with no man at all, no not so much as any one unarmed, and passing over all the Country, furnished not only of Garrisons to resist, but also of people for husbandry and tillage, at length they came to the third stone, i. within three miles of Rome, to the broad port high way, called Gabina, leading to Gabes. The Roman Cos Ebutius, was now departed this life, and his brother Cos. Servilius, lay lingring on at the point of death, in small hope of recovery. Most of the peers and principal ancients were infected, and sick in bed, so was the greater part of the Nobles, and welneer all the serviceable men of war: so as they were not able to set forth an expedition or voyage abroad, as meet was in so great a tumult, no nor scarce to keep any ordinary set guard at home for the defence of the City. The Senators, such as age and sickness would permit, took the charge N. in proper persons of watch and ward. The Ediles of the Commons went the round, and had the charge to see all well & in good order: so that upon them now rested the government of the state, & the Majesty of the Consuls Regiment. Thus when all was forlorn, no head to direct, no strength of man to execute; the Tutelar Gods, Protectors of the City, and the good fortune alone that ever waited upon her, preserved the main chance. This made the Volscians and Equians to carry with them a mind and intent, rather to deal by way of robbings and spoillings, than in any hostile manner like professed warriors: for so small hope had they, or none at all, of winning the City; so little heart, so much as to approach the walls, that even the very roofs of houses, which they descried a far off, and the sight of the tombs and graves so neer at hand, turned their minds clean, and O. daunted their courages. So as over all the camp they began to mutter with themselves, What they meant to spend time idly, and sit still without spreading, in a wast and desart Countrey; within the mortality and purrified air and corruption, both of people and cattel; when as they might as well invade those parts that stood clear and sound, and namely the rich, plentiful, and fat fields of * Tusculum: and therewith suddainly at once they plucked up their ensigns, and by cross wayes passed through the * Lavican countries, even to the mountains of Tusculum: and thither turned they

* Frascati.

* Vol montem

A they the whole force and tempest of the war. In the mean season the Herniks and Latins moved not with pity and compassion only, but also for very shame, in case they had neither withstood their common enemies, marching to Rome with a cruel army, nor relieved their besieged friends; joyned their powers together, and set forward to Rome: where not finding the enemies, and following the bruit that went of them, and tracing their fresh tracks and footing, they encountered them as they came down from the hilly Country of Tusculum into the vale of Alba: Where they made no saving bargain of it, but fought to their loss, so as their fidelity unto their allyes, had but bad success for that present. And in Rome there was no less mortality of citizens by the sickness, than there were Massacres abroad of their allyes by the edge of the sword. For the other Consul, B who alone survived hitherto, now died. There left this life also, other noble personages, M. Valerius, Titus Virginus, Augurs: and Ser. Sulpitius the Curio Maximus. But among the bale and common sort, the violence of the disease raged and spread, I know not how far. The Senate now destitute of all help and comfort of man, moved the people to devotion, to their beads, and prayers unto the Gods. And commandment was given to all men with their wives and children, to go in procession, to pour out their supplications, and crave mercy at Gods hands. Thus being by publick authority called forth to perform that which every man was forced unto by his own proper calamities, they filled all the Temples and Chappels. The Dames and ancient Matrons, lying groveling and sweeping the Church floors and pavement with their hair and tresses, hanging loose down, humbly besought pardon of the Gods, and an end once of the pestilence. Whereupon, C were it that they had obtained the mercy of God, or that the more dangerous and contagious season of the year, was now well overpast: their bodies by little and little, having escaped the danger of disease, began to recover and wax more healthy.

Then set they their minds about the care of the Common-weal, and after certain inter-reigns determined or ended, P. Valerius Poplicola, the third day of his Interreign or Regency for the time, createth Consuls L. Lucretius Tricipitinus, and T. Veturius Geminus, or Vetusius, whether ye will: who * three dayes before the Ides of Sexilis, began their Consulship. By which time the City was grown so strong again, that it was able not only to maintain a defensive war, but also to enter the field and assail others. When the Herniks therefore gave them advertisements that the enemies were passed over into their borders: they made no delay, but readily and willingly promised their aid, and levied two Consular armies. Veturius was sent against the Volscians, to begin with them, and to war within their own Country. Tricipitinus was opposed in the Frontiers of their confederates, to keep them from invasion and wasting, and went no further forward than to the Herniks. Veturius at his first encounter and confronting of his enemies, discomfited and put them to flight. But Tricipitinus whiles he lay still encamped in the marches of the Herniks, missed of the army of the Robbers: which was conducted over the Mountains of Preneste, from whence they came down into the Champain, and spoiled the territories of Preneste and Gabes: and from thence they fetched a compass about unto the Mountains of Tusculum. The City of Rome likewise was put in great fear, rather upon the sodain occurrent of this alarm, than for any want of power to resist their violence. Quintus Fabius at that time was Provost or President of the City, who put the youth in armor, disposed guards in places convenient, and made all safe and in good security. The enemies therefore who had raised a booty out of the parts adjoining, durst approach no neerer, but cast about with their army and retired: and the further they went from their enemies City, so much the more careless they were, until they light upon the Col. Lucretius, who by his espials and scouts, was afore that time acquainted what wayes they would take, and was ready also to try battail. So with resolute and prepared hearts, they set upon them, that with the sodain fear were amazed. And albeit they were in number fewer, yet they discomfited and put to flight a mighty multitude of them, and drove them within the hollow valleys, where because they had no ready way to get out, they kept them inclosed on every side in such sort, that the whole name and nation welneer of the Volscians, there utterly perished. In some Chronicles I find that there were 13470 slain in the fight and chase, and 1250 taken Prisoners alive, and 27 ensigns or banners brought away. It may well be that the number perhaps doth somewhat exceed the truth, yet a great slaughter certainly there was. The Consul having achieved this victory, and gotten a mighty great prey, returned into the same standing camp again. Then pitched both Consuls together, and the Volscians jointly with the Aequians, rallied their Forces thus decayed and weakened, into one place, and made one entire army. This was the third field fought, in that one year, and by the same good Fortune the Romans won the victory: and having vanquished the enemies, they were Masters also of the camp. Thus the City of Rome recovered her self, and returned to her ancient good estate. But this happy success in war, immediatly stirred up civil troubles at home. C. Terentillus Arsa, for that year a Tribune of the Commons, supposing in the absence of the Consuls, good opportunity was offered to set on foot the Tribunes actions, and their proceedings: for certain dayes together gave not over before the Commons, to accuse the great pride and insolency of the Nobles: but especially he inveighed against the Consuls Regiment, as being too absolute, and in a free state intolerable. For in name only (quoth he) lets odious and hateful it is than that of the K.K. but in fact in every deede more grievous and cruel. For why? Instead of one Lord, the City hath received sitwain, and those having authority beyond all measure, unlimited and infinit: who being themselves

“ selves at their own liberty and unbridled, turned the edge of all freight and dreadful Laws; yea, H “ and the rigor of all punishment, against the Commons. But lett this their licentiousness should “ continue for ever, he was minded to prefer and publish a Law, by vertue whereof there should “ be five men created, who should set down certain conditions, to limit and gage the authority “ of the Consuls: and look what authority and commission the people granted out over them, the “ same should the Consul exercise, and no more, and not rule of themselves, and use their own “ will and licentious lust in stead of Law. This act being once published, and the Nobles fearing, “ left whiles the Consuls were away, they should be taken down and yoked. Quin. Fabius Pre“ sident of the City, assembled the Senate, who so bitterly and sharply inveighed against the Law and “ the Law-giver himself, that if both the Consuls themselves had stood about the Tribun of purpose “ to contradict and cross his proceedings, there had been no threats nor terrible menaces left for “ them, to have thundred out. “ For he laid fore unto his charge, that he had lyen in wait and now “ having spied the time to fit his purpose, had given the venture to assail the C. W. and the State.
 “ And in case the Gods in their wrathful displeasure had sent among them such a Tribun as he the “ year before, together with war and pestilence, there had been no remedy then, but he must have “ had his way, and then they had been all undone. For when the Consuls both were dead, and “ the City lay bed-rid as it were, in a miserable confusion of all things, he would have made laws “ then indeed, to the utter abolishing of the Consuls authority out of the Common-wealth, and “ been a ring-leader to Volscians and Aequians both, for to have assaulted the City. For what “ might not he have lawfully done by vertue of his place? If the Consuls had either proudly or K “ cruelly proceeded against any one Citizen, he might have entred an Action against them, and “ convented them for oath before those very Judges, of whom peradventure some one had been “ by them hardly dealt withal. This would have been the course and end of it. And he that thus “ did, should not cause the Consuls authority and rule, but the Tribuns power to become odious “ and intollerable: which having been of late well quieted and reconciled unto the Nobles, began “ now afresh to come unto the old biace, and to be troublesome again. Neither intreated he him “ not to go on still as he had begun. But ye my Masters (quoth Fabius) that are the rest of the “ Tribuns, we would request you to consider well this one point especially: That this power you “ have, was brought in for the succour and relief of every particular person, and not to the general “ prejudice and undoing of all. Again, that ye are created Tribuns of the Commons, not enemies L “ of the Nobles. A heavy and lamentable case it is to us, odious and hateful unto you, and will “ breed you much ill will and displeasure, in case the C. W. now forlorn, should thus be invaded “ and assailed. Ye shall lose nothing of your own right, I assure you, nay, you shall avoid much “ dislike and hatred of men, in case ye be in hand and deal with your brother Tribun, to put off “ this matter and defer it wholly until the Consuls coming. Why, the very Aequians and Volsci“ themselves the last year, when both our Consuls were dead of the plague, pressed not hardly up“ on us, to prosecute any proud and cruel war against us. So the Tribuns communed and perswa-“ ded with Terentillus: and this his commenced suit or action being adjourned in outward shew, “ but in very truth let fall quite and disannulled, the Consuls forthwith were sent for home. Lucretius returned enriched with a right great booty, but with far greater honor and renown. Who at M “ his very first coming won himself more glory, by laying abroad in Mars field all the prizes, that “ every man for three dayes space might know his own and have it away. All the rest, that had no “ owners to come forth and make claim, was sold in port-sale. By all mens consent, the Consul “ was thought worthy of triumph: howbeit that matter was put off, by reason that the Tribun had “ not yet done with his law: which was the thing that the Consul thought meet should be first re“ garded. The matter was debated and treated for certain dayes, both in the Senate and also before “ the people. At last the Tribun yielded to the Majesty of the Consul, and gave it over. Then was “ due honor rendred both to the General and also to the army accordingly. He triumphed over the “ Volscians and Aequians: and in his triumph his own legions followed after him. To the other “ Consul granted it was that he should in a kind of triumph called Ovatio, ride into the City, but N “ without his souldiers. The year next ensuing, the Law Terentilla was by the whole Colledge or “ fellowship of the Tribuns revived and propounded again: which put the new Consuls P. Volum-nius and Ser. Sulpicius to some trouble. And in the same year the skie seemed to be on a light fire, “ and there was an exceeding earthquake. And that which the year afore was no credit given unto, “ was now for truth believed, to wit, That a Cow did speak. Among other strange wonders it “ rained flesh: during which showre, a huge number of fowls flew among, and were reported to “ have snatched it and carried it away as it was in falling. But that which fell down and escaped their “ talions, lay scattered here and there for certain dayes in such sort, as the sent changed not at all, “ nor the flesh one jot taken and corrupted. Then the books (of Sibylla) were perused by the Duumvirs deputed over matters of Religion: who fore-told of some dangers to ensue by a Company O “ of strangers, and gave warning to look lest haply some assaunt should be made upon the highest “ places of the City, and thereof a slaughter and massacre ensue. Amongst the rest, warning was given “ to abstain from civil discord and mutinies: which the Tribuns found fault with, as a devised “ matter to hinder the law. Whereupon great debate and contention was like presently to grow.
 “ But behold, (that the revolution and course of troubles might turn about every year to the same “ point,) The Herniks bring news that the Volscians had Aequians for all their wings were well clipped,

A ped, and their forces greatly decayed, began together and levy new armies: Item, That in Antium lay the whole weight and importance of the affairs, and all depended upon it: That the Antiat coloners held their counsels and had their meetings in open show, at Eccetra, but Antium was the principal seat of the war, and from thence came all preparations and forces whatsoever. As soon as these news were reported in the Senate, order was given to muster souldiers: and that the Consuls should part between them the administration and managing of his war, so as the one should have the charge against the Volscians, and the other against the Aequians. But the Tribuns rung it out openly in the common Hall before the people, "That this was but a made matter of the Volscian war, and a tale devised by the Herniks, who were suborned and framed to play their parts in the Pageant, and to serve the turn of the Nobles. And that now verily the freedome of the people of Rome was not oppressed or endangered by plain prowls & vertue, but finely shifted off and dallied cunningly withal, by slye and crafty inventions. And for asmuch as now it was an unlikely thing and incredible, that the Volscians and Aequians after so great slaughter committed upon them, whereby they were all in a manner killed up, should be able of themselves to wage war, there were, forsooth, new enemies sought out: A faithful Colony near adjoining, was now slandered and defamed: war was pretended for a shew against the guiltless and innocent *Antiat*s, but in truth, intended with the very Commons of Antium, whom they meant to drive out of the City in all haste headlong, surcharged with heavy armor, and so (by turning out their poor fellow citizens into banishment, and sending them away, God knows whither) to be avenged at length of the Tribuns. And thus the Law (say the Tribuns, for they must think their drift is to this end and to none other) should be troden under foot, unless whiles all is entire and whole, and nothing done, whiles they remain at home in their houses, whiles they be in their gowns, they take heed and look well about them, that they be not dispossessed of the City, and take the yoke of servitude upon their necks: assuring them that if their hearts only served, they should want for no help: and that all the Tribuns agreed and were of one mind, that there was no cause of fear abroad, no forraign war to trouble them: last of all, that the very providence of the Gods the year before assured them that their liberty might with safety be defended. These and such like Remonstrances gave the Tribuns out. On the other part, the Consuls causing their chairs of estate to be set, even in their sight and presence, began to muster. Thither ran the Tribuns down in all haste, and drew the whole assembly of people with them. And, to make as it were a proof and tryal, some few by name were called, and straightwayes began a stir. For whomsoever the Sergeant by the Consul his commandment arrested, the Tribuns charged again that he should be let go. And neither side contained within the limits and compass of their commission and rightful authority: but presumed of their might and strong hand, to attain unto their desired purpose. For even as the Tribuns had demeaned themselves in forbidding the muster, sennably the Senators bestirred themselves to stop the law for going forward: which was propounded every Court day, and when the people might assemble. And evermore the brawl began, when the Tribuns commanded the people to avoid the Hall, for that the Patrij would not endure thus to be set out and excluded: Few or none of the ancients would be present at these troublesome stirs, being such as were not to be managed and ordered by sage Counsel, but wholly left to the rashness and boldness of young and green heads. The Consuls also were much absent, and forbore to be in place, for fear lest in such a confused hurlyburly their Majesty and dignity, might have been subject to some shameful contumely and disgrace. But there was among them one Caso Quintius, a lusty young Gentleman and a stout, in regard both of his noble parentage, as also of the goodly tall personage and strength of his body. Besides these good parts that God had bestowed upon him, he had won himself many ornaments by sundry exploits achieved in wars: He had withal an eloquent speech and a good grace at the bar, so as, in one word, throughout the whole City, there was not one thought to be more ready in tounge, or taller of his hands. This Caso standing in the midst of the Nobles, higher to be seen above all the rest, as one that in his speech and strength, carried afore him the countenance and authority of all Dictators and Consuls, was the only man that bare off the bruits of Tribuns, and storms of the common people. Many a time were the Tribuns driven out of common Hall, the Commonalty defeated and put to flight by the conduct of this Captain. Whosoever came within his reach, was sure to go away thoroughly beaten, and clean stripped. So as it evidently appeared, if this course might have been allowed, the law had soon been checked and overthrown. Now when all the other Tribuns besides, were herewith dismayed and well near daunted, Aulus Virginus alone, being one of their fellowship, was so bold, as to enter an action against Caso, of a capital crime. By which deed of his, he rather fired, than feared his hot and furious nature. For so much the more eagerly withstood he the Law, coursed and troubled the Commons, and persecuted the Tribuns as it were with open war. The plaintiffe in the mean time, suffered the defendant to run on still, and with many outrages to kindle more coals of ill will, and hatred upon his own head, and to minister further matter of crimes to be charged with. And all the while he ceased not to prefer the Law afore said, not so much of any hope to bring it to pass, as to provoke and set on work, the giddy head and humorous vein of Caso. Whereby it came to pass, that many follies oftentimes were committed both in word and deed, by the yonger sort: and evermore the blame light upon poor Caso: he alone was adwayes charged, because he had been once suspected. But nevertheless he hee gainfayed and croffed the Law. And Anlus Virginus ever and anon would entertain the Commons with thefe and fuch like fpeeches. "See ye not already (quoth he) O Quirites, that ye may not now have Cafio your Citizen, and the law which you desire both together. But what mean I to fpeak of your Law? It is your liberty that he intringeth and fettereth himfelf againft, and in pride and arrogancy he exceedeth all the Tarquins that ever were. But wait, ye were beft, until he be made a Conful or Dictator, whom ye fee already, being but a private perfon, to bear himfelf fo greatly of his ftrengh and boldnefs, as to Lord it over you, and rule as a King. Many ftooth the Tribune and faid the like, adding moreover, how they had been well knocked and beaten at his hands: and were forward enough of themfelves to fet the Tribune on, to proceed in his commenced action againft him.

Cafio recommended by many of the Nobility.

Now was the law day of judicial trial come: and it feemed abroad, that all men verily thought that the very foundation of their liberty confifted in the condemnation of Cafio. In conclufion, driven he was with much indignity and fhame, to creep and crouch unto every man, fubmiffively craving their favor one after another. There feconded him his kinsfolk and neereft friends, the beft men of the City. Titus Quintius Capitolinus, who had been thrice Conful, fpake in his behalf: and after he had reckoned up many honors and dignities, both of his own, and alfo of his family, affirmed, that neither in the houfe and race of Quintii, nor yet throughout the City of Rome, was ever feen fo great towardnefs, no fuch fhew and likelihood of ripe and perfect vertue and prowefs as in Cafio: faying, that he had been firft his fouldier, and ferved under him, and that with his own eyes he had feen him oftentimes fight valiantly hand to hand with his enemies in the field. Again K Sp. Fufius made this good report of him, That upon a time, when himfelf was in great dittrefs and extremity, Cafio was fent unto him from Quintius Capitolinus, to help at a pinch: and that there was no one man, by whose good fervice, as he thought, the Weal-publick at that time, was more relieved and reftored, then by his, L. Lucretius the Conful laft year before, glittering in his bright glory fo frefh and new, joined with the reft, avowing Cafio partaker with him in his prайse-worthy acts: he recounted his brave combats, rehearfed his noble exploits, both in his rodes and voiaiges, and alfo in the pight field: advising & counfelling them, that in any hand they would retain him ftill for to be a Citizen of their own City, rather then of any other, this excellent young gentleman, furnifhed with all good gifts of nature and fortune, like to prove a fingular ftay of the publick affairs, into what City and State foever he fhould come. As for that heat and haftinefs (quoth he) L which was in him miliked and offensive, age and time would dayly diminifh, and bereave him of it: grave and fage counfel, which now was wanting, would come on apace every day more then other. Seeing therefore his faults waxed old and faded, his vertues now were in their growth, flourifhed, and grew ripe unto perfection: they fhould permit fo brave, fo rare a perfon, to live ftill among them, and be a good old man in this their City. His father among the reft, L. Quintius, furnamed Cincinnatus, went another way to work: who not by iterating ftill his praifes, for fear of heaping more matter of envy and repine, but craving pardon for his wildnefs and youthful demeanor: befought them for his fake at leaftwife, to give the fon as a prefent to his father, who neither in word nor deed had ever offended any perfon. Some took no heed and gave a deaf ear to his prayers, either for modetty and reverence, or for fear. Others complaining how they and theirs had been beaten and hardly ufed at his hands, bewraied and fhewed plainly by their fhrewd and churlifh answers what their judgment was. Befides, the common milike and malice conceived againft the defendant, there was one perilous matter and crime above all, that touched him very heet. And that was this: M. Volfcus Fictor, who certain years before had been Tribune of the Commons, came in againft him as a witnefs, and depofed, how that not long after the plague was in the City, he hapned upon a company of youths as they made a riot and robbery in the Suburra: where there arofe a brawland fray, in which his elder brother, a man wel in years, and not thoroughly recovered of his ficknefs, was with a buffer with Cafio his fift fell'd to the ground, and lay there for dead: fo as he was fain to be had home between mens arms; and as he deemed, of that blow he died: yet might not he as hainous as the fact was, bring his action and profecute N the law, for fear of the Confuls of thefe laft years. As Volfcus thus informed, the whole court was moved therewith, in fo much that Cafio escaped hardly, from being murdered, in that rage and fury of the people. Then Virginus commanded to lay hold on the man, and to have him away to prайson. The Patritii again by force refifted force. T. Quintius cried out, That he who was under arreft for to make his appearance, and answer at a day for his life, and who fhould come to hiftrial and be judged, ought not before fentence of condemnation, and before he had pleaded for himfelf, thus violently be mifufed. The Tribune replied again, That his meaning was not to punifh him before he were condemned: howbeit, by his leave he would be fo bold as keep him faft in prайson, to be forth-coming at the law day; that he who had killed a man, might fuffer therefore according as the people of Rome fhould award. Then were the Tribunes called unto for their help, who by the means of an indifferent decree then made, fhewed their lawful favours with fpeed. By vertue whereof they forbid exprefly, that he fhould not be imprifoned, but pronounced that it was their wil and pleasure, that the defendant fhould perfonally appear, and a piece of money be promifed unto the people, in cafe that he made default and failed of his appearance. Much queftion there was what fum of money fhould be thought reafonable to be promifed. And the matter was put over to the Senate to be decided: and whilft the Senators fate there-

A thereupon, the defendant was kept still in ward within the common Hall. At length they thought good and set it down, that he should put in sureties. And they bound each surety in 3000 * Asles. But how many of these should put in band, was left to the will and discretion of the Tribunes, who assigned and determined ten, and no more. With so many sureties the plaintiff bound the defendant personally and peremptorily to appear at his day. This man was the first Roman, that went under special bail, and put in good pledges to make his publick answer. Thus being enlarged out of the common Hall and dismissed, the next night following, unawares to the Consul, he departed to the Tuscans into exile. When the day of this judgement was come, and that it was alledged for his excuse, That he was out of the town, and gone into banishment: yet nevertheless B Virginius assembled the people about this matter: but his fellow Tribunes being called unto for their help, dismissed the Court and licensed every man to depart. But the foresaid money was cruelly exacted at his fathers hands, so that he was driven to sell up all that ever he had, and for a long time to live apart as a person confined, on the other side of Tyber, in a poor blind cottage out of the way. This proces of judgement, and the preferring of the law abovesaid together, busied the City and kept it occupied. Quiet they were for any wars abroad. At what time the Tribunes like Conquerors, seeing the Nobles appalled at the banishment of Caso, supposed now their law was in manner fully established and enacted. And for as much as the more ancient Senators had dispossessed themselves, as it were, of the Common-weal, and medled not for their own parts with the State: the younger sort, and such especially as were of Caso his true and acquaintance, were kindled the more against the Commons, and abared not their courage: marry, this good thereby was done upon them, that in some measure they tempered and ruled their furious affections and violent outrage. The first time after the exile of Caso, that the law began again to be proposed, they being well appointed and banded together, backed also with a mighty company of their friends and favorites, set upon the Tribunes: taking the occasion when they charged them to depart out of the hall, in such manner, that no one of them above his fellows was singular, or carried home with him any special praise or blame more then another: but the Commons complained that for one Caso, there were now start up a thousand. All the days between, wherein the Tribunes medled not with their law, none more quiet, none more peaceable, then they themselves. Courteously they would salute and speak unto the Commons, at all other times D they would invite them home to their houses and make them good cheer, assist them and be present with them in the common Hall, suffer the Tribunes themselves without any interruption or impeachment to keep their courts and hold their assemblies whatsoever: shewing themselves at no time to any of them either publicly or privately fierce and cruel, but only when they went in hand with the law, for otherwise the young Gentlemen were popular enough. And not only in other causes made the Tribunes good dispatch, and went quietly through all their businesses: but also the same men were chosen again for the next year following without any foul and cross word: so far were they from being offered any forcible violence: and thus by soft handling and gentle dealing, they had now by little and little won the Commons, and made them as it were cometo hand. And so by these fine fetches and devices, for one whole year the law was shifted off, and E prettily avoided. The City being now in more quiet state, C. Claudius the son of Appius and P. Valerius Poplicola, came to be Consuls. And no news this new year: for the same care still, either about preferring or admitting the law, held the City occupied. As much as the puny Nobles insinuated themselves more into the favour and familiarity of the Commons: so much more eagerly again on the other side, did the Tribunes labour and endeavor with complaints and slanders, to bring them into suspicion and jealousy with the Commons: Saying, that there was a conspiracy intended and contrived: that Caso was in Rome: that there were plots laid to murder the Tribunes, and to massacre the Commons: that they were set on work by some great ones, even the Ancients of the Nobles, utterly to abolish the Tribunes authority out of the C. W. and to bring and reduce the City to the same pass again, as it had been before the taking and keeping hold in the F Mount Sacer. Besides all this, war was feared from the Volscians and Æquians (so ordinary it was, and so duly once every year it came about:) yea and with all, another mischief newly sprung, and unlooked for.

A rabble of banished persons, Outlaws and Bondslaves, to the number of 4500 having to their Captain one Ap. Herdonius a Sabin, surprised in the night the Capitoll and Castle, and were masters thereof. Who immediately killed in the castle as many as would not be of their conspiracie & take armes with them. The rest, amid this hurliburly ran headlong down into the Market place for fear. The army was given on all hands: and no cry heard but Arme, Arme, the enemies are in town. The Consuls were afraid to put the Commons in arms, and they doubted also to let them be unarmed, not knowing what sudden occurrent this should be, that thus had entred and possessed the city: whether it were forraign or domestical, arising from the malice and hatred of the people, or from the treachery and falshood of their servants: Yet they devised to appease the uproar: and as they were busie to repress it, the more other-while they stirred up new: for the frightened and amased multitude, could not be ordered by any commandment. Howbeit at length they resolved to suffer them to take arms, and not all in general, but only (for that they knew not what their enemies were) to have a sufficient and trusty guard about them, ready at all assayes and dangers whatsoever. In this careful suspence and doubt, who were their enemies, and what their their number was, they passed the rest of the night, disposing strong watch and ward in all meet and convenient places of the City. But the day light disclosed the war and the Captain thereof, Appius Herdonius from out of the Capitol proclaimed freedom to all bondmen that would come and follow him: "taking upon him forsooth to defend the cause of most miserable caitifs: namely, to restore home again unto their native country all such exiled persons, as had been wrongfully expelled, and also to take away the heavy yoke of slavery and bondage. Which thing he could wish it might be effected and brought about with the good will and helping hand of the people of Rome. But in case there were no hope & comfort there, then he would assuage the Volsians and Æquians, yea, and procure what means he could, by all hard couries and extremities whatsoever. Now the Nobles and Coss, began to see more into the matter: and besides those dangers that were in view, and presently threatened, they feared some practise from the Veientians or the Sabins: and lest, there being already so many enemies in the City, the legions and Tuscans should combine together, and come upon them. Over and besides, lest their old enemies and perpetual, the Volsians and Æquians should now at once, not, as aforetime, invade their borders and drive booties, but give an attempt upon the very City, which was already in some part, taken and possessed by enemies. Many and sundry were their fears. But of all other the dread and jealousy of their own bondslaves presented unto them most imminent and present danger: for fear, lest every man harboured his enemy at home in his own house, whom neither he could trust securely, nor yet mistrust without some jeopardy: fearing lest being once discredited, he might prove the more malicious and bent to do a mischief. And to such straits they were driven, that with all their concord and agreement, they hardly were able to remedy the matter, and to stop the extremity. So greatly the future troubles like to ensue, exceeded those that presently appeared and were in sight, that no man feared either Tribuns and Commons. That mild and gentle kind of malady, in comparison of others, and rising always by occasion of rest from all other, seemed then by reason of a forreinterror, stilled clean and brought asleep. And yet see, that was the only thing in a manner that lay hardest upon them, ready to bear down to the ground their state, which now began already to shrink and reel. For so furiously and madly were the Tribuns bent, that they flily would stand to it, and bear men in hand, That it was no war, but a vain illusion and colour of war, and no other, that had seized on the Capitol: for nothing else but to withdraw the minds of the Commons from intending and following their Law: and that a sort of clients, followers, and favorites of the Nobility and Gentry were gathered together, who if they might once perceive that the Law were passed, and that all the stir they had made, took no effect, would slip away soon and be gone, in more silence I wis, than they thither came. Whereupon they called the people away from their armor and weapons, and summoned them to an assembly, to go through with their Law and Enact it now or never. In the mean time the Coss, held a Councel fearing a greater mischief like to ensue from the Tribuns, than the enemies had wrought in the night season. And when word was brought that arms were laid away, and that the people had abandoned their quarters where they were set in guard, then P. Val. leaving his colleague to keep the Senat together, departed hastily out of the Court & went straight into the Temple to the Tribuns. "What work is here my Masters (quoth he) you that are Tribuns? "Are ye about to overthrow the State indeed, under the conduct of Ap. Herdonius? and who was not able to sollicit and do any thing with your bondslaves and servants, was his hap so good as to corrupt and inveigle your selves? Is this your pleasure and to your good liking, whiles the enemy is over our heads, to have our armor laid aside, and laws preferred? Then turning his speech to the whole multitude: If ye take no regard nor care (O Quirites) of the City, if ye pais not for your selves yet have some reverence, and stand in fear of the Gods of your native countrey, which by your enemies are now taken Prisoners and captivate: Jup. Opt. Max. that most bountiful and Almighty God, Queen Juno and Minerva, with all the rest of Gods, Goddesses (and heavenly wights) are besieged: Outlaws and bondslaves are encamped about your Tutelar Gods, and have in possession the Protectors and Patrons of your City. Is this, think ye, the form of a wise and well governed City? is it in good case indeed and as it ought to be? So many enemies not only within the walls, but also aloft upon the cliff within the Castle, overlooking and commanding both Hall and Court: and all the while, the people assemble in the Hall, Senators sit in Court like as when we enjoyed peace and were at rest: the Senator he delivereth his opinion at the Councel board: the citizens of Rome besides, are busy in their scrutinies and giving their voyces. And had it not been more meet and decent that both Nobility and Commonalty, Consuls and Tribuns, God and Man, all armed together, should set to their helping hand, should run up into the Capitol to deliver, save, and set in quiet that most stately and sacred house of Jup. Opt. Max.? O Father Romulus, vouchsafe, I beseech thee, that mind and that courage unto thy successors and posterity, whereby sometime thou didst recover and win again this fortress from these same Sabins, betrayed and lost by corruption, and for a sum of gold: command them to enter even that way, which thou first ledst, and thy valorous army followed after. Lo, I the Consul, so far forth as a mortal man possibly may, will follow thee an immortal God, and thy footsteps. The conclusion of his speech was this, That as he put himself in arms, so all the Romans shall do the like, And in case any man went about to hinder this, he would without regard of Consuls rule and dignity, or Tribuns authority & might, pass for no sacred or inviolable laws: but what

A or wheresoever he were, in Capitol, in market place, all as one, take him for an enemy, and deal accordingly. Let the Tribuns (for asmuch as they forbade to take arms against Ap. Herdonius) command hardly, and spare not, to arm against P. Valerius the Consul: It should be well seen that he would dare and do that by the Tribuns, which the first of his house and name sometime had done by the KK. A great broil was toward, and no other like, but that they would have gone together by the ears, and that the mutiny of the Romans, would have been a goodly spectacle to the enemies for to behold. But all this while, neither could the law be preferred, nor the Consul go up into the Capitol. The night at length stayed these brauls begun, and hush'd all. The Tribuns fearing the armed forces of the Consuls, yeelded to the darkness of the night, and gave over. Now

B when the principal Authors of the discord were once gone out of the way, The Nobles went about to the Commons, intruding themselves into their companies as they were met in knots together: where they would enter into talk and discourse with them, according to the present occasions and the time, admonishing them to take heed into what danger they brought the State. "For asmuch as now (quoth they) it is not a matter of debate between the Senators and Commons: but both Senators and Commoners, the Castle and strongest hold of the City, the Temples of the Gods, their houses both publick and private, were ready to be yeelded unto the enemies. Whiles these things were a practising in the common place, for to appease the dissention: the Consuls for fear, left the Sabins or the Veientians, enemies both, should stir and rise, were gone to the gates, and all about the walls. The same night came tidings also to Tusculum of the

C taking of the Castle, the surprising of the Capitol, and likewise of the troublesome State wherein the City stood. At that time was L. Mamilius, Dictator of Tusculum: he forthwith called a Senate together, brought in the Messengers of the foresaid news, and thought it very expedient and needful not to wait until there came Embassadors from Rome to crave their aid: for that the present peril it self alone, the urgent necessity, their social Gods, and the faithful bond of league, required no less at their hands, than to lend succour: adding moreover, that the Gods would never give them the like occasion and opportunity again, to gratify the Romans; to bind and oblige unto them by a sound benefit and pleasure done, so mighty a City, and so neer a neighbour. Whereupon it was decreed, to rescue them with all speed. The able men of service were taken up and enrolled, munition and armor given them in their hands; who advancing toward

D Rome by break of day, seemed a far off to be enemies, and were taken for the Aequians or Volscians. But afterwards, when this foolish fear was overblown, they were received into the City: and marched down in order of battell to the market place. Where, at the very same time Pub. Valerius having left his fellow Consul to guard and fortify the gates, was setting his men in array. The authority of the man had prevailed with the people, for he promised and assured them, that if the Capitol were once recovered, and the City set in quiet, if they would suffer him to be informed what fraudulent and secret mischief was underhand practised by the Tribuns under colour of this Law, he would in remembrance of his ancestors, and of his surname (which in regard of the affectionate love unto the people, by a special care, as it were by inheritance from his forefathers, was recommended unto him) not hinder and trouble the meetings and assemblies of

E the Commons, nor cross and thwart their proceedings. They followed him therefore as their Captain, gain-say the Tribuns what they could (for all would not serve) advanced forward, and marched up against the rising of the Capitol Hill. The Tusculan Legion stuck close unto them, and followed after. Citizens and Associates both did their best, and strove who should regain the Capitol first, and have the honor of that day. Each Captain exhorted and encouraged his men. Then began the enemies to fear, and wist not well what to trust unto, but only the situation of the place. The Romans and their allies seeing their fear, came forward and advanced their Standards against them. Now by this time were they broken into the porch of the Temple. Where P. Valerius fighting manfully among the foremost in the vanguard, was slain. P. Volturnus a Con-

F sular man, saw him when he fell: who gave his men in charge to cover his body, and kept himself into the Consul's room, and fought in his stead. The soldiers for heat and eagerness of fight, took no regard, and came to no knowledge of this great mischance, but got the victory, ere they knew that they fought without their Captain. Many of the outlaws were there slain, and polluted the Temple with their blood: Many taken alive Prisoners, and Herdonius himself was slain outright. So the Capitol was again recovered. The captives, as they were either bond or free, were executed every one according to their condition and place. The Tusculans had thanks given them. The Capitol was cleansed, purged, and hallowed anew. The Commons, as it is reported, cast Quadrans or mites into the Consul's house, that he might with greater pomp of

G funerals be brought to the ground. When all was appeased and in quiet, the Tribuns were earnest with the Nobles to perform the promise of P. Valerius: they were instant also with Claudius, to absolve the soul, and keep it from blame of his fellow Consul late deceased: and to permit the law to be set on foot, and go forward. The Consul flatly denied to suffer them to meddle with the law, before he had substituted a fellow in his place. And these contentions held unto the time of the grand Election for the substituting of a new Consul. And in the month December, after much suit, and labouring of the Nobles, was L. Quintus Cincinnatus, the father of Cato, created Consul, and presently to enter into his office. The Commons herewith were much troubled and stricken dead, now that they they were to have an angry Consul, and mighty withal: considering the favour of the Nobles H wherein he stood, and his own vertue & prowess besides: by reason also of his three sons, of whom there was not one, that for haughtiness of mind came behind Casus, and for wisdom, discretion, and moderation (when time and occasion served) went far beyond him. Who being once entred into his office, in all his publick speeches and orations, continually ceased not as well to bridle, restrain and keep in the Commonalty, as also to chastise sharply the Senate: through the remissness of which degree, & want of courage, it was come to pass, that the Tribuns became now, to continue still in office, and not as in the Common-wealth of the people of Rome, but as in some unruly and disordered house, with their lavish tongue reigned as it were, and ruled the rest: saying, "That together with his son Casus all vertue and constancy, all commendable qualities that graced young I Gentlemen both in war and peace, were chased and utterly banished out of the City of Rome.

"In lieu whereof, bablers, mutinous persons, and sowers of sedition and disention, are become Tribuns the second, yea, and the third time: who by indirect courses & lewd practises live loosely in the City, like Princes and Kings. That same Aulus Virginus there, (quoth he) hath he deserved less punishment than Ap. Herdonius, because he was not in the Capitol with the rabble of other Rebels? Nay, much more a good deal, if a man will weigh the matter aright and truly.
"Herdonius, (if there were nothing else) yet by professing himself to be an enemy, advertised you, and gave you warning in a manner to arm yourselves. But he, by bearing you down so confidently, that there was no war, what did he else but disarm you, and as it were, take your weapons from you, and offer you naked to the devotion and mercy of your bondmen and outlaws? And K have ye (under correction be it spoken, and saving the reverence and honor of C. Claudius here, and P. Valerius that dead is) advanced your ensigns up the Capitol Hill, before you had rid the market place and common Hall of these enemies? It is a shame (before God and man I speak it) when our enemies were in the Castle and Capitol, when the Captain and Ringleader of outlaws and slaves, abode and lodged within the Chappels and Sanctuaries of Jup. Opt. Max. to the prophanation and polluting of all, that they at Tusculum should take them to their weapons before us of Rome, and that it should be doubted, whether L. Mamilius the Tusculan General, or P. Val.
and C. Claudius, the Roman Consuls, should save the Fortress of Rome: and that we, who heretofore would not suffer the Latines in their own defence, when they had their enemies in their borders, so much as once to take weapon in hand, should now our selves have been surpris'd and L destroyed, had not they, the very same Latins of their own accord, put themselves into armor for our sakes. Is this your succouring and helping the Commons, (O ye Tribuns) for to expose and cast them unarmed before the enemy, to have their throats cut? I wis, if the meanest or basest person of your commonalty, which you have dismembred from the whole body of the people besides, and made it, as it were the native country of your own, and a Common-wealth peculiar only to your selves; If any one of them I say, should bring you word, that his house were beset round about, with a company of servants and slaves in armor, you would think it meet that he were aided and succoured: And when Imp. Opt. Max. was besieged with a power of armed outlaws and bondslaves, was he not worthy of mans help? And yet these men would be counted and held for Sacrosancti, i. Sacred and inviolable, with whom the very Gods themselves are M not sacred and inviolate. And notwithstanding, that ye are thus overcharged and stayned with sins both against God and Man, ye go up and down, and say, That this year you will get your law to pass, and make it sure. In truth, if ye prefer it again, then I must needs say the Commonweal is ill beset, and had a shrewd turn that day whereon I was created Consul, yea, and worse a good deal than at what time P. Valerius the Consul was slain. But now first and foremost (quoth he) O Quirites, my colleague and I both, are minded to lead forth our legions immediately against the Volscians and the Equians: how the Divine Providence of God hath appointed it, I know not, but surely we find the Gods more gracious and favorable unto us in our wars ordinarily, than in time of peace. And in what danger we had stood of those nations, in case they had known that the Capitol was in the hands and possession of outlaws, better it is to guess N by that which is past, than to try indeed by present experience. The Consul his Oration moved and galled the Commons. The Nobles took heart, and were in a good belief, that the world was well mended, and the state better reformed. The other Col. more hearty to follow than to lead, and who was well content that his fellow had broken the ice before, and taken in hand to deal first in so weighty a matter, willingly challenged unto himself the charge to perform the part and office of a Consul, in the execution and accomplishment of those designments. But then the Tribuns made a game therat, and setting light at the Consul his words, inferred again and demanded, how the Consuls would lead out an army, and no man suffer them to muster souldiers. Marry (quoth Quintus) we need no mustering at all: for, at what time as P. Valerius armed the Commons to recover again the Capitol, they were all sworn unto him, and took their oath in this form, Totum sem- O ble together at the Consul his commandement, and not depart from their colours without his leave and licence. We will and charge you all therefore, that have taken this oath to present your selves to morrow, with your armour, at the lake of * Regillus without fail. Then the Tribuns began to cavil and wrangle, and would needs have the people discharged in their conscience of that oath: alledging how when they took that military Sacrament, Quintus was but a privat person. There was not as yet, that neglect & contempt of the Gods entred into the world, which now reigneth every where and is so rife: neither did men interpret their oaths, and construe laws, to serve their own purpose,

* Lago de Praefso de ode S. Severa.

A purpose, but rather attempered and flamed their lives and demeanour thereunto. The Tribunes therefore, seeing no hope to hinder the thing, began themselves to treat about setting forward the army: and the rather, because there ran a rumour abroad, that the Augurs were commanded to attend at the lake Regillus: and that by them a place should be hallowed and consecrate there, wherein the Consuls might duly commune and confer with the people, concerning all matters, according to the flight of birds: to the end that whatsoever at Rome had passed under a law, extorted by the violent force of the Tribunes; the same might there in a lawfull assembly and generall Session, be abrogated & made void by the suffrages of the souldiers, who without doubt would accord to that, which should stand with the Consuls pleasure. For by reason that there was no
 B appeal in force without the city, above one mile, the Tribunes themselves also, if they came thither, should be subject as well as the multitude besides of the people, to the commandment of the Consuls. These matters scared them indeed and put them in a bodily fear, but the greatest thing above all the rest that diquieted their hearts was this, that Quintius oftentimes had given out and said, that he would not call an assembly of the people for the election of Consuls, for that the city was grown so far out of frame and temper, that it might not be reformed and cured with ordinary and usuall remedies: but that the Common-wealth had more need of a Dictator, that whosoever went about to trouble the state of the city, might well know that there was an absolute Dictatorship, that checked all appeals. The Senat was assembled at that time in the Capitoll; thither came the Tribunes with their Commons greatly disquieted and troubled. The multitude cried C out and belought one while the Consuls of their favour, another while the LL. of the Senat of their protection; but could not once remove the Consul from his opinion (such a pitch had he taken) before the Tribunes gave their word and faithfull promise, that they would be wholly ruled and ordered by the Senators. Then the Consul propounded the demands and petitions of the Tribunes and Commons, and the Senat enacted these orders and decrees. First, that neither the Tribunes should that year prefer their law: nor the Consuls lead out of the city any army. Item, from thence forth, the Senat deemed it not to stand with the weal publick, that Magistrats should continue still in place from year to year, and that the same persons should be more then once chosen Tribunes. The Consuls for their part, were overruled and ordered by the Senators. But, say and gainsay what the Consuls would, the same Tribunes were chosen anew: and the Nobles also D because they would not be one ace behind hand with the Commons, would needs choose L. Quintius likewise for their Consul again. But all the year through was not the Consul more earnest and vehement in any action and speech whatsoever then in this. Should I marvell my Lords of the Councell (quoth he) that you bear no stroke with the Commonalty, and your authority is so little worth among? Why, you, even your own selves set light thereby: seeing, forsooth, the Commons brake the ordinance of the Senat, touching the continuitie of Magistrats, yea also, because ye would "not seem to yeeld one inch in rashnesse and folly to the multitude, are as ready and willing to "infringe the same: as who would say, this were to have more rule and authority in a city, namely,
 "to use more levitie, inconstancie, and licentiousnesse. For it is a point of much more lightnesse
 "and vanity, I assure you, for men to disannull the acts and decrees of their own making, then of E "others. Ye that be Senators and Fathers of the C.W. imitate, and spare not, the ignorant, lewd
 "and inconsiderat multitude: ye that should give good examples to others, sin ye hardly your "selves, and do amiss by the precedent of others; neither then let others by your example do well:
 "so long as I, for my part, take not after the Tribunes, nor suffer my selfe to be declared Cōs. against "an expresse act of the Senat. As to you, O Claudius, I would exhort you, that both your self would "restrain the people of Rome of this their licentiousness, that thus they have not their desire, and "also that you would perswade your self thus much of me, that so far off will I be from thinking
 "my honour by you impaired, that rather I will take my glory to be increased by the despising and
 "refusing of a dignitie, and the ill will and envy abated and diminished, that might grow upon the "continuation thereof Whereupon both the Consuls jointly together made an edict and proclamation, F that no man should (by his voice) nominate Quintius, Consul: and if any man did, they would not allow of his election. So there were created Consuls. Q. Fabius Vibulanus the third time, and L. Cornelius Maluginensis.

The oration of
L. Quintius Cincinnatus against the Sen-

In this year was held a cessing and numbring of the citizens, but touching the Lustrum, there was some scruple of conscience, because the Capitoll had been taken, and the Consul slain. When Q. Fabius and Lucius Cornelius were thus Consuls, suddenly in the very beginning of their year began great troubles: for the Tribunes on the one side, as their guise was, set the Commons a-work: the Latines and Hernicks on the other side, sent word of great wars from the Volscians & Equians: That the Volscian legions were already at Antium, and the Colonie it self greatly suspected to rebel. Yet hardly could the Tribunes be brought to agree, that preparation should be made G aforehand to prevent this war. But upon these news, the Consuls parted between themselves the charge of all affairs. Fabius was appointed to lead forth an army to Antium: and Cornelius to abide at Rome for the defence of the city, for fear lest some part of their enemies, as the Equians manner was, should in running camp make rodes and forge the territories about. The Hernicks and Latines, were by vertue of the league, charged with the finding of certaine souldiers, so as the whole army should consist of ij. parts of confederats and one third of citizens. When, at the day appointed the Allies were come, the Consul pitched down his tents without the gate Capena: from whence when he had taken a generall muster and purged his armie, he marched towards Antium

and encamped himself not far, either from the town, or the standing camp of his enemies: where H the Volscians seeing no forces yet come unto them from the Æquians, had no heart to fight, but made preparation how they might keep themselves quiet and safe, within their mure and rampire. The morrow after, Fabius made not one entire battell of Allies and citizens mingled together, but three battailons severally by themselves, of three sundry nations, & ranged them along all about the counterscarpe and trench of his enemies. Himself was in the midst with the Roman légions, and gave commandment to observe heedfully and mark the signall: that the Allies also should both begin battell and also retire, when he sounded the retreat. In like sort he placed the horsemen behind the Principia at the back of each battell. Thus in three sundry parts he assailed the camp, and invironed it round about, and charging lustily hard upon them on every side, I he beat the Volscians down from their rampier, for they were not able to endure his violence. And having gotten over all their trenches and fortifications, he drave the fearfull multitude clean out of their hold, that now were retired to a side and corner of the camp. The horsemen might not easily get over the trench, and stood still of purpose to behold the fight, and to mark them when they should flie: but having once gotten them in the open fields, they chased them as they ran away on heaps: and by killing them in their fearfull flight, deserved their part in that victorie. Great was the execution both within the camp, and also without the rampires, as they fled; but greater was the pillage, for that the enemies had much ado to carry their armour away with them, and but that they shrowded themselves as they fled in the woods, they had perished every man. During these exploits about Antium, the Æquians having sent before them the tallest and lustiest K young men they had, surpris'd the castle of Tusculum, upon a sudden and at unawares in the night season: and with the rest of their power they were encamped not far from the wals of Tusculum, intending to intercept and stay the army of their enemies. Tidings hereof came in post to Rome, and from Rome to the camp before Antium: which troubled the Romans as much as if news had been brought, that the Capitoll was taken. So fresh in remembrance was the late desert of the Tusculans: and the like jeopardy seeming to challenge and redemand semblable aid and succour. Fabius letting all other things aside, caused the booty in all haste to be conveyed out of the camp to Antium: where having left an indifferent guard, he hastneth space in order of battell to Tusculum; by reason whereof, the souldiers could take nothing with them, but their armour, and such baked or boyled meats as were at hand ready. The Consul (Cornelius) sent a con- L voy of victuals unto them from Rome. Thus for certain months continued the war at Tusculum. The Consul (Fabius) with one part of his host assailed the camp of the Æquians: for the other part he had let the Tusculans have, to win again their fortresse. Against all force it was impregnable, but in the end famine constrained the enemies to abandon it. To which extremity being at length driven, they were by the Tusculans disarmed and compelled to passe naked under the * yoke. Who as they fled homeward with shame enough, were overtaken of the Roman Consul in Algidum, and put to the sword every one. After this victory, he encamped with the rest of his army at Columen, for so the place is named. The other Consul likewise, seeing that there was no danger threatening the wals of Rome, now that the enemy was discomfited & repulsed, departed himself from the citie. So the Consuls entring two waies the borders of their enemies, made sharp war and spoiled the Volscians of the one side, and the Æquians on the other. I find in most M writers that the Antiates in this year rebelled: and that L. Cornelius the Consul managed that war and won the town. But for as much as there is no mention made of that matter in any ancient writers, I dare not avouch it for a certaine truth.

* A kind of gallows made with two javelins pitched endlong in the ground, and a third fastned overthwart to the other.

* Treasurers of Generall Receivers of the city

This war was no sooner brought to an end, but the domesticall Tribunes war at home put the Nobles in fear: for the Tribunes cried out that this was cautelous and fraudulent dealing, thus to keep the armies abroad, for nothing els but to disappoint them for publishing the law. Yet nevertheless, since they had begun it, they would not give over, but go through with it and see an end. Howbeit P. Lucretius, president of the city for the time, prevailed thus much with them, That all Tribunitian actions should hang & be deferred unto the coming of the Consuls. There was besides a new occasion arose of fresh trouble. A. Cornelius and Quintus Servilius * Questors, gave N summons to M. Volscius to make his answer at a day, who laid to his charge that he without all doubt, had born false witness against Caso. For by many presumptions and evidences it appeared, that neither Volscius his brother, from the first time that he fell sick and took his bed, was at any time seen openly in the streets, or so much as to have sit up, and mended any whit, but of that disease which held him many months, he languished and consumed away to death: nor about that time, wherein the deponent supposed the deed was done, was Caso once seen at Rome: it being plainly affirmed and proved by those who served together with him in the wars, that he was ordinarily all the time fighting under his colours as well as they, without any passport or licence to depart. And to make this good, many there were that of themselves privately challenged Volscius, and offered to traverse the law and to be tried by any indifferent and competent judges. But when as he durst not abide the triall and to be judged, all these things put together and so consonant one to the other, made men doubt no more of the condemnation of Volscius then of Caso, which was grounded upon the bare testimony of Volscius. The Tribunes were only the stay; who said plainly they would not suffer the Questors to hold any sessions or judiciall court, for the trial of the defendant, before they had a solemn assembly about their law. So were both these matters

A matters put off unto the Consuls coming. Who being entred with triumph into the city, with their victorious armie, & no words made of the law, many thought the Tribunes were clean dard and stricken dead. But they (for that the year now was at an end) aspiring to be Tribunes the fourth time, left all their hot contention for the law, and reserved themselves wholly to argue and reason at the assembly for the Election of new Magistrats. And albeit the Consuls had bent all their might and main against the continuance of the Tribuneship, as earnestly, as if a law had been propounded, tending to the impairing and abridging of their majesty, yet got the Tribunes the mastery, and had the hand of them in the end. In this year peace was granted upon request and petition, unto the Equians. And the Session, which the year before began, was now finished.

B And this was counted the tenth general Survey and solemn purging of the citie from the foundation thereof. There were numbred in the Cense-book of citizens 132419 polles: Aglorious and honourable year it was untill the Consuls, both at home and in war. For they not onely procured peace abroad, but also the citie was, if not in perfect concord and unitie, yet in lesse trouble than at other times. L. Minutius, and L. Nautius, that there were created Consuls, entred upon the reliques of the two matters begun the former year. And much after one sort, as the Consuls crossed the going forward of the law, so the Tribunes hindred the judiciall proceeding against Volsenus. But the new Questors were men of more power and greater authority. For together with M. Valerius, the son of Valerius, and nephew of Volsenus, was T. Quintius Capitolinus created Questour, a man that had been thrice Consul. Forasmuch theretore, as Cato, the worthiest gentleman of all other, and the very ornament of the youth of Rome, could not be restored again,

C neither to the house of the Quintij, nor the commonweal, he pursued of mere pietie, with just & lawfull war, and false witness, who would not suffer on anyhand the innocent person to have the liberty to plead in his own defence. And when Virginij, most of all the other Tribunes, was earnest to publish the law, the Consuls had two months respite given them to consider thereof, and look into it thoroughly: to the end, that when they had advertised the people what secret fraud and inconvenience was hidden and lurked therein, they might afterwards suffer them to proceed to a sentence, and gather voices accordingly. This space between granted, brought the citie into a good and quiet state.

D But the Equians would not abide, that long it should continue so; Who having broken the league, which the year before was made with the Romans, chose Gracchus Cluilius for their governor and generall, who was in those daies the greatest man among the Equians. Under the conduct of this Gracchus, they enter first in warlike manner the country of Lanuvium, and from thence into the territorie of Tusculum, spoiling and ransacking as they went: and being loaden with preyes and booties, they pitch their tents in Algidum. Thither repaired from Rome into their camp, Q. Fabius, P. Valerius, and A. Posthumus as embassadours, to complain of wounds received, and to demand amends and satisfaction according to covenant. The Generall of the Equians seemed to grant them audience, and willed them to declare what message and commission they had from the Senat of Rome, unto the oake; for that himself had some other matters to dispatch the while. Now there grew a mightie great Oake hard by the General his pavilion, spreading

E his boughs even over it, and the shadow thereof served for a cold sitting place. Then one of the Embassadors, as he went his way, "Let both the sacred Oake (quoth he) and what divine power soever is seated in this place, heare and know, that by you first the league is broken, who now regard our present complaints, and shortly assist our valiant armies, when we shall prosecute and revenge at once the disloyall breach, both of Gods laws and mans. So soon as the Embassadors were returned to Rome, the Senat gave direction, that one of the Consuls should lead forth an armie against Gracchus, into Algidum, and the other have in commission, to waite the borders of the Equians. The Tribunes, as their manner was, hindred the muster and peradventure had staied it altogether, but for a new fearfull occurrent that suddainly came in the neck of the other. For a mightie power of Sabines were approached well neer to the wals of the citie, robbing, spoiling and destroying all a fore them with sword and fire. The territorie was pitiously round about

F laid desolat, and the citie therewith sore terrified. Then the Commons stomacks came down, and gently they tooke weapons in hand: and (say what the Tribunes would against it) two great armies were enrolled. Nautius had the leading of the one against the Sabines: and being encamped at Eretum, with rodes and incursions, and those for the most part by night, made such foul work and wast in The Sabines country, that in comparison thereof, the lands about Rome, seemed as if they had not been once touched. Minutius in his exploits, had neither like good successe, nor yet equall courage and valour of heart. For having pitched his tents not far from the enemy, and received no great spoile and losse at his hands to speak of, yet he kept himselfe for fear within the camp. Which when the enemies perceived, they grew more bold (as commonly the cowardite of one increaseth the courage of another) and assailed the camp in the night season: but seeing that plain force little prevailed, the morrow after they raised mounts, and cast trenches round about. But before they had with their countermures and rampires stopped up all passages, five horsemen being even amongst the guards of the enemies, brought news to Rome, that the Consul with his armie was besieged. Nothing could there have hapned so little thought of, and unlooked for: whereupon there was such fear, trembling, and quaking, as if the enemies had besieged not the camp, but the very citie. Nautius the Consul they send for, and because they thought him like to doe but small good, they agreed theretore to creat a Dictator, who

Now a world and wonder it is to hear them speak, that in regard of riches despise all things else, and suppose there can be no great honour and virtue, but where wealth and riches do flow in excess. This L. Quintius, the only hope of the Romans, the man who was to set upright their Empire now distressed, occupied then a peece of ground, to the quantity of foure acres, called at this day Quintia prata, Quintius his meddows, on the other side of Tyber, over against that very place, where now the Arsenall and Shippdocks are, and there was he found digging a ditch, and bearing hard on his spade, or else a plowing the ground, I wot not whether, but busie and earnest about some rustical work, no doubt he was: and after salutations passed on both sides, between him and the Embassadors that were sent, he was requested by them, that I he would put on his best gown, and (that which might turn to the good of himself and the commonweal) hear a message from the Senat. First, he marvelled what the matter should be, & very often asking of them if all were well: he willeth his wife Racilia to bring him forth his Senators robe straitway, out of his sorie cottage: which he put on his back (but first he brushed off the dust, and wiped away his sweat, and made himself somewhat mannerly) and then came forth unto them, who in joyous manner, by way of congratulation, filled him by the name of Dictator: calling hard upon him to repair unto the city, and declaring in how doubtfull termes the armie stood. Then was there barge provided ready for Quintius, at the cities cost: and being ferried over the river, his three sons met him and received him first, then others of his kinsfolk and friends, and after them the more part of the Senatours. Thus attended with this frequent company, and with the K Sergeants going before, was he brought to his house. Great concourse there was also of the Commons: but nothing so joyous were they, to see Quintius, supposing that government of his over-great and absolute, and himself a man in time of his rule, too imperious. And for that night verily, nothing was done, but a good standing watch kept in the city. The morrow after, the Dictator being come into the common place of assembly before day-light, appointed Generall of the horle, L. Tarquinius, of Noble blood descended: a man who for mere poverty had ever served on foot, but of all the flower of Rome was reputed and taken to be a brave servitour, and an excellent souldier. Then Quintius with the Generall of horsemen, mounteth into the pulpit aloft: proclaimeth a publicke vacation or Lawfeed: commandeth all shop windows through the city to be shut, and chargeth that no man should follow any privat businesse of his own. Then as many as were of age to fight, were willed to shew themselves in their armour, before the sun set, in Mars field, every one with victuals dressed for five daies, and with twelve forked stakes a peece for to pitch in the rampart. And that whosoever were above that age, and were unwelldy, and not meet for service should dresse and provide victuals for the next souldier unto him, whiles he himself made ready his armour, and sought for stakes aforesaid. Thus ran the young able men to and fro, to furnisb themselves with stakes, and took whatsoever they could find, and whatsoever was next hand: no man was forbidden, and so they were all ready with heart and good will, according to the Dictator his proclamation. Then went the Dictator forth with the legions of footmen, the Master of the horle likewise with his men of arms, in such good order and aray, as might not only serve for a speedy march to rid ground, but also for a set battell if occasion served. "In M "both regiments they spared not to encourage and exhort their souldiers, according as the present "time required: willing them to set foot forward, to mend their pace and make speed, that by "night time they might reach to their enemies: & not (say they) before there was great need: for "that the Roman Consul and army were besieged, and had now three daies already been pent "up fast inclosed: and what might happen in one day or one night, no man knew: for oftentimes "in the twinciking of an eye, and in the very turning of an hand, there fall out accidents of right "great moment and importance. On afore spce, Ensigne crieth one: follow souldier faitha- nother. Thus went they also lustily forward, and all to pleasure and gratifie their captains. So that by midnight they were come into Algidum: and so soon as they perceived their enemies to be neer at hand, they pitched down their ensignes. Then the Dictator rode about as far forth N as he could see in the dark, and having viewed well the situation, coasting and fashion of the camp, commanded the Marshalls and Colonels to give direction, That all the carriage and baggage, should be laid up together in one place, and that the souldiers with their armour and stakes only, should come again into their ranks. What he commanded was soon done. Then in the same order that he marched, he draweth out his host in length, and compasseth the camp of his enemies: and commandeth them all (upon a signall or watchword given) to set up a shout, and presently upon the shout to cast a trench, & every man stuck down his pale in the rampier. Having given this charge, straightwayes the signall followed. The souldiers do that which they were bidden: the shout was heard over all the camp of the enemies, yea, and into the Consul his camp: causing in the one great fear, in the other exceeding joy. The Romans rejoycing one O with another to hear the shout of their fellow-citizens and countriemen, with a conceit of their coming to relcue, begin of themselves from their sentinels and Corps de guard, to threaten and terrifie their enemies. The Consul set them forward and said, there was now no staying for the matter, nor delaies to be made: for that it appeared by that alarm, that not only their friends were come with succours, but also had begun to skirmish: and that it was all to nothing, that their enemies camp, was already on the outward side assaulted. Whereupon, he commandeth his souldiers to arm, and to follow hard after him. Thus in the night began the skirmish, and

A and the legions of a Dictator by their outcry and shouting made signification that the enemies on that side also were driven to their shifts and in great hazard. By this time the Equians had addressed themselves to impeach them in their trenching and making of their rampire, to the end that they might not be compassed about: but the alarme was given and the skirmish already begun by their enemies within: fearing therefore, lest they would break through the midst of their camp, they turned from the pioneers and workmen without, to them that fought within, and thereby gave the other leave to ply their work and labour all the night long at their pleasure: and so they maintained skirmish with the Consul, untill day light. Now by the break of day they were entrenched on every side by the Dictator, and were scarce able to hold out battell with one of the armies. Then the host of Quintius, which presently upon the finishing of the trench returned to their weapons, entering of the mures and rampires of the enemies. Here began a fresh conflict again, and yet the former nothing abated. The enemies then seeing themselves thus distressed and to hardly driven on every side, left fighting and fell to intreating: they besought the Consul, on one side and the Dictator on the other, that they would not get the victorie by effusion of blood and cruel massacre, but would permit them to go their waies naked without their weapons. The Consul he posted them off to the Dictator: who being in great wrath and displeasure, would not be contented without their shame and ignominy besides. But commanded that Cleulus their generall with other Colonels and Captains should be brought bound unto him. Item, he enjoyned them to abandon & quit the town of Corbio: as for the Equians blood, he sought not for it, he had no need thereof: they might depart with their lives. Howbeit, because he would have it now at length, maugre their heads, confessed, that the nation was vanquished and subdued; his will and pleasure was, they should passe all under the yoke or gallows: the maner wherof is this. They took three spears or javelins, and set two of them pitched in the ground endlong, and their overthrow fastned unto the other. Under this kind of gallows the Dictator compelled the Equians to go. Thus having gotten the tents of the enemies full of all kind of store (for naked he sent them under the yoke) the whole pillage he bestowed upon his own souldiers only: and rebuking sharply the Consul's army and the Consul himself, Ye shall (quoth he) souldiers go without your part of booty won of the enemy, whose booty ye had like your selves to have been. And as for thee, O L. Minutius, until thou begin to have the heart and courage befitting a Consul, thou shalt be a Lieutenant only over these legions. So Minutius being discharged of the Consulship, remained still as he was commanded, with the army. But so well were men content in those daies, willingly to yeeld obedience to them that better could command, that this army in remembrance hereof as of a favour received, rather then of a disgrace offered, both ordained for the Dictator a coronet of gold of one pound weight: and also when he went homeward, saluted him by the name of their Patron. At Rome the Senat being assembled together by Q. Fabius Provost of the citie, decreed that Quintius should enter the city in triumph with his army marching in battell aray as he came. Before his chariot was led the commanders of his enemies: the ensignes are carried before, then followed the army laden with spoil and pillage. Great cheer and banquets were set out, men lay upon tables at every mans dore. Thus making merry, they followed the chariot with songs of triumph, with sports and merry conceits, as they are wont to do at their great and solemn feasts. The same day L. Mamilius the Tusculan, with the approbation and good liking of all men, was enfranchised citizen of Rome. And forthwith would the Dictator have resigned up his office, but that the Court, held for the triall of M. Volscius, endited of bearing false witnesse, staid him: and in truth, the Tribunes would have hindred the judicall proceeding against him, if they had not stood in awe of the Dictator. But Volscius was convicted and had sentence, and departed to Lanuvium in exile. And Quintius having taken the Dictatorship for six months, gave it over the sixteenth day after he entred into it. About the same time the Consul Nautius fought valiantly with the Sabines at Ereum: who besides the wassing of the fields, had an overthrow in fight. Fabius was sent into Algidum, to succeed in the roome of Minutius. In the end of the year, the Tribunes began to stir, about their law: but because the two armies were absent, the Senatour prevailed so much at that time, that no bills were propounded unto the people. The Commons likewise obtained, that they might create the self-same Tribunes, now the fifth time. The report goeth, that there were seen in the Capitol, wolves chased away by hounds: for which strange sight, the Capitol was purged. And these were the acts of that year. Then followed Consuls Q. Minutius & M. Horatius Pulvillius.

In the beginning of which year, while all was quiet abroad, the same Tribunes and the same law caused dissention and sedition at home: which would have grown to a farther mischief, in such heats men were, had not word been brought, as it were of set purpose, that the garison at Corbio was surprized in the night by the Equians and put to the sword: whereupon the Consuls called the Senat together: and order was given, that they should lead a Subitary army and with a running camp invade Algidum. Then was the strife about the law laid aside clean, and a new contention arose about the musters. But the Consuls with all their authority, were overruled of the Commons, by the help and assistance of the Tribunes. At what time a new trouble put them in fear: for intelligence came, that a power of Sabines were come down already into the territories of Rome for to fetch booties and make spoil: and from thence advanced against the city. Upon which fear, the Tribunes were content that souldiers should be prest, yet not without this covenant indented: That for as much as they had now themselves these five years been trifled off and deluded, & that this protectorship of theirs stood the Commons in little stead, in regard of their small number, therefore, there should from thenceforth be ten created Tribunes of the Commonalty. The Nobles were so near driven and to such straits, that will they, nill they, yeeld they must thereto: with this proviso, that they should never after Elect the same men Tribunes twise. And for fear that this act should after the war was once past, turn to nothing, like as others had done before, they went in hand immediately to call a court for the Election of the Tribunes. So in the 36. year from the first Tribunes of the Commons chosen, there were ten created: out of every Classis, two. And by an act it was provided, that in such sort they should be created ever after. The musters then being taken and souldiers enrolled, Minnius went with a power against the Sabines, but found not the enemy. And Horatius, because the Equians after they had put the garison at Corbio to the sword, and won Hortana besides, fought with them in Algidum. Many a man there he slew, and drove his enemies not only out of Algidum, but also out of Corbio and Hortana. As for Corbio he utterly rased it, for betraying the garison there. After this, were M. Valerius and Sp. Virginius made Consuls. At quiet they were both at home and abroad. But great scarcity there was of corn, by reason of the untemperat and unseasonable rain that fell. A bill there was preferred, that the mount Aventine should be turned to Commons. And the same Tribunes were made again: who, all the year following, when T. Romulus and C. Veturius were Consuls, in all their Halls and assemblies, still published the law: saying, it was a shame, that their number was thus increased to no purpose, in case their affairs should lie dead in their two years, as they had done in the whole 5. years past. Whiles they were earnestly debating these things, fearfull messengers came in all hast from Tusculum, with news, that the Equians were in the territory of Tusculum. The fresh desert of that nation would not suffer the Romans for shame to defer their helping hand. Wherupon both Consuls were sent with an army, and met with the enemies in Algidum in their wonted haunt and accustomed place, where they encountred and struck a battell: in which were slain about 7000. enemies. The rest were put to flight. A huge booty there was gotten, which the Consuls sold out-right, by reason of the want of mony in their common treasury. But this caused the souldiers to repine and grudge, and in the end ministred matter to the Tribunes, to accuse the Consuls unto the Commons. As soon therefore as they were out of their office, when Sp. Tarpeius and A. Eternius were Consuls: Romulus was arrested and put in suit by C. Claudius Cicerus, Tribune of the Commons. And Veturius was likewise troubled by L. Halerius an Edile or Warden of the Commons. Condemned they were both the one and the other, to the great indignation of the Nobles. Romulus was fined in * 10000 Asles. Veturius in * 15000. But for all this hard hap and calamity that befell to those former Consuls, the new were never a jot more remisse and cool in the quarrel: saying, Well may we also be cast and condemned, and both Commons and Tribunes never the neeter to compasse and enact their law. Then the Tribunes giving over the law, which now by propounding only to oft, was waxen stale and old, began more gently to deal with the Senators, praying them to make an end once of all strife and contention. And in case that the laws of the Commons so disliked and displeased them, they requested them to suffer certain Law-makers to be created indifferently out of the Commonalty, as well as of the Nobility, who might devise acts commodious & profitable to both parts and or the equal liberty and freedom of all. As for the substance it self of this motion, the Senators refused not: but they flatly said, that none but of the Nobility should have the making of those laws. Seeing then they agreed thus about the laws, & differed only and squared about the lawgiver, there were Embassadors sent to Athens, Sp. Posthumius Albus, A. Manlius, and P. Sulpicius Camerinus: who were commanded to exemplifie and copy out the famous and worthie laws of Solon: to search out and learn the ordinances, customes, and rites of other cities in Greece. For any outward wars, this year was quiet, and the year following more quiet, when P. Curiatius, and Sex. Quinctilius were Consuls, by reason of the continual silence of the Tribunes: which, as the expectation of the Embassadors that were gone to Athens, and of strange and forain laws, first and principally procured: so, two mighty great calamities that rose both at once, to wit, famine and pestilence, noisome and loathsome both to man and beast, afterwards continued. By means wherof, the fields lay wast and desolate, the city dispeopled with continual burials: many right worshipful and honourable houses thereby mourned. Sergius Cornelius, the Flamin of Quirinus dyed therof. C. Horatius Pulvillus the Augur went of it likewise: in whose room the Augurs (his Associates) chose C. Veturius: and therather, because he had been condemned by the people. Quinctilius the Consul departed also this life, and four Tribunes of the Commons. So that this was a year, with manifold losses and calamities foully distained. But for enemies all was quiet. After this were C. Menenius, and P. Sestius Capitolinus made Consuls. In which year likewise there was no war abroad, many at home some troubles arose. By this time were the Embassadors returned with the Athenian laws. And therefore the Tribunes were so much the more earnest and urgent, that once at length they would set on, to describe and put down some laws. And agreed it was, that there should be created Decemvirs above all appeal: & for the year: en g. there should no other Officers and Magistrats be in place. Now, whether any of these might be of the Commons or no, that was a question: and hereupon some debate and controversy continued for a good while. At the last, the Nobles went away with it, & had the preheminance, upon this condition, that neither the law Scitia, concerning the Aventine mount, nor other sacred lawes should be repealed. Thus in the 30. year after that Rome was built, was the form of the cities government changed the second time, and to the Consuls from the Decemviri, was the sovereign rule translated, like as before, from the kings to the Consuls.

A This change was lesse notable, in that it long continued not. The beginning of this Magistracie was fair and goodly to see to, but grew too rank, and exceeded in overmuch licentiousnesse. The sooner therefore it faded and fell away, and the former government was taken up again, and both the name and jurisdiction of Consuls returned, and was conferred upon twain. The Decemvirs created were these: Ap. Claudius, T. Gentius, P. Sestius, L. Velutius, C. Iulius, A. Manlius, P. Sulpicius, P. Curiatius, T. Romulus, Sp. Posthumus, C. Claudius and Gentius, because they had been Consuls elect for that year, had this dignity bestowed upon them, in lieu of the other. And Sestius one of the Consuls the year before, because he had preferred this matter unto the Senators, against his fellow Consul's will. Next to these were counted the three Embassadors that went to Athens, both for that they should be rewarded with this honourable dignity, for their embassage into so far & remote a country, & also because men were perswaded, that by reason of their insight and skill in forraign ordinances of strange nations, they might be well employed in setting down, and making of new; The rest made up the number. They say, that in the last scrutinies and suffrages at this Election, choice was made of those that were more aged, and farther kept in years, to the end they might not so fiercely and stoutly gainsay and crosse the opinions and constitutions of the other. In this new state of government, Appius was the man that bare the greatest stroke, he ruled the roost and swayed all the rest, so highly stood he in grace and favour with the people. He had so altered his nature, and became such a new man, that all on a sudden, of a cruel and terrible persecutor of the Commons, he proved a very Publicola, and courter of the Commonalty, and one that lay for to get every gale of popular love and favour that might be had. Every one sat his tenth day in place of judgement, and ministred justice in their severall turnes unto the people. On which day, the twelve knitches of rods were born by the Lictors before the sovereign judge: as for his nine brethren, they had each of them one sejeant to give attendance. In this agreement among themselves, (which accord other whiles when they were privat persons, had been hurtfull unto them) rested only and wholly the greatest equity towards others. A proof and argument of this their moderation, it shall be sufficient to observe now in the example and instance of one onely matter: for whereas they were created absolute, and pait all appeal, it fortun'd, that in the house of P. Sestius, a Nobleman, there was a dead body found buried, and brought forth openly into the publicke assembly of the people. The thing being no lesse apparent in view, then hainous and horrible in fact, C. Iulius a Decemvir, brought Sestius in question therefore, put him in suit to answer at a certain day, and became plaintiff unto the people, and accus'd that defendant, whose competent judge he was by order of law. And so he yeilded of his own right: adding so much to the freedom of the people, as was taken from the power of his own jurisdiction and government. When as now both high and low gave out, that this authority was sound and uncorrupt, & set as it were from Oracle, and Gods own mouth, & all men willing to accept of justice at their hands: then set they to it, and went about the making and giving of laws. And with great expectation of men, they set out ten Tables, and called the people to a generall assembly, commanding them in a good hour, and in the name of God to go, & (that which might turn to the good, to the benefit, and happiness of the Commonweal, themselves their children & posterity) to read the law there published: protesting, that as ten men could with all their wisdom foresee & provide for, had devised indifferent lawes, and equall for all sorts of callings, as well the best as the meanest. But for as much as the wits and heads of many men, were of deeper reach to see farther into things, they gave them good leave, to cast in their minds, and ponder with themselves each particular, yea, and to reason together from point to point, and thereof to deliver their opinion openly, what was short and wanting, or what was superfluous, in every article: and look what laws the consent of all men seemed to bring in, those should the people accept, and none other: that it might appear they were not so much to approve of them and give their assent after they were propounded, as to propose and preferre them their own selves. And when as they were thought sufficiently corrected, according to the speeches of men, and as every one spake to the severall titles and chapters of the laws, as they were set forth: then in the high court of Parliament, assembled of all the Centuries & degrees of men, the laws of ten Tables were enacted and established. Which even at this day, among that infinit number of statuts, heaped and hudled one upon another, are the very well-spring and fountain of all justice, both publick and privat. After this, there ran a rumour abroad, that two tables were yet wanting, which if they were put unto the rest, then might the complete body as it were of the whole Roman law be finished and made perfect. The expectation thereof, now that the great Leet-day grew neer for the Election, made men very desirous to create Decemvirs again the second time. Now the Commons abroad, besides that they hated the very name of Consuls, as well as of Kings, sought not greatly for the protection of the Tribunes: seeing that the Decemvirs one after another, yeilded in their prerogative, and admitted in some sort the appeal.

G But after that the solemn assembly for the chusing of Decemvirs, was published against the * Trinundinum, or third market day next ensuing, to such an heighth was the ambition and desire of this dignity growne, that the very chiefe men, and principall heads of the City (for feare, I beleeve, lest the possessions of so great a government, in case they were not invited themselves in the place, should lie open unto some unmeet and unworthy persons) went about and made court to every man, using in humble manner to those very Commons, with whom they had been at strife & variance, for that honour and dignity, which they themselves had with all their power and might impugned. through such offices, being now come in question, and submitted to the choice and judgement of others, pricked on Ap. Claudius, and set him forwards. So as a man could hardly know whether to reckon him among the Decemvirs, or those that stood to be Decemvirs again. For otherwhiles he was more like one that sued for an office, than him that presently bare office: blaming personages of best quality in the City, and laying hard to their charge: but extolling the vainest & basest of the Competitors. Himself in person sorting among the Duili and Iulij, and such like, as favoured the Tribunes, went swinging and squaring in the common place, using them as instruments to venditate himself forth to the common people. So long, as at length his very brethren in office, who untill that time had been singularly addicted and affectionated unto him, cast their eyes upon him, and began to mark, & marvel much what his meaning was: reasoning thus among themselves: I
 "Surely there is no soundnesse nor goodnesse herein, but all meer dissimulation and hypocrisie.
 "Certainly, it is not for nought, that in such pride of his, there should appear so much courtesie.
 "What? to force his own nature too much within compasse: to debase himself, and suffer private men to be his fellows, was a signe of one, that made not so much hast to forgo a dignity and promotion, as sought means to keep it still. Openly they durst not presume to check and withstand his ambitious desire, but assailed by pleasing and soothing him up, to repress and bridle his foolish affection. And seeing he was the younger of his company, they all with one accord laid upon him the charge, to hold the high court for the Election of Decemvirs. Their drift and policy was, that he should not Elect his own self; a thing, which unlesse it were the Tribunes again, (and that was a most dangerous precedent and example) no man ever had done before. And he with K all his heart accepting thereof, made profession that he would be president of that honourable Court and Session, and prayed to the gods that he might perform it for the benefit of the weal-publik. And so took the vantage of that opportunity, to set forward his own design, which they meant should have stopped and crossed the same. And after he had by secret packing and consaving with the other competitors, and given the repulse unto the two Quintii (Capitolinus, and Cincinnatus) and put beside the Cushion his own Uncle by the fathers side (C. Claudius, a most stout & resolute champion of the Nobility) with other citizens of like mark and quality: he createth Decemvirs, such as were not for worth, port, and behaviour, to them comparable and his own sweet self with the first. Which as there was no man thought he ever would have done, so all good men misliked when it was done. With him were elected M. Cornelius Maluginensis, M. Sergius, L. Minutius, Q. Fabius Vibulanus, Q. Petilius, T. Antonius Merenda, Caso Duilius, Sp. Oppius Cornicen, M. Rabuleius. And there's an end of Appius playing anothers mans part. Off went his mask and visour now, and so from thence-forth, he began to shew himself in his own likenesse, and to live in his kind: yea, and to frame his companions to the bent of his bow, even before they were entered into office. Day by day had they their secret meetings by themselves apart from all other: and being once hereby furnished with ungracious and proud designments, which they had closely complotted together, they could no longer hold & dissemble their pride. Few might have access unto them: seldom would they be spoken with, shewing themselves strange, surly, & churlish to those that came unto them. Thus drew they the time on, unto the * Ides of May, which was the usuall and solemn day then of entring into offices of government. In the very beginning whereof they made the first day of their magistracie noted by an intimation and evident shew of exceeding M terrour. For whereas the Decemvirs their predecessors had observed this order, That one alone should have the rods of State born before him, and that this regall ornaments should passe round through them all in course one after another: Behold, these came all of them abroad, and each of them had his xij. bundles of rods carried before him. So that these Lictors, 120 in number, with their rods and axes too, fastned within the rods, took up and filled the whole Forum or common place as they went. And for as much as they were created absolutely, and their commission ran without all appeal, men made this exposition, that to go with their axes or without was all one, & made no matter at all. Thus was there a shew & representation of ten KK. And this terrour grew more and more, not with the meanest and basest sort only, but also with the chief and best of the Patritians: supposing that they sought to pick a quarell, and minister occasion and overture to some N massacre: that if any man should offer either in the Senat or among the people, to speak one word concerning liberty, forthwith there should be exemplary whipping and heading, to the terrour of all other. For, besides that, from the people there was no remedy and succour to be had, by reason that the appeal unto them was quite disannulled and taken away: the Decemvirs themselves drew so all in one line together and were so combined and linked, that there was no hope at all, that one would thwart and crosse that which another did: whereas the former Decemvirs could well abide, that their judgements and sentences should be censured and corrected, by the appellations or appeal to one of their brethren in commission: yea, and in some cases put off some matters from themselves to be decided by the people, which seemed properly to belong O unto their own jurisdiction. For a while, the fear was to all indifferent: but by little and little the Commons only began to feel the smart. The Nobles were forbore and escaped clear and leetfree: the meaner persons went to the wals, and with them they dealt according to their lust and pleasure right cruelly. The person wholly they regarded, and never respected the cause, as with whom favour and friendship prevailed as much as equity and right should have done. At home in their houses, they determined of matters how they should passe: and in open place they pronounced sentence accordingly. If a man had appealed to one of their bench, from him

13. day of May

A unto whom he fled for relief, he went his waies again by weeping crosse, repenting that he stood not to the order and injunction awarded by the former. It was thought and spoken also abroad, but the first author would not be known. That they had conspired together, not for the present time only to do wrong and injurie, but also were confederat between themselves privily, yea, and had bound it with an oath, to call no assembly at all for the electing of new magistrats: but being now once invested in the soveraign rule, to hold the possession of the Decemvirship for ever. The Commons than began to look about them, to behold and advise well the countenances of the Nobles, to see if they could from them catch some good gale of wind, some hope again of liberty, at whose hands they fearing bondage, had brought the common-weal to this hard passe.

B The LL. of the Senat hated the Decemvirs, they hated also the Commons. They liked not of things as they went; and yet were perswaded that the Commons were well enough served, and deserved no better: who gaping greedily after liberty were now fallen and plunged into servitude and thraldome. Help they would not with the least of their fingers, but rather heap more wrongs upon them: that having a wearisome and tedious loathing of the present state, they might fall to a longing desire after two Consuls, and with the old world were come again. By this time now was the better part of the year gone and past: and the two tables of laws were annexed to the other ten of the former year: which if they might be once confirmed and ratified by a Parliament of the Centuries, there remained nothing behind, for which the common-weal should need these magistrats: but expected it was certainly, that the assembly for Election of Consuls should out of hand be published and proclaimed. Marry, there was one thing hammered in the Commons heads, by what means they might revive again the Tribunes authority; the very grand bulwark of their freedom, and the thing that now had discontinued and lien dead. But all this while there was not a word of the new Election. And the Decemvirs, who at the first presented usually unto the Commons fight, a crew of those that favoured the Tribunes, for to attend upon their persons (a thing right plausible and pleasing unto the people) were guarded now, with certain tall pensioners of their Nobility: whole troups of them stood about their Tribunal seats and places of judgment. These made havock and spoil of the Commons and their goods: and look what the mind of a mighty man stood unto and lusted after, it was his hap to have it whatsoever. Nay, there was no spare now made of their backs and sides: some were scourged with rods, some lost their heads by the ax. And because this cruelty should not go unrewarded, lightly there was none executed, if he were worth any thing, but his goods went after and were begged or given away. The youth of the Nobility, by this kind of hire well fleshed: not only opposed not themselves to withstand these wrongful dealings & hard courses, but carried it afore them, openly professing & avowing that they wished rather their own licentiousness, than the liberty of all. The * Ides of May were now come about, and no new magistrats elected in the others roome. Forth come the Decemvirs, (who to say a truth and to give them their right, were no other than privat persons) neither with minds abated for the exercising of their imperious rule, nor with fewer regal ensignes, to set out and shew their honour & dignity. When the people saw that, they made no other reckoning but this was plain usurping of the kings government, and no better: And now farewell freedom for ever and a day. For neither had they presently, nor hereafter were they like to have any man to recover it again. So that now, not they only let fall their hearts and were discouraged in themselves, but also grew to be contemptible in the eyes of their neighbour-nations: who dildained highly, that they should have soveraignty of rule, who were not free themselves, nor enjoyed their own liberty. For the Sabines with a strong power invaded the Territories of Rome: and when they had foraged far and neer, and driven away booties both of people and of cattell, without impeachment, they gather their army together again, that had hanged here and there up and down, and entred unto Eretum, where they encamp themselves: laying this for a ground, and building their hope upon their discord at Rome, that it would stay their mustering. Not only the news that came hercof, but the the flying of the country peasants, put the whole city in great fear.

C The Decemvirs fall to consulting what were best to do. And whiles they were to seek what course to take, and between the hatred of the Nobles and the Commons utterly forlorn and destitute, there hapned also another fearfull trouble in the tail of the former. The Equians from another side were encamped in Algidum. And from Tusculum Embassadors brought tidings that their country was wasted with excursions from thence, whereupon they craved their help and aid. These fearfull occurrences so troubled and perplexed the Decemvirs, that considering the city was now beset at once with wars from two places, their stomachs were come down to consult with the Senat. They commanded therefore the Senatours to be summoned to the Curia. And well they wist, what a great fit and storm of anger, displeasure and blame was towards: namely, that they would burden them & lay to their charge, how they were the only cause both of the country wasted already, and of the perils like presently to ensue: looking for no other, but that there would be given an attempt and shrewd push, to abolish utterly their government, unlesse they stuck closely together to it, and by extending their authority sharply upon some few of the stoutest, quail and crush the attempts of others. After the voice of the Bedell was heard in the Forum of common place, citing the Senatours to repaire into the Councell house to the Decemvirs: the novelty and strangeness of the matter, (because they had laid down for a long time the manner of calling them to Councell) caused the Commons to marvel and mune what was betallen, that they should after such discontinuance, take up a thing so obsolete and out of use. And thus they conceived of it, that they were much beholding to their enemies, and might thank war for this, that any ancient H guise and custom of a free city was come up and in use again. They looked about on every side of the Forum, to see if they might espy a Senator: but few or none could they hear of, any where.

Then looked they into the Curia, and behold, none at all appeared about the Decemvirs. Whereof their own selves, even the Decemvirs could gather no otherwise, but that in the conceit, & consent of all men, their government was become odious: & the Commons also thus collected and interpreted, that the Senators met not together, because privat men (such as the Decemvirs were indeed) had no authority to assemble a Senat. And now said they, is the way and entrance made to recover their liberty again, if so be the Commons would join with the Senat: and as the Nobles being called, meet not together in counsel, so the Commons likewise would refuse to be I muttered. In this wise muttered and whispered the Commons. And in truth scarcely was there any one of the Senators about the common place, and but few within the city: for very griefe and indignity to see that things went as they did, they had withdrawn themselves into the countrie to their lands: and forgetting the state of the common-weal, they became careful of their own privat affairs: thinking themselves so far forth freed from oppression and wrong, as they were remote and sequestred from the society, meeting and conference, with so Lordly & imperious rulers.
When they would not assemble at their summons, the officers were sent unto their houses, both for to streine and take away streffes for their contumacie and disobedience, and also to enquire and learn, whether they refused to come at their commandment, or of set purpose or no. And word K they bring back, that the Senators were in the country. The Decemvirs were better apaid to hear that, than if answer had come that they were at home and refused to obey. They they gave commandment that they should be sent for: and they warned a Senat house against the next day following: where they assembled more in number then they looked for. Whereupon the Commons supposed that their liberty was bought and sold and utterly betrayed by the Nobles, for that the Senat had yeilded obedience to them (that now by right were out of their office) as if they had given lawfull summons. who being privat men had no power at all so to do. But they shewed more obeisance and submission, as we have heard say, in coming to the Councel house, than any disposition to deliver their minds and opinions there, to the liking and pleasures of the Decemvirs.
First, L. Valerius Potitus, as it is recorded, after that Appius Claudius had proposed unto them the L cause of their meeting, before they were required their advice in order and course, claimed the liberty of the house, to speak in the behalfe of the common-weal. But when as the Decemvirs denied it flatly, yea, and forbad him with threats, upon pain of their high displeasure, he inferred again and menaced, that he would go forth unto the commons, and so began a broil and tumult.
M. Horatius Barbatus likewise took part with him, and was nothing behind in stoutnesse to maintain the quarell, terming them ten Tarquins: "and are ye aware (quoth he) how the Kings were in times past expelled by the the Valerii and Horatii? And yet the name it was not of "Kings, that men were so weary of and loathed in those daies. For why? it was right lawfull to call
"Jupiter by that name: whereby Romulus also the founder of this City, and other Princes his
"successours have been called: yea, and the name hath been used and is retained still as a solemn ti"tle, in the sacred rites of holy Kirk. Nay, it was the pride and oppression of the King, that then M
"was odious, and nothing els, which enormities, if they were in those daies in the King himself, a "lawfull prince, or in the King his son intollerable, who can abide and endure the same in so ma"ny privat persons? I advise you therefore to take heed how you debar men of their liberty of "speech in the Councel House, lest ye drive them thereby to speak their mind and complain with"out the Councel House. Neither see I any reason at all, why it were not as lawfull for me
"a privat man, to assemble the people to an audience, as for you to call the Senat together to a "Councel. Make triall whensoever ye will, ye shall find how much more forcible our just griefe
"will be, in recovering our libertie again, than this greedy desire of yours, holding and upholding "still your usurped, unlawfull, and tyrannicall rule. You have propounded here unto us, forsooth,
"concerning the Sabines war: as who would say, the people of Rome can be at greater war with N
"any than with those, who having been created Magistrates only for the publishing and enacting of "certain laws, have left now neither law nor justice at all within the city. Who have taken away "their Comices, i. Courts and Leets of Election, their yearly Magistrates, the successive change "and course of bearing rule, the only thing that maketh Isonomy, and equality of freedome. Who "being but private men, are possessed both of regall ornaments, and also of roiall government. Af"ter the expulsion of the Kings, the Magistrates that succeeded were of the Nobility: in pro-
"cesse of time, upon the rising of the Commons and their departure, there were officers chosen out "of the Commonalty. I demand of you, and I would gladly know, of whether state or body are "ye? Are ye, I pray you, popular, and of the Common people? What have ye ever done with ad"vice and approbation of the people? Are ye Nobles and Peers? who now for a whole years space O "almost, have held no Councell of Senators. And now that ye have assembled them, you restrain "them from speaking for the Weal-publick. Well presume not too much, neither bear your selves "upon the timorousness of others. For, trust me truly, the indignities that men already suffer, "seem more irksome and unsupportable, than whatsoever els they can doubt and fear hereafter. As Horatius spake these words aloud, and the Decemvirs could not bethink themselves of some indifferent & mean course, either in anger to be revenged, or in lenity to pardon and put up al, nor wist whereto this matter might tend and proceed in the end: then C. Claudius, uncle to Appius, the Decem-

to the Decemvis.

A Decemvir, began to speak, rather by of way praier and intreatie, then in checking and reproving wife, and besought Appius for his brothers foul sake, who was his own father, to remember and regard more that civil societie wherein he was born, then this ungracious and wicked con-federacie, contracted with his fellow Decemvirs. And this request I make (quoth he) tendering your privat estate more then the Commonweal. As for her, if she might not by fair meanes and with their good wils, obtain her own due and right, she would by foul waies, and in spight of their hearts recover it in the end. And for as much as of much debate and strife there ensue commonly heats of anger and cankred rancour, I am in dread & horror what the sequel and issue will be of these jars. Now when as the Decemvirs would not permit the rest to speak, but only to the point proposed and occasion of their meeting, yet they were abashed to interrupt the speech of Claudius and to cut him off: but suffered him to goe on untill he made an end. And in conclusion his opinion and sentence was, that he would not (to abide by it) agree, that any act of the Senat should for that time passe in that behalf. And all that were present took his words to, as if Claudius deemed no otherwise of the Decemvirs, then of private men. Many of them also, such especially as had been Consuls, were of his mind. and said as much. Another opinion there was, more rough and sharp in outward shew, but far lesse forcible and effectuell in deed: advising and willing the Nobles, to make no more ado, but to go together and chuse an Interregent. For this man seemed yet, to account and judge them Magistrates; (bad though they were) that had called a Senat, and held them in Councell: whereas the former, that would not abide any act to passe, reckoned them but for privat persons. Thus when the Decemvirs cause began to shrink and go downward, L. Cornelius Maluginensis, brother to Cornelius the Decemvir, being relieved of purpose to give his opinion in the last place of al the Consular Senatours, such as had been Consuls, pretending a care that they had of the war, took part with his brother and his Collegues, saying, that he marvelled much by what misfortune or destinie it hapned, that the decemvirs should be challenged and oppugned, especially by those that had stood for the Decemvirship, or by their friends and associates: and how it came about, that in so many months space, whiles the city was at rest and without fear of war, no man made question or doubt, whether they that were in place, and governed the state, were lawfull Magistrates or no: and now at last, when the enemies are in a manner at the gates, they should sow civil dissention, unlesse this were the meaning of it, that in a troubled state it would not be so clearly seen and perceived, what they went about. But no man is able (qud. he) to set down a true doom, & alledge a ruled case in so great a matter as this is, to men, whose minds are busied and wholly possessed of a greater care. And therefore my opinion is, that concerning that point which Valerius and Horatius charged the Decemvirs with, namely, That before the Ides of May their government was determined, and they out of office; the Senat should discusse and debate, when as the wars now at hand were dispatched, and the Commonweal brought once again to quietness. And that Appius Claudius should make this reckoning even now at hand, and know that he is to render a reason of that high court of Parla-ment, which for the election of Decemvirs he called and held, being a Decemvir himself:
 namely, Whether they were created for one year only, or to continue still, untill the other laws which yet are wanting, were ratified and confirmed. As for the present time, he thought good that all other matters should surcease, and be passed over, save the war only: the rumour whereof, if they thought to be false, and that they were but tales that not only the messengers, but also the Embassadors of the Tuscans reported, then his advise was to send out espials, who upon their discovery might bring more certain tidings. But in case they gave credence to messengers and Embassadors both, then with all speed possible to muster, and the Decemvirs to have the conduct of the armies, and to lead them whither they thought meet: and that nothing els should be thought upon before this. Which opinion of his, that it might prevail and take effect, the puerile Sentours by importunat convassing, obtained. Then Valerius and Horatius both rose up the second time more fierce and eager than before, calling upon them aloud, that they might be permitted to speak concerning the Commonweal: and in case they might not be suffered by reason of the faction, to have the liberty of speech in the Councell House, they would speak their mind without, before the people. For neither could privat men (as they were) debar them in Senat House, nor in open assembly & to give place unto their imaginary, and pretended imperial ensigns, they would never be brought. Then Appius supposing the matter wel-neer come to this passe, that unlesse the violence were resisted with like boldnesse, their rule was at an end, and their autho-ritie conquered: Ye were not best (quoth he) to speak but to the matter, whereupon we sit in Consultation. And when Valerius replied again and said plainly, that he would not hold his tongue for a privat mans commandment: Appius sent a Sergeant unto him. Whereupon Valerius cried for help to the Quirites, from the porch of the Councell House. Then L. Cornelius clapping Appius about the middle, without regard to content him whose good he pretended, staid the strife. So by the mediation of Cornelius, leave was granted to Valerius for to say his mind at his own pleasure. But, for as much as his libertie proceeded no farther, then to some few words, the Decemvirs held on their purpose still, and had their desire. The Nobles also, such as had been Consuls, and the ancients, upon an old cankred hatred that they beare still against the Tribuns authority, where upon they supposed the Commons were much more devoted and affected, then unto the government of the Consuls, were rather inclined and willing that the Decemvirs of their own accord should themselves afterwards forgo their office, than that upon hatred and malice received against

against them, the Commons should take heart of grace, and hold up head again. For it with gentle handling of the matter, without stir and clamour of the people, the regiment returned again unto the Consuls, it would haply come to passe, that either by meanes of wars coming between, or through the moderation of the Consuls in their government, the Commons might in time forget the Tribuns quite.

Thus whiles the Nobles were silent and made no more words, a muster was proclaimed, and the younger sort of people, seeing the government of the Decemvirs absolute and without appeal, made answer to their names. And when the legions were enrolled, the Decemvirs took order and agreed between themselves who should go forth to the wars, and who should have the command of the forces. The chiefe & principal of the Decemvirs were Q. Fabius, and Appius Claudius. And for that there seemed greater war at home then abroad, the Decemvirs suppoled the violent nature of Appius, fitter to repress all troubles and mutinies in the citie; and considering withall the disposition of Fabius, to be lesse constant and resolute in goodnesse, then active and quick in militarie service. (for this man having been in times past of great worth, both at home, and also in war; the Decemvirship, and the conditions of his colleagues together, had so greatly changed, that he chose rather to be like Appius then himself) to him therefore was imposed the charge of the war against the Sabines, together with M. Rabuleius, and Q. Petilius joined in commission with him. M. Cornelius was sent into Algidum, with L. Minutius, T. Antonius, Caso Duilius, and M. Sergius, and they ordained and appointed Sp. Oppius as assistant to Appius Claudius, for the defence and government of the city, and to have the full authoritie of all the ten Decemvirs. But the Common-weal sped no better abroad in warfare, than it fared at home. The onely fault in the Generals was this, That they had made themselves odious to their souldiers and citizens: all the blame els lay in the souldiers themselves; Who to the end that nothing might go well forward and prosper under the leading and conduct of the Decemvirs, suffered themselves to their own shame, and dishonour of their captains, to be defeated: for the armies were both by the Sabines at Eretum, and also by the Aequians in Algidum discomfited. They that fled from Eretum in the dead of the night, had encamped and fortified upon an high ground nearer unto the city of Rome, between Fidens and Crustumena. And when the enemy pursued them still and provoked them to fight, they would never come forth into the plain and even ground, to encounter with them in a pight battell, but stood upon their guard and defended themselves, trusting in the situation of the place and their rampier, and nothing upon their own manhood and force of arms. But in Algidum they committed a more foul and beastly fault, and received withall a greater losse and overthrow; inso much as having lost their camp with all their tents, the souldiers being turned out of bag and baggage, their harness and implements of necessary use, retired for refuge to Tusculum, hoping there to be entertained as guests, and to live upon the protection, mercy and devotion of their hosts and friends: who failed and deceived not their expectation. But to Rome there came such fearfull news, that the Senatours and Nobles laying apart now all hatred against the Decemvirs, thought good to keep watch and ward in the citie: and commanded as many as were able to bear arms, to keep the wals and guard the gates: they gave order also to send harness and armour to supply their want at Tusculum: moreover, That the Decemvirs should abandon the castle at Tusculum, and with their souldiers take the field and keep the camp: That they likewise should dislodge and remove from Fidens, that lay fortified there and remove into the countrie of the Sabines: so that by making wars upon the enemies first, they might scare and divert them from pursuing their intent of giving assault unto the citie of Rome. Besides these damages and foils sustained at the enemies hands, the Decemvirs committed both in war abroad, and also in the citie at home, two most wicked and horrible facts. For whereas one L. Sicius, during their abode in the Sabines countrie (upon an odious conceit and malice against the Decemvirs) had gone up and down, and in secret talke whispered in the ears of the Common souldiers, some mention of creating Tribuns, and of another insurrection and departure: him the Decemvirs dispatch before, to spie out a convenient plot of ground to encamp in. Now they had given those souldiers in charge, whom they sent to accompanie him in that expedition to set him upon him in some fit place of advantage and to kill him. And kill him they did, but to their own cost: for whiles he fought in his own defence, some of those that laid for his mischief, died for it, and lay along about him for companie: for being a right stout and strong man of his hands, he stood to it couragiously: and notwithstanding he was beset round about, he defended himself very manfully. The rest that escaped bring word into the camp, that Sicius was fallen unawares into an ambushment, and whiles he fought lustily, was with certain other of the souldiers slain. At the first, credit was given to him that brought the news. But afterwards, when as there was a band of souldiers thither sent by the permission of the Decemvirs, to bury them that there lay dead: they observing none of their bodies there, to be disarmed and despoiled, and Sicius lying in the midst of his armour, and all the rest of the dead with their faces towards him: no corps of enemy, nor footing of them departing from thence, brought away with them his dead carcasie, and made report that undoubtedly and passe all peradventure, he was murdered by his own companie. Hereupon was the whole camp filled with hatred and detestation of this fact, and generally it was agreed, that Sicius forthwith should be conveyed to Rome, had not the Decemvirs made hast to solemnize his funerals souldierlike, at the publike charges of the common treasure. So interred was he with exceeding sorrow and mourning

L. Sicius murdered by the treachery of the Decemvirs.

A of the souldiers, but to the most shameful obloquy and infamy of the Decemvirs, amongst the common sort.

Now followeth the other heinous deed committed within the City: which began of wanton lust, and had as foul and shameful an end, as that which upon the carnal abusing and bloody death of Lucretia, cast the Tarquins out of the City, and deprived them of their regal dignity: that both KK, and Decemvirs, might have not only the like success and issue, but also one and the self same cause, of losing their rule and dominion. Appius Claudius enamoured upon a virgin, a commoners daughter, lust to the abuse and spoil of her body. The father of the maiden L. Virginius, was of good calling and in place of credit in the camp that lay in Algidum, and had the leading there of a company: a man of honest example and conversation of life, both at home and also abroad in warfare. His wife likewise of virtuous disposition: so were their children nurtured and taught accordingly. He had espoused and affianced his daughter in marriage to one L. Icilius, a man of stout courage (as having been Tribune) and whose ferre and valor had been well tried and approved in the quarrel and defense of the Commonwealth. This damsel in the prime of her years, passing fair and beautiful withal, Appius (I say) cast a fancy and liking unto, and so burned in love of her, that he assayed with gifts and fair promises to win her good wil. But seeing all guarded and surely fenced with maidenly chastity and honesty, he bent his mind wholly to cruel and proud violence. He suborneth and setteth on a favorite and follower of his, one M. Clodius, to make challenge and lay claim unto her as his bond-maid: and not to give place nor yeeld her

C unto them, that required to have her at liberty out of his hands, during the suit, and until she brought proof of her freedom: supposing, because the father of the virgin was absent, he had good opportunity to work this feat, and compass his intended injury. As the maiden therefore was coming into the market place (for there were the schools for peties kept, of reading and writing) the Decemvirs man (a broker to serve his masters lust) laid hold upon her, avowing that she was his bond-servants daughter, and therefore his bond-maid: commanding her to follow him, and threatening besides, that if she made any stays, he would have her away perforce. The fearful girl hereat was amazed, and her nurse withal cried to the Quirits for help: whereupon the people came running and flocked together all about them. Now was the name of Virginius her father, and likewise of Icilius her spouse, very gracious and popular: To that the love and favour

D wherein they stood, raised friends and acquaintance: and the indignity of the thing besides, moved the whole multitude to tender the cause of the damsel. When as there fore she was now past danger of violence, the party that made claim unto her, said there was no need that the people thus should gather together, for his meaning was to proceed only by order of law, and not with any violent course. And so he cited her to the court, minding to commence his action against her, and put her in sue. Then they that were present to assist her, persuaded her to follow.

E Now when they were come before Appius, sitting judicially upon his tribunal seat, the Plaintiff, or challenger aforesaid, declareth against her, and telleth a tale full wel known to the Judge himself, being the author and deviser of the whole matter and argument: Namely, that the maiden was born in his house, and by stealth was from thence conveyed home to Virginius, and so was his supposed and reputed daughter: this he averred to have certain knowledge of, by pregnant evidences and witnesses: and would make proof thereof to be most true, and let Virginius himself be the judg, whom the greater part of this wrong deeply touched: in the mean while, it was but meet and reason, that the bond-maid should go with her Master. The friends and advocates of the damsel, having alledged and pleaded in her behalf, that Virginius was absent and employed in the affairs of Common-weal: and if he had word thereof, would not fail but be at home within two days: that it was no reason, that whiles a father was away, he should be in contention and controversie about his children: they required of Appius therefore to defer and put off the hearing of the whole matter, until her fathers coming, and that according to a law by himself in that case made and provided, he would grant her to be at large and stand at liberty, for to bring in proofs

F that she was not bond: and that he would not suffer a maid of those years, ripe and ready for a husband, to be more in hazard and danger of her good name, then prejudiced in the trial of her freedom. Appius made a long preface and discourse before his decree, namely, how much he favoured and tendered the cause of liberty, and to that effect, alledged the self same law which the friends of Virginius pretended for their purpose and demand. But so far forth, and no otherwise, should there be in that law assured safeguard of freedom, as the case altered not in circumstance of causes and persons. For, this priviledge and benefit held only in those that were claimed to be free, where any man whosoever might go to law and plead. As for her, who was in her fathers hand & at his disposition there was no other man else, unto whom the Master that maketh challenge, is to yeeld the right of his possession. His pleasure therefore was, and thus he decreed, That the father should be sent for: and that in the mean season, he that made title to her, should not be prejudiced thereby, but that he might lead away the wench, promising and assuming to have her forth-coming, and to present her in Court, at the return of him who is pretended and nominated to be her father. Against this injurious decree, when as many men rather muttered and murmured, then any one durst refuse and contradict it, P. Numitorius, the maids Uncle by the mothers side, and Icilius her espoused husband, hapned to come in place: and having way made them through the throng and press, the multitude thought verily, that by the coming, especially of Icilius, Appius might have been resisted and crossed. But then the Lictor pronounced that

Appius, had passed an order and decree already, and put Scilium back; who cried out aloud, (for so he manifest and horrible a wrong had been enough to have moved a very Saint, and set on fire a right mild natured person.) "Nay, Appius (quoth he) thou hadst more need to set me back with force of arms, if thou wouldst go clear away, and not be spoken to, for that which thou wouldst do in hucker mucker. This maid, I tell thee, I mean shall go with me: I purpose to have her to my selfe, an honest and pure virgin, and enjoy her in lawfull marriage, as my wedded wife: call therefore unto thee all the Lictors besides (thou were best) that belong unto thy companions: cause both rods and axes to be made ready: I tell thee, Scilium his espoused wife, shall not abide in any place without her fathers house. What? although ye have taken from the Commons of Rome the Tribuns assistance and protection, and the privilege of Appeal, two principal bulwarks for defence of their liberty: ye are not therefore allowed to rule and tyrannize, and to fulfil your lust upon our children and wives too. Exercise your rigour and cruelty, and spare not, upon our backs and sides in scourging us, yea, upon our necks and heads also, in taking them from our shoulders: so ye forbear to assaile our chastity and honesty. Whereunto, if any violence shall be offered, I will for my part, call for the help of the Quirites here present, in the behalf of my spouse: and Virginus for himself will call to the souldiers, in regard of his only daughter: we will cry for help of God and man: and cost it shall our lives before thou go away with this decree, and put it in execution, I require and charge thee, O Appius therefore, to be wel advised, and look how far thou dost proceed. Let Virginus when he is come, see to his daughter, how he dealeth about her: and let him know thus much for certain, that if he give place to this plaintiffs assertion, and forgo the present possession of her, he shall go seek his estate and propriety that he hath in his daughter. As for me, in this quarrel of maintaining the freedom of my spouse, I will lose my life, before I fail in my faithfull promise to her made. Hereat the whole multitude was moved, and like it was, that some mutiny and fray would presently have ensued. For the Lictors had hemmed in Scilium on every side. Howbeit they proceeded no farther then to big words and high threats: whiles Appius laid hard to Scilium, "That he did not this so much in the behalf and defence of Virginus, as, (being himself an unruly person, and even already breathing forth a Tribuns spirit) sought means, and picked occasion of an uproar and sedition. Howbeit for his part, he would not that day minister unto him any matter thereof. And that he might now wel know, that he did not this to feed his malapert sauciness, but in regard of the absence of Virginus, and for the name of a father, and the tender respect of freedom, he would not that day sit to hear and determine the matter, nor award a definitive judgment in that case: but would request Mar. Claudius, to suspend his action, and to forbear and yeeld so much of his own right, as to suffer the maid to be bailed and go under sureties, and to be at her liberty until the next day. But in case her father appeared not in Court the morrow after, he gave Scilium, and such as he was, to wit and understand, that neither the law should want the patronage of the maker, nor the Decemvir fail in courage and resolution: neither would he call together his fellow officers and sergeants, for to keep under such seditious and turbulent spirits as he was: but would content himself with his own Lictors, and do wel enough. The time now of effecting this injury, being thus deferred, and the maids Advocates gone aside, they agreed first of all upon this point, that a brother of Scilium, and a son of Numitorius, two lusty and nimble young men, should be dispatched straight from thence to the gate: and that with all speed possible Virginus should be sent for home from the camp: for that it stood the maid upon as much as her whole estate and life was worth: that he would be present and ready in due time the day following, to preserve her from this hard course, and wrongful proceeding. According as they were bidden, they set forward, and spared no horseflesh, until they brought tidings hereof to her father. All this while the plaintiff that made challenge to the maid, was very instant with Scilium to bail her, and put in sureties. And he again made answer, That he went about it as fast as he could, and did nothing else: but indeed trifling out the time on purpose, until the messengers that were sent to the camp, were got afore wel onward on their way. Then the whole multitude on all sides held up their hands, in token that they offered themselves every one unto Scilium, ready to become bound. Whereupon, he burst out into tears for tender heart. Gramercy (quoth he) my masters all, to morrow I will use your helping hand: for this time I am sped of sureties enough. So was Virginus set at liberty, and bailed by the suretiship of her kinsfolk. Then Appius, after he had stayed a while, because he would not seem to have sat for that matter alone, when he saw all other suits and causes omitted, in regard they had to it, and no man coming to him for justice, he arose, gat him home to his house, and wrote unto his brethren Decemvirs into the camp, that they should not give Virginus his passport, but keep him fast in durance, and in ward. This wicked practise (as God would have it) came short. For Virginus already had got his discharge, and was departed forward on his journey, in the evening by the setting of the first watch. And very early in the morning came the letters for to stay him, but all in vain. For Virginus by break of day was arrived: by which time the whole City resorted into the common place, standing and waiting earnestly for his coming. And thither he himself being in soiled and simple array, brought his daughter in her old worn cloaths, accompanied with certain Wives, and a great number of Advocates and friends: Then and there began he to go from one man to another, and to labour them hard: and not only besought their assistance by way of intreaty and prayer, but also required it as due and deserved: saying, that he stood dayly in field ready to fight in defence of their wives

A wives and children : neither could there be reported of any man more hardy exploits and valiant pieces of service in war, then of him self. But what booteth or availeth all this (quoth he) to save the City from enemies, in case our children be forced to abide the utmost extremities that befall unto Cities taken by the enemies ? thus went he about preaching, as it were, from one man to another. Likewise Scilins cast forth and redoubled like speeches freely and spared not. But the train of women, with their still and silent weeping, moved men more then any words uttered. All this notwithstanding, Appius in his obstinate mind (so disquieted was he and wholly possessed with a forcible spirit of humorous madness rather then of amorous passion) ascended up into the tribunal. Where, as the plaintiff first of himself was framing some short complaint, that by reason of partial favour and making of great friends, he could not have law and justice the day past : before that either he had made an end of his demand, or given leasure to Virginus for to put in his answer accordingly : Appius interrupted the speech, and began himself. What preamble it was that he made before his decree, peradventure some ancient writers have for truth recorded. But for as much as I cannot any where find in so shameful a decree, that which carrieth but a shew and soundeth like a truth : therefore, that only which is of all agreed upon, I thought best to set down, even the sentence barely without any preface at all : namely, That he judged her in the behalfe of the Plaintiff to be his bond-servant. First, all men there, wondered at this unworthy and foul act : and being stricken therewith astonished, for a good while after, stood still and held their peace. But afterwards, when as M. Claudius, went to lay hand on the maid, amongst the dames that stood about her, and was received with a piteous lamentation, and cry of the women : Then Virginus beckning with his hands and shaking them at Appius : “ To Scilins (quoth he) have I betrothed my daughter, and not to thee O Appius : brought her up I have for honest and chaste wedlock, and not for unclean and filthy whordom : to be a wife another day, and not an harlot. Is this the manner of it, like bruit and wild beasts without all regard, to leap and run upon you care not whom, and to fulfil your fleshly lust ? How these that be here will suffer such pranks, I know not : but they that are in camp with sword in hand, I hope, will never put them up. Now when as he that challenged the maid was by a knot of Women and Advocates that stood about her repelled back, then proclaimed the Bedle and commanded silence. And the Decemvir having his head intoxicate, and altogether carried away with unbridled lust, brake forth and said : That he had certain intelligence and was informed of a truth, by manifest and assured evidences. (and not induced and led thereto by the reviling taunts of Scilins yesterday, and the violent proceedings of Virginus, whereof he had the people of Rome to bear witness, and which might give some light and presumptions) That the night past, there were meetings and conventicles in the City, and all to raise a mutiny and insurrection : and therefore he not ignorant of such a broil and riot toward, was come down into the common place with a guard of armed men : not minding to hurt any one that would keep the peace, but only by vertue of the majesty of government and authority, to repress such as troubled the peaceable state of the City : therefore it were best for them to be still and quiet. Go Sergeant (quoth he) cause the people to avoid the place, and make room for the matter to lay hand upon his bond-slave : and after he had thundered out these words full of ire and wrath, the multitude of themselves gave back and made way : so the poor silly wench stood all forlorn and left as a prey to their injurious clutches. Then Virginus seeing all past help and no other remedy : Well Appius (quoth he) pardon me first I beseech thee if upon a fatherly affection and grief of heart I have let fall some shrewd and curst words against thee more then was becoming : Then give me leave here before the virgin, to enquire of her nurse the truth of this matter, that if I have fathered her untruly, I may go hence better apayed and satisfied in my mind. Leave being granted, he led his daughter and the nurse apart from the rest, near to the Church of Venus Cloacina, hard at the shops, called at this day Nova Tabernaculæ, i.e. the new shops or standings : and there having caught a knife from a butcher, he thus spake : My sweet daughter, no other means have I but this only to set thee free : and so he struck the damsel to the heart : and looking presently to the judgement seat, Here with this blood I sacrifice thee Appius, and thy head to the Devil. Appius with the crie that arose upon so horrible a fact, being much troubled, commanded Virginus to be apprehended : but he with bloody blade in hand, made way where he went, until with a number that followed him apace to bear him company, he recovered the gate. Scilins and Numitorius took up the bloodles corps and held it aloft to the people : blaming and cursing the wickedness of Appius : pitying the unhappy and unfortunate beauty of the damsel : and bewailing the hard exigent and extremity of the father. The Matrons followed after and cried : Is this the condition and fortune allotted unto parents for getting and bearing children ? Is this the hire and reward of chastity and virginity : with other like speeches, which in such a case, women in their grief of mind use to utter : whose sorrow as it is more heavy, proceeding from weak and tender hearts, so it yeeldeth and affordeth more pitiful and lamentable words, as they make their plaints and dolorous moans. But the men and Scilins above the rest, had no other talk but of the Tribunes authority, and the appeal unto the body of the people, how they were taken away from them, and of other public indignities and common discontents. The whole multitude partly upon the hainousness of this wicked act, and partly for hope by this occasion to recover again their liberties, were all up at once in an uproar. Appius one while commanded Scilins to be called, another while for his disobedience and contumacy to be attached and convented before him. At the length, seeing no way made unto the Apparitors, for

to come by him, passed himself with a crew of tall gentlemen of the Nobility that were of his H guard through the throng & commanded to have him away to prison. By which time there were gotten about Scilins not only the multitude, but the chief Captains and ringleaders of the multitude, L. Valerius and M. Horatius: who having thrust the sergeant back, said withal, that if Appius had any thing to charge him with by order of law, they would bail Scilins, and maintain his cause against him, who was but a private person: but if he went about to offer violence, he should soon meet with his matches. Hereupon grew a fierce brawl and broil: The Decemvirs officer set-teth upon Valerius and Horatius to lay hold upon them: but his rods were by the multitude broken to pieces. Then Appius gets him up into the common place of audience, for to speak unto the people. Horatius and Valerius follow after him up, to do the like. Then the assembly heard with I patience, but they hissed at Appius and cried out against him. Then Valerius took upon him, and commanded the Listors to give attendance no longer upon a private person. Whereupon, Appius his heart was done and his courage quailed: and so standing in fear of his life, he was fain to cover his face, and to withdraw himself in disguised manner, and took an house over his head, neer unto the common place (unknown to his adversaries) there to save himself. Sp. Oppius, for to rescue and succour his Colleague, rushed from an other side into the place: and there he might see force and might to have got the upper hand of authority. After many devices and consultations, wherewith he was distracted, and framing himself to yeeld consent on every side, at length by the advice and perswasions of many there about him, in great fear he commanded the Senat to be called together. This appeased the multitude, for that they were in hope that (by means of the Senators, K who many of them, seemed to mislike the acts and proceedings of the Decemvirs) that government of theirs should come to an end. The Senat devised and took order, not to provoke the Commons too far: and withal to have a more provident and special eye, that the coming of Virginus into the camp, bred no mutiny in the army. Whereupon were sent certain of the puny Senators unto the host, that lay encamped upon the hill Vecilius, who advertised the Decemvirs from the Senat, to endeavor all they could to keep the souldiers in good order, from commotion and sedition. But there Virginus raised a greater uproar and tumult then he had left behind him in the City. For besides that, he was seen coming with a crew and train almost of four hundred men, who incensed with the indignity of the late accident, accompanied him voluntary from the City, his naked drawn knife, and himself besprinkled and embrued with blood, caused the whole L camp to turn their eyes upon him. Moreover, their gowns seen in sundry places within the camp, made a greater shew of citizens in number then was indeed. Being demanded of them what news, and what the matter was, he wept, and for a good while held his peace. At the last, when as now the multitude, that for fear ran confusedly together, began to stand still and keep silence: he declared orderly from the beginning to the end, every thing in particular, as it was done. Then lifting up his hands to heaven, and calling to all his companions and fellow souldiers, he besought them not to impute that foul act unto him, whereof in truth Appius Claudius was the author and cause: nor to detest and abhor him as a parricide and murderer of his own children: saying, that his daughters life was more dear unto him then his own, if she might have lived free and honestly. But when he saw her once haled by force, as a bord-maid to be ravished and made a strumpet, M he thought it better to be bereft of his children by death, then by contumely and reproach: and so upon meer pitifulness incurred the shew and appearance of cruelty. And but that he reposed some hope in the aid of his fellow souldiers, trusting that they would be revenged for his daughters death, he would not have remained a livesman after her. I know well (saith he) that you also have daughters, sisters and wives of your own: And it is not the death of my child that hath killed and mortified the lust of Appius, but rather the longer it escapeth unpunished, the more outrageous and unbridled would it be. So that by the calamity of another man, ye are well taught and warned to beware of the like injury. As for me, I have buried my wife before, who died on Gods hand: and now my daughter, for that she might not finish the course of her days, with the safety of her maiden head and chastity, hath died, I confess, a pitiful and lamentable, but yet an N honest kind of death. As to Appius, (quoth he) now can he not fulfil his lust in this my house: and for any other violence of his whatsoever, I carry the same mind and heart still, to defend mine own body, wherewith I have already saved my daughters. Now let other men look to themselves and their children, as well as they can. As Virginus uttered these speeches aloud, the whole multitude with one accord cried and protested, they would not fail, but both revenge his grief, and maintain their own freedom. The Citizens also in their side gowns, intermingled among the souldiers, made the self same complaints: shewing how much more horrible those things were in the eye to be seen in fact, then they could sound unto the ear by bare relation: and withal reported, how at Rome the matter was well neer dispatched already, for that there were certain come after them, even hard at their heels from thence, who brought word that Appius had like O to have been murdered, and was departed into exile: and so far prevailed they with them, that they gave the alarme, plucked up their standards, and took their way to Rome. The Decemvirs being sore troubled, both at these present occurrents which they evidently saw, and also to hear these news, in what bad tearms all things stood at Rome, ran up and down, here one, and there another, into sundry parts of the camp, for to appease the tumult. When they went to work mildly and gently, they had not a word of them again: but if any one laid his commandment upon them, and extended his authority, they would beard them and answer, That they were men, and more

A more then that men in arms and souldiers. Thus march they in order of bartel toward the City, and take the mount Aventine, and there settle themselves. And as they encountred any, all their song was this, to exhort and encourage the Commons to recover their franchises, and to create Tribuns of the Commonalty. Not a word was heard else, tending to any violence. Oppius assembled the Senat together: where it was agreed, not to proceed by way of rigour in any case: for as much as they themselves had given the occasion of sedition. But three ancient personages, such as had been Consuls, were sent Commissioners in Embassage, as it were, Sp. Tarpeius, C. Iulius, and Publius Sulpicius with commission, to demand of them in the name of the Senat, by whose commandment they had abandoned the camp, or what their intent was thus in war-like manner to keep the Aventine: and why leaving to war with their enemies, they had thus invaded their native Country. They were not to seek of an answer, only there wanted a man to give the answer: for as yet they were grown to no certain head, upon whom they might rely: and singly by themselves they durst not incur the hatred and dangerous displeasure that might ensue. This only the multitude with one voice cried aloud, to send L. Valerius, and Marcus Horatius unto them, for to those they would make a resolute answer. The Commissioners being dismissed, Virginius putteth the souldiers in mind, and advertiseth them, how erewhile in a matter not of the greatest importance, they were in fear and perplexity, because the multitude was without an head: and how an answer was returned, although not altogether unprofitable and besides the purpose, yet agreed upon at a venture, and not proceeding from any publick counsel. But now his opinion was, that there should be ten chosen to bear sovereign rule: who for the honour of warfare and souldiery, should be called military Tribuns. And when this dignity was to him offered first, Nay (quoth he) reserve still these your good perswasions and judgments of me, unto more happy days and favourable times both to me and you. For neither doth the remembrance of my daughter suffer me to take joy of any honour in this life, nor (as the state standeth now troubled) is it good for you to have them to be your Magistrates, who of all other are most exposed to ill will, and displeasure, and in nearest danger to be hardly thought of. If I may serve you in any stead, you may make bold, and have no less use of me, remaining still a private person. So they create Tribuns military, ten in number. But all this while was the army as unquiet in the Sabins country. For even there also, by the instigation of Isidus and Numitorius, the souldiers fell away from the Decemvirs and departed. For their minds were no less troubled and disquieted with the remembrance renewed, of the late murder of Siccus, that kindled and set on fire by the fresh news of the death of Virginius, so villanously, so shamelessly laid unto and challenged, and all to satisfy the lust of another. Isidus, so soon as he heard say, that there were ten military Tribuns created in Aventine, fearing lest the Election in the City should follow the prerogative of the military Election in the camp, as a precedent to create the self same men Tribuns of the Commons, being a man well seen and experienced in these popular affairs, and reaching himself at the same dignity and promotion, wrought so with his adherents and friends, that before they went to the City, they should likewise elect the self same number with equal authority. Who entered the City with banners displayed, at the gate Collina, and marched through the midst thereof in warlike order, up to the Aventine. And there joining and uniting themselves unto the other army, they gave in charge to the twenty military Tribuns, to create out of their number twain for sovereign governors to rule all. So they elected Marcus Oppius, and Sextus Manilius.

The Senators being in great care for the Common-weal, sat in Council every day: where they spent time oftner in wrangling and jarring, then in sage advice and polittick counsel. The murdering of Siccus, the wanton lust and loose life of Appius, the shameful disgraces received in the wars, were laid in the Decemvirs dish. At length they concluded, that Valerius and Horatius should go to the Aventine. But they refused and would not go, but upon condition that the Decemvirs would give up the Ensigns and Ornaments of that Magistracy and government, which by right they should have forgon and departed from, a full year before. The Decemvirs were grieved and complained, thus to be set down & made no better then private men, and said flatly they would not be deposed from their place of rule, before those laws were fully enacted and confirmed, for which at first time they were created. The Commons having intelligence by Duilius (who had been a Tribun of the Commons), that by reason of continual debate and contention in the Senat house, there was nothing done and agreed upon, removed from the Aventine unto mount Sacer. For Duilius ceased not to suggest, and plainly affirm unto them, that the Senators and Ancients of the City would never sadly think upon any care and provision to be made, until they saw the City abandoned and desolate: moreover, That the mount Sacer would put them in mind of the constant resolution of the Commons: and that they should well know, that matters would never be settled and brought to concord, without they restored unto them their power and authority again. So they take their way by Nomentana Via, which at that time was named Ficulensis, and encamped themselves in the mountain Sacer: doing no harm to any creature as they passed along: following therein the modesty of their forefathers. The whole Commonalty followed after the host: there was not one who for age was able to travel on foot, that drew back and carried behind. Their children and wives bare them company, in piteous wise moaning themselves, and asking them: whereto they would leave them behind in that City, where neither their honest chastity might be guarded, nor yet their liberty secured and kept safe. When as now, by reason of his uncouth and strange desolation, all seemed at Rome waste and void, and none to be seene in the publick place, besides a few of aged men: and when the Senators were called into the Senate house, the common place appeared empty, naked and forlorn: then there were more besides Horatius and Valerius that cried out and said, What look you for still my LL of the Councel? What? and if the Decemvirs will make no end of their peevisish frowardness, will ye let things run at six and seven, until all come tumbling down, or be of a light fire? And what goodly dominion is this; that you embrace so in your arms, that you clip and hold so fast? Will ye minister justice and give laws to empty houses and bare walls? Are ye not abashed and ashamed, that there should be seene in the Place, a greater number well neer of your Lieftors and officers, then of gowned Citizens, and of all other men whatsoever? How and if the enemies should come against the City, what would ye do? Nay, what if shortly the Commons should march in arms, seeing we weigh their insurrection and departure so lightly? Will ye, together with the ruin and downfal of the City, end your rule, and not afore? Well, to be plain, ye must either have no Commons at all, or else allow them to have their Tribuns again: there is no mean, there is no other remedy. Sooner shall we want our Magistrates of the Nobility, then they will be without their Patrons and Officers of the Commonalty. They wrung and wrested from our forefathers that power and authority fire new, and whereof they had as then, no proof and experience: how think ye then, that having tasted now the sweetness of it, they will endure the want thereof? especially seeing, that we our own selves are not of so temperate carriage in our government and command over them, but that they have need of some succour and relief. And when these and such like reasons were on all hands often alledged and laid abroad, the Decemvirs overweighed with the general consent and unity of the house, promised: That seeing it was so thought good, they would be wholly ordered and ruled by the Senators. This only they besought at their hands, and admonished them of, by way of a proviso, that they would take order for the safety and security of their persons: and not by shedding their blood, to flesh the Commons, and to train them up, and acquaint them with exercising cruelty upon the nobles and Senators. Then were Valerius and Horatius sent with commission to reclaim and call home the Commons, upon such conditions and capitulations, as they should think convenient: yea, and to set all things in good order and make a final composition, with a special charge to provide for the safeguard of the Decemvirs, against the raging ire and violence of the multitude. These mediators took their journey, and were received into the camp with exceeding joy of the Commons, as being doubtless, their very saviours and redeemers, approved both in the beginning of their troubles, and now also at the very end and upshot of all. In regard whereof, they were welcomed with thanksgiving. Leilius was the mouth of the multitude, and their prolocutor. Who when they came to debate and reason about the articles of covenants, and that these Delegates and Committees, required of the Commons, What the demands and points were that they stood upon? Being already provided aforehand of purpose what to say, demanded such conditions, as it was well seen, that they reposed more hope, and relied themselves rather in equity, and indifference, than in force of arms. For they require, Imprimis, to have the Tribuns power on foot again, and the appealing unto the people revived: which before the creation of the Decemvirs had been the only help and succour of the Commons. Item, that no man should be called in question, nor any way touched in life, limb, or goods for gathering the souldiers or Commons together by way of commotion, for recovering again their liberties and franchises. Only, their demand concerning the punishment to be inflicted upon the Decemvirs, favoured of cruelty. For they deemed it meet and reason, that they should be yeilded into their hands, and then they threatened to burn them quick with fire. To these Articles the Committees spake in this wise. "As for those capitulations, which upon counsel and deliberate advice ye have articulated, they are so reasonable and indifferent, that without your suit, they ought to have been offered unto you frankly and freely: for ye request to enjoy such things as concern the defence of your liberty and freedom, and maintain not your licentiousness, to the offence and hurt of others. But as to your ire and wrath, it is to be pardoned, rather then to be followed and yeilded unto: as who, under colour of hatred and detestation of cruelty, run headlong into cruelty: and before, in a manner, that ye be set free your selves, ye will be Rulers and Lords over your Adversaries. Alas the while, and will our City never be at rest, and cease from punishing: but that either the Nobles will scourge the Commons of Rome, or the Commons whip the Nobles? As for you, ye had more need of a shield I wis, then a sword. Humbled he is enough, and too much humbled, who liveth in a City on even hand, and equal with others, under the same laws, nether doing nor taking wrong. And if ever at any time you mean to shew your selves dread and to be feared, when you have once recovered your Magistrates and Ordinances again, when ye have the law in your own hands, to censure and judge according to your own discretion, then may ye give your doom of our lives and goods, as each cause requireth. Now for this time it sufficeth, that ye claim and have your freedom again. Hereupon they all submitted themselves to the depured Delegates, permitting them to do what they would. Who seeing they had brought all matters to so good a conclusion, promised to return with all speed. So they took their leave. And when they had declared to the Senators the demands of the Commons, all the rest of the Decemvirs, perceiving no mention at all made of their punishment (a thing more then they looked or hoped for) denied no one point thereof. But Appius, a man of a fell and cruel nature, and who above all the other was most odious, and lay open to the malice of the people, and measuring the hatred of others toward himself,

Valerius and Horatius to the Commons.

A self, by his own spleen that he bare against other men: "I wot well (quoth he) what ill fortune will betide me shortly: and I see plainly, that our adversaries hold off to wrangle and contend with us no longer then until they have weapons given in their hands. To satisfie this their malice and hatred, we must part with our blood: nothing else will content them. For mine own part to renounce my Decemvirship I weight not: neither pass I how soon I do it. Then was an Act made by the Senat, that the Decemvirs out of hand should surrender their place: and that Q. Furius the Arch-Bishop or High Priest, should create Tribuns of the Commons: provided always expressly, that the mutiny of the souldiers, and insurrection of the Commons, should turn no man to displeasure and harm. These Acts being passed, and the Councel risen, the Decemvirs came abroad into the open place of assemblies, and there to the exceeding joy of all men, they resigned up all their power and authority. Tidings hereof were carried to the commons by the mediators aforesaid: and look what people soever remained behind in the City, went now forth to accompany them. As this multitude passed along forward, they were encountred upon the way, with another joyful company from out of the camp. Who rejoiced mutually one in the behalf of the other, that both freedom and concord were restored to the City again. Then the mediators in the general assembly of them all spake and said: "To the great good, happiness and felicity of you and of the C. W. be it spoken, Return in Gods name into your own country, to your houses, wives and children: but see, that as ye have demeaned your selves modestly in your way hither, hurting and spoiling no mans lands and possessions, notwithstanding the need ye were driven unto of so many things: so ye carry the same moderation and stay of your selves homeward into the City. Go into the Aventine from whence ye came: and there for good luck sake, where ye laid the first foundation & ground-work of your liberty, create ye shal your Tribuns of the commons. There, will the high Priest be ready and give attendance, to call an assembly for the grand Election. Great was the accord, alacrity and cheerfulness, that they shewed in approving all that was propounded. So from thence they turn their standards and ensigns, and as they marched to to Rome, they strove with all they met on the way, who could shew most joy and gladness: they pass on through the City armed as they were, yet peaceably and without noise, until they came into the Aventine. Where the chief Priest immediately held the Comices, in which they created for Tr. of the C. first and formost L. Virginus, next after him, L. Icilius, and P. Numitorius. Uncle by the mothers side of Virginia: all authors of their insurrection and departure: then C. Sicinius descended from him in right line who was the first Trib. of Comm. created in mount Sacer, (as we find in records) and M. Duillius, who before the chusing of Decemvirs, had right worthily and notably born the Tribunship, and in all combats and commotions with the Decemvirs, stuck close to the Commonalty and never failed them. After these were elected, more for hope then any former desert, M. Titinius, M. Pomponius, C. Apronius, Ap. Julius, C. Oppius. Then C. Icilius immediately in the very entrance into the Tribunship, preferred a bill unto the Commons, and the Commons enacted it. That the departure and insurrection of the common people against the Decemvirs, should not be laid to any mans charge, nor bring him into trouble. Then without farther delay M. Duillius went through with an act of his own, to wit, That there should be Consuls created, with reservation of liberty to appeal unto the people. All these things passed in the Comices of Commons, assembled in the meddows named Flaminia, which now they call Circus Flaminius.

Decemvirs resign up their government.

Tribuns of the Commons created again. * A general assembly for election of Magistrates.

Then, by an Inter-regent were Consuls created, L. Valerius and M. Horatius, who presently began their government. Whose popular Consulship, as it was without wrong doing to the Senators and Nobles, so it was not without some offence committed of their part: For whatsoever was provided for the liberties of the Commons, they supposed it abridged somewhat of their power and authority. And first and formost, whereas it was a question and controversie not well cleared in law, Whether the Nobles were bound to stand to the Acts of the Commons: they made a law now in a general Session, by the suffrages of the Centuries, That what ordinance soever the Commons (being parted by Tribes) had by their voices granted, it should comprise and bind the whole body of the people. By which law, the Tribuns acts were armed with a most sharp and keen weapon to strike withal. Moreover, The other Consular law concerning Appeal, the only fort and strength of liberty, which by the Decemvirs absolute power had been overthrown, they not only revive again, but also fortifie the same for the time to come, by making a new law, forbidding expressly that no man should create any magistrate absolutely without the liberty of appealing: and whosoever should creat any such, he might rightfully and lawfully be killed, and that murder should not be counted a capital crime. And when they had sufficiently strengthened the Commons, on the one side with the benefit of appealing, and on the other side with the Tribuns power: in favour of the Tribuns themselves, that they also might seem sacrosanct and inviolable (a thing now almost grown out of remembrance) they renewed that high priviledg, with certain solemn ceremonies, which having been of long time laid aside & neglected, were now brought up again and put in ure. And they ordained them to be inviolate as wel in a reverent regard of religion and scruple of conscience, as also by a special law in that behalf provided: namely, that whosoever hurt either Tribuns of the Commons, Ediles, Judges, or Decemvirs, his head should be accursed and devoted to Jupiter, and his family sold in port-sale at the Church of Ceres Liber & Libera. By vertue of this Act, the great Expositors of the law, deny that any man is a sacrosanct or inviolable: but (say they) it is enacted only, That whosoever hurt any of them, shall be accursed.

Consuls elected again.

* Proferpina secundum A. nob. & Cic.

And therefore, an Edile may be attached and led away to prison by superior Magistrates, Which H although it be not warranted by law (for he is hurt, who by this law ought not to be hurt) yet it is a good argument to prove, that an Edile is not inviolable. Marry, as for the Tribuns, they were indeed by vertue of an ancient oath of the Commons, at what time as they first created that power and authority, inviolable: as they would seem to expound and make construction of the law. Others have been, that thus open and interpret the law, That in this self same Act of Horatius, the Consuls also, yea, and Pretors too, (because they are created by the same auspicia or bird-signs that the Consuls be) were comprised, and had the benefit thereof. For a Consul is called by the name of a Iudge, But that exposition is confuted, for that in those days it was not the manner to term the Consul a Iudge, but the Pretor only. And thus much concerning the Consular Laws. I

The same Consuls also brought up this order and custom, that all the Acts of the Senat should be brought into the Church of Ceres, and presented unto the Ediles of the Commons: which aforetime were suppressed and smothered, yea, and corrupted or perverted at the will and pleasure of the Consuls. After all this, M. Duilius a Tribune of the Commons, propounded unto the Commons a Law, and they let it pass and granted it, That whosoever should leave the Commonalty destitute of their Tribuns, or create any Magistrate absolute without Appeal, should be scourged, and lose his head for it. All these Acts, as they passed against the wills and minds of the Nobles: so they went clean without their contradiction: for that, all this while hitherto, there was no rigour and severity that seemed to extend and reach to any one particular person among them. But afterwards, when as both the Tribuns power, and also the Commons freedom, were once K well and surely grounded: Then the Tribuns, supposing now it was full time, that they might safely and without peril give the onset upon them, severally one by one, made choice of Virginus to be the first accuser or plaintiff, and Appius Claudius the first defendant. And Virginus had not so soon arrested Appius to answer at a day, and Appius come down into the Common place, guarded with a company of tall young gentlemen of the Nobility: but presently upon the sight of him and his guard about him, the remembrance of that most cruel and detestable tyranny was refreshed and renewed. Then Virginus: "Speeches (quoth he) and Orations were devised for doubtful "causes: and therefore will I neither spend time in accusing him before you, from whose cruelty "ye have by force of arms delivered your selves: nor suffer this wretch, over and besides his other "wicked pranks, to shew in the defence of himself his audacious impudence. Therefore, as tou- L "ching all other lewd parts of thine and wicked designments, O Appius, which thou hast for "these two years ungratiously and impiously enterprized and practised one on the neck of ano- "ther, I will do thee some favour, and pardon thee: but for one crime only, unless thou canst "acquitt thy selfe the better, namely, that thou being the Iudge, against all order of Law, didst "not grant unto the party defendant, the benefit of liberty to go at large, during the time of the "suit depending, until she might bring proofs of her freedom: for this, I say, I command thee "to prison. Now had Appius no hope at all, either in the Tribuns helping hand, or in the doom and judgement of the people. Howbeit he both called upon the Tribuns for succour: and also seeing himself tugged and haled away by the officer, and no man to stay his hand: I appeal (quoth he) unto the people. This one word in maintenance of freedom, being heard to come out of that M mouth, that lately had given sentence on his side, that impeached the freedom of one, and challenged the party for bond, caused silence. And when every man to himself secretly muttered in this wise: "I see well (when all is done) there are Gods in Heaven, and such Gods as neglect not "the affairs of mortal men. Pride and cruelty (although it be long first) at length will surely have "a fall, and thoroughly be punished. Lo, how he is now faine to appeal, who aforetime abolished "and took away all appeal: he humbly craveth relief of the people, who heretofore trod under "foot all rights and franchises of the people: and see how he is carried to prison, destitute and de- "prived of the benefit of liberty, who awarded and adjudged a free body to bandage and servi- "tude. Amidst these words, I say, that might be overheard in that confused humming of the assembly, Appius also was perceived to call unto the people of Rome for relief and mercy. He reckoned N "up withal, the deserts of his ancestors in the behalf of the C. W. both at home in the City, and "abroad in the wars: he alledged his own unhappy affection (when time was) to the Common- "nalty of Rome, and partaking with them: and namely how with the exceeding displeasure of the "Nobility, he resigned up his Consulship, and all for to bring in and establish equal and indifferent "laws to both parties. He rehearsed moreover his own laws, which notwithstanding they remained still in force and strength, he, the law-giver himself, was going to prison. But concerning his "own proper parts and deserts good or bad, he would then make trial thereof (he said) when he "should be permitted judicially to make his defence: as for the present time, he pleaded the common benefit of the City, to wit, that being a Citizen, he might at the appointed day, speak for "himself & stand to the doom of the people: neither feared he the hatred & malice of men so much "as to repose no hope at all in the equity and mercy of his neighbors and fellow Citizens. But and "if he were cast into prison and not suffered to come unto his answer, then he would once again "call upon the Tribuns of the Commons for their help, and admonish them, not to follow and "imitate them, whom they would seem to hate. And in case the Tribuns will be known and avow "that they are linked in the same bond and covenant, to abolish and take away the benefit of calling unto any one of them by way of mediation (against which they have charged & blamed the "Decemvirs for plotting & agreeing together) then he said, that he appealed unto the people, and

- A "and had recourse for succour unto the laws concerning appeal, made as well by Consuls as Tribunes, that present year and no longer ago. For who may ever hereafter (quoth he) have benefit of appeal, if it be not lawful for me, who stand yet not condemned, nor attainted, and have not pleaded for my self? what Commoner, what mean person may find relief by those laws, if Appius Claudius may not? It will be seen in me, and my example shall be a precedent and proof to others, Whether by these new statutes, lordly rule, or equal liberty be established: whether the calling for help by way of mediation & intercession, or by plain appealing against the wrongful proceedings of Magistrates, be granted in very deed, or but onely pretended in bare shew, under vain colourable pretences and foolish Letters Patents. Against all this, Virginus made his rejoinder and said, That Appius was the man alone exempt out of all benefit of laws, and excluded from all civil and humane society. "Let men but look back toward the tribunal seat, the very well-head, as it were, and receptacle, the fortress and hold of all wickedness: whereon that perpetual Decemvir practising his cruelty upon the goods, the bodies and lives of free citizens, menacing whipping and executing hangmans work unto all persons; a contemner both of God and man, guarded with a crew of executioners and butcherly tormentors, rather than Sergeants, proceeding on from spoil and bloodshed to set his hart on leachery & carnal lust, plucked a maid by birth free, from out of the very arms of her father, as if she had been taken captive in war; and that, in the sight of the people of Rome, and gave her away to one of his followers, even to a groom of his bed-chamber. Where, by a cruel decree of his, and detestable sentence, adjudging her bond, he caused the father to lay violent hands upon his own daughter; where he commanded, the espoused Husband and Uncle of the Virgin (that took up her body half dead) to be had away to the Gaol, as being more displeased with them, for disappointing and putting him beside his purpose of abusing and spoiling her, then for the murder upon her by them committed. Adding moreover and besides, That he had built a prison, which he used to tearm, The habitation and dwelling house of the Commons of Rome. And therefore, plead he ever and anon, and as oft as he wil, his appeal, I will not give over (quoth Virginus) but as oft tender a judg betwene, and be able to prove, that he gave not sentence, and pronounced her free, but bond: but in case he wil not abide to be censured by a competent judg, then I command him to be carried to prison, as attaint and convicted. Thus was he committed to ward: and as there was none misliked of this proceeding, so every man was greatly troubled in spirit, to see so great a personage punished, and the very Commons themselves thought their liberty too large & excessive. The Tribunes set him down a day (before hand) to plead for himself and make his answer. Amid these affairs, there came to Rome Embassadors from the Latins and Hernicks, to congratulate, and to shew their joy and great contentment, for the unity and concord between the Nobles and the Commons: in token whereof, they brought as a present unto Jup. Opt. Max. a crown of gold, not very massie in weight, but according to their ability, which was not much, yet answerable to their devotion: which men performed rather with religion and zeal in those days, than in portly shew and magnificence. By relation and intelligence from them they were certified also that the Æquians and Volsians prepared war with all the power they could make. Whereupon, the Consuls were commanded to part their provinces between them. To Horatius beset the Sabins, and to Valerius the Æquians and Volsians. And when they had proclaimed musters against these wars, such was the forward affection and favour of the Commons, that not onely the younger folk, but also a great sort of these that by law were dispensed with, and discharged from warfare, and lived of their pensions, offered their voluntary service, and were ready to enter their names into the muster-Masters book: whereby the army was not only in number greater, but also for the goodness of men, more puissant, as having the old, beaten, and experienced souldiers among them. But before they went out of the City, the Decemviral laws (which now are known by the name of the twelve Tables,) they set up openly to be seen, engraven in bras. Some writers have delivered, that the Ædiles performed this office, as they had it in charge from the Tribunes. C. Claudius, who upon a detestation and deep hatred of the Decemvirs lewd and wicked enormities, but especially above all others, of the insolent pride of his brothers son, which he could no longer abide, had removed and departed to Regillus, his old native country. He being now a very aged man, returned to sue and intreat for his deliverance out of danger, whose vices he abhorred: and in sullied weed and poor array, accompanied with those of his linage, and other his followers and vassals, went through the common place, and laboured every man one by one, "Beseeching them not to set that brand of ignominy, and bring such a stain upon the house and name of the Claudii, as that they should be thought worthy of imprisonment and irons: nor suffer a man of most honourable quality, a singular pattern of Nobility to his posterity in time to come, the Law-maker and founder of the Roman laws, to lie in chains among fellows, night-thieves and robbers by the high way side: but to turn away their minds a while from anger and wrath, and encline to a due regard and consideration of matters: and rather at the suit and earnest petitions of so many of the Claudii, to forgive them of men, than for the hatred of one man to reject the prayers of so many suppliants. As for himself, he protested that he did thus much for kindred and names sake. Neither was he reconciled unto him, and they made friends again: yet could he wish, that his adverse fortune and poor condition were relieved. Concluding with this in the end, that as their liberty was recovered again, by vertue & prowess, so the concord of all degrees & estates might be established sure by clemency.

Some there were whom he moved, more in regard of his own kindness and love, then in any respect of him for whom he spake. But Virginus prayed them; "To take pity and compassion rather, of him and his daughter, and to give ear to the prayers and supplications, not of the Claudius, who have had the day, and tyrannized over the Commons but to the neerest friends of Virginus, the three Tribunes, who being created for the aid and succour of the Commons, do now themselves implore and beseech the help and assistance of the Commons. And verily these tears were thought more reasonable, and like to speed. Thus when Appius saw all means of hope cut off, before the foresaid day appointed was come, killed his own self. Soon after this, Sp. Oppius, who of all the rest next unto Appius, was most hated: for that he was in the City at the very time when this unjust doom and sentence of his Colleague hapned to be pronounced, was attached by P. Numitorius. But Oppius was the worse thought of and more prejudiced, by occasion of an injury by himself done, then for not stopping the wrong intended by Appius to Virginus. For a witness was produced to depose against him, one, who having served in the wars seven and twenty years, had been rewarded and honoured extraordinarily eight times. This valiant servitor, thus adorned with those gifts and marks of valour, in the view and sight of the people of Rome rent his garments, and shewed his back and sides, and the skin all broken with scourging: beseeching no other favour, but if Oppius the party accused, could justly charge him with any trespass and offence by him committed, he should not spare him, but now a private person as he was, exercise and redouble his cruelty upon him once again. Well, Oppius likewise was had to prison: and there before the law day, ended his life. The goods of Appius and Oppius both, the Tribunes did confiscate. Their com-partners and fellow Decemvirs fled their country and were banished, and all their goods also were forfeit & confiscated. And not so much as M. Claudius, the party that laid claim unto Virginus escaped but he was arrested to answer at a certain day, and was condemned. However Virginus of himself released him his life, and would not take the extremity, so he was sent away and confined to Tybur, as it were into banishment. Thus the poor spirit and ghost of Virginus more happy after her death, then fortunate during her life, having wandered abroad, and haunted so many houses for due revenge of her adversaries: at last, when there was not one guilty person of them left unpunished, gave over her walking, and rested quiet.

Now were the nobles in exceeding fear, beholding the same countenance already in the Tribunes, which they had observed in the Decemvirs. But then M. Duilius, a Tribune of the Commons, wisely and politically restraining and keeping within a mean this excessive power of theirs: "We have enough (quoth he) both of our own liberty, and also of revenge of our enemies: and therefore I will not suffer for this year, any man more to be arrested or imprisoned. For I do not like that old faults done and past, and now as it were cancelled and raised out, should be revived again, and brought in question, since that by the punishment of the Decemvirs, satisfaction hath been made for the new: and the continual care and diligence of the Consuls both twain, for the maintenance of your freedom assureth me, that nothing will be committed hereafter, that may require and need the power of the Tribunes. This moderation at the first hand of the Tribune, put the Nobles out of their fear: but made the Consuls to be thought the worse of, (for that they had been so addicted wholly to the commonalty) in that a Magistrate of the Commons had more regard of the safety and liberty of the Nobles, than the proper Magistrate of the Nobility: and because the adverse part had their full of revenge and punishment of the Nobles, before it did appear that the Consuls would once seem to stop the course and stream of their licentiousness. And many there were who gave it out, that the Consuls bare themselves too remiss and slack in the matter, and little respected the good and credit of the Nobles; in that they had approved & confirmed the Acts that were proposed by the Tribunes. And no question, troubled as the state was then of the City, they were forced to give place, and do according to the necessity of the time. When the Consuls had set all things in good order within the City, and surely grounded the state of the Commonalty, they went either of them into their own Province, Valerius against the armies of the Aequians and Volscians, which now had joined together in Algidum: where full positively he held off, and stood upon his defence only: for if out of hand he had put it to the hazard of a battel, I cannot tell, but I greatly doubt (considering how the hearts of Romans and enemies both, were affected presently upon the unfortunat conduct of the Decemvirs) it would have turned to their great loss, and cost them an overthrow. He therefore having encamped a mile off from the enemies, kept his souldiers within the camp. The enemies ranged in battel array took up the whole ground between both camps, & when they made bravado's, and challenged them to come forth and fight, not one Roman would answer them again. At length the Volscians and Aequians, weary with long standing still, and in vain expecting battel, thinking verily, that the honor was in manner yeilded unto them, departed: some into the country of the Hernicks, other some to the territories of the Latins, for to raise booties and make spoil: leaving behind them rather a competent guard for defence of the camp, then a sufficient power to maintain a field fight. Which when the Consul perceived, he paid them again with the like measure of fear, as they before had from them received: and with his army ready embattelled, bids them battel: who being privy to themselves what forces were wanting, forbore to fight: whereupon the Romans presently took a better heart unto them, and made account that their enemies were overcome, being in such a fear within their rampart. When they had stood thus a whole day ready to fight, they retired back in the evening and gave place to the night. And the Romans full of good hope, refreshed their

A their bodies, and made much of themselves, but the enemies nothing so hearty and courageous, send out messengers every way in fearful haste, to call again the forragers. Such as were near at hand came running back into the camp: those that were farther off, could not be found nor met withal: Now when it was once day light, the Romans issue forth of the camp, intending to give an assault upon the Rampier, unless they would come forth and fight. But when it was far forth day and the enemies stirred not at all, the Consul commanded to advance with their ensigns. The Æquians and Volscians seeing their battell coming forward, began to chafe and take foul disdain, for very shame that their rampier and trench should protect victorious armies within the camp, rather than their weapons and valour defend them in plain and open field: and were earnest likewise themselves with their Generals for the signal of battell, and at length after much importunity obtained it. Now were some of them sallied out at the gates already: and others followed hard after at their heels, keeping their array, and every man coming orderly into his file and rank. By which time, the Roman Coss. before the battell of the enemies stood surely furnished with their full strength, came on still and gave the onset: charged them before they were all come forth, yea, and ere they were well marshalled that came abroad, being a multitude, waving (as it were) to and fro every way for fear, and looking about themselves, and to their fellows: and to amuze their troubled heads the more, he assailed them with a great shout and main violence. At first the enemies gave back: but after they had gathered their spirits together, and were come again to themselves, and that their Captains on every side rated them, and asked them whether they would yeeld unto them, whom before they had overcome, the fight began again to be renewed. "The Consul on the other part, willed the Romans to remember, that this was the first day, wherein they being newly set free, were to fight likewise for the freed City of Rome: and therefore they were to win a victory for themselves, and not after victory gotten, to be a prize for any more Decemvirs to prey upon. For they fought not now under the conduct and standard of Appius, but of the Consul Valerius: who as he was descended from the deliverers of the people of Rome, so he was one of them himself: exhorting them to shew now, that in former battells of late dayes, it was long of the leaders and not of the souldiers, that they achieved no victories: saying, it were a foul shame for them, to have had more stomach against their own neighbours and citizens, than heart against their enemies; and to have stood more in fear of servitude at home, than of bondage abroad. As for Virginia, she was but one, whose honesty and chastity was in time of peace hazarded: and Appius it was only, and none but he, that in regard of his unbridled and dissolute lust, was the dangerous citizen. But if the fortune of war should fail on our side, and go against us, then shall our children all be in jeopardy, to be abused and spoiled at the hands of many thousands of enemies. Unwilling I am (quoth he) to preface such miseries and to prognosticate to the City those calamities, which both Jupiter and our stock-father Mars, forbid and hinder to light upon it, founded upon so lucky signs and happy foretokens, at the first beginning: I put you in mind rather of the Aventine Hill, and Mount Sacer: that where within these few months you recovered your freedom, thither ye may carry back again your Empire, safe and sound, unsteined and unfoiled: that all the World may see that Roman souldiers are as forward and nobly minded after the banishing of the Decemvirs, as they were before their creation: and that by the bringing in of equal and indifferent Laws, the manhood and prowess of the people of Rome, is no whit decayed nor diminished. Having uttered these words among the ensigns of the footmen, he made speed to the cornets of the Horsemen. Go to, brave gallants (quoth he) excel the footmen in valour and and chivalry, like as ye exceed them in honor and degree. At the very first shock and encounter, the footmen forced the enemy to retreat: and being now retired to your hand, set spurs to, gallop after them apace, and chase them out of the plain field: they will never abide your violent charge: for even already they are at a bay, and stand rather at a stay, than make any resistance. Hereupon they gird out lustily, and run their horses among the enemies, disorderd already, and in disarray by the service of the footmen. And having broken through their ranks, and passed forth even to the rereward: certain of them cast about in the void and open ground, and when the enemies were about on all sides to fly, they turned most of them away from their camp, and overriding them, they got between them and home, and scared them wholly from thence. The footmen and the Consul himself, with the whole strength of the main battell, made forward to the camp, assailed the tents, won them, and besides a great slaughter, obtained a booty far greater.

When news of this battell was brought, not only into the City, but also to the other army into the Sabins country, it was received in the City with joy only and solemnity: but in the camp it set the souldiers hearts on edge, and enkindled them to strive for the like honor and renown. Now had Horatius already partly by sending his souldiers forth, to make incursions and outrodes: and partly by training and proving them in light skirmishes, enured and acquainted them to trust to themselves, and have confidence in their own good service, rather than to remember the shameful disgrace and foil, received under the leading of the Decemvirs. And even those small bickerings had done them much good already against they should venture upon a set field, and heartened them in assured hope to win the victory. The Sabins again for their part, still lusty upon their good success the year before, ceased not to provoke and urge their enemies: very oft asking them what they meant after the guise of robbers, to run in and out in small companies, so to trifle out the

the time, and thus by peece meal to make of one entire battel many petty and small skirmishes? Why rather fought they not one field for all, and without more ado, hazzard all upon a cast, and commit the whole to the trial of fortune, to see unto what side she will incline. Then the Romans, besides that of themselves they had gathered heart and courage enough, were with the indignity of this challenge also set on fire: considering, that when the other army was at the point now, with victory to return into the City, their enemies began to insult and crow over them with reproachful tearms: and if now they were not meet and even with them, when should they ever be able to make their parts good? So soon as the Consul perceived the souldiers thus to murmur and mumble within the camp, he assembled them all together, and thus he spake: "Sirs (quoth he) what success hath been, and how the service hath sped in Algidum, I suppose you have already heard, namely, such as befieemed the army of a free state and people. By the policy of my fellow Consul, and the manhood of his souldiers together, atchieved is the victory. As for my self, that course will I take, and that resolute mind will I carry, which you my souldiers shall afford unto me. The war may be drawn out in length profitably: it may be also dispatched and ended speedily: If protracted it shall be, look how I have begun already to train you, with the same discipline still I will exercise you, and bring to pass, that your hope and prowels may encrease every day more then other. If your hearts now serve you wel, and that you like to fight it out, Go on in the name of God, and in token of your willing heart and valorous prowels, now let up such a cry and shout, as you will make when you first join battel, and give the charge. After that they had with exceeding cheerfulness shouted aloud: God bless us all (quoth he) I will fulfill your desire, and bring you forth to morrow into the field for to fight. So the rest of that day was bestowed in making their harness and weapons ready. When the morrow was come, the Sabins so soon as they perceived the Romans ranged in battel array, came forth also themselves, as ready and desirous of fight, as they. Here was a battel struck, such as might beleeve two armies, that trusted on both sides in their own valour, and made full account of that days honour. The one eager and greedy to recover their ancient glory, wonted evermore to have the upper hand, the other proudly bearing themselves, upon a new victory lately atchieved. The Sabins besides, mended their strength wel with a stratagem, for when they had equally divided their battalions every way, they reserved two thousand drawn out of the rest, extraordinary without the ranks apart. Who in the very time of the conflict, should hotly charge the left point of the Romans: Then they advancing overthwart with their ensignes, & flanking them on the one side, pressed shrewdly upon that one point, and overcharged it, wel neer environed all about. Then the horsemen of two legions, 600, almost in number, alight on foot from their horsebacks, and as their fellows were even now ready to retreat, rush forward with all speed to the forefront: and withal, made head against the enemy. And first, they put life unto them again, for that they entred equally with the footmen into danger and bare even part thereof: afterwards, for very shame, they gave more boldness and animated them to fight. For abashed they were, that horsemen should be put to double service in both kinds of fight, on horse and on foot: and professed footmen not able to countervail the horsemen, who had taken them to their feet. So they advance forward to the battel, which on their part was abandoned, and make haste to recover the ground which they had lost. And in a trice, at one instant, not only the fight was renewed, but also a battalion of the Sabins began to shrink. The horsemen closely among the ranks and files of the footmen, gat again to their horses, and from thence rode speedily unto the other side, reporting to their fellows the victory: and withal, sharply charged the enemies, who now were affrighted, because the stronger wing of their side was discomfited: neither were there any in this battel also, that were seen to perform better service then they. The Consul, as an overseer, beheld all the manner of it, praising those that stood to it manfully, and rebuking where they fought but faintly. They were not so soon chastised and reproved, but presently they bare themselves like hardy men, and did right good service: and look how much that praise excited some, so much shame stirred up others. Then with a fresh shout and outcry, they bent their whole force on all sides, and compelled the enemies to turn their backs: who were not able after this, to abide the violence of the Romans. The Sabins scattered here and there all over the fields, left their tents for a spoil to their enemies: where the Romans recovered again not the goods of their Allies, as before in Algidum, but their very own, which they had lost by the forraging and spoiling of their lands.

For this two-fold victory atchieved in two sundry battels, the Senat right sparingly (such was their misery) decreed in the name and behalf of the Consuls, one days thanksgiving and procession, and no more. But the people, the second day likewise, without order and warrant from authority, solemnized the same in great numbers. And this popular procession, disorderly as it was, and without formality, was with more good will and better affection of men celebrated, then the other. The Consuls of set purpose (as it was agreed afore) came within the compass of those two days into the City: and summoned the Senat to assemble in Mars field: where, as they were about to make some speech of their exploits and worthy acts, the chief and principal Lords of the Senat, complained and shewed themselves grieved, that the Senat was assembled on purpose, among the souldiers, to strike a terror into them. Whereupon the Consuls, because they would give no occasion of quarrel and fault-finding, called away the Senat from thence into Præa Flaminia, where now the Temple of Apollo stands, a place which even then they called Circus Apollinarius: wher they being denied triumph with one voice and general consent of the nobles, *L. a Tribune

A A Tribun of the Commons, propounded unto the people, to know what they thought of the Consuls triumph. And among many that stepped forth to cross and dissuade the bill, C. Claudius above all others cried out aloud, that the Coss. intended to triumph over the Nobles, and not over their enemies: and that they sought a thank by way of recompence for a private favour done to the Tribun, and not for an honorable reward, for any vertue and worthy act. For never (quoth he) aforetime, was there held any treaty of triumph before the people: but evermore it was referred to the Senate, to consider and determine of that honor. Neither had the Kings at any time, impaired the Majesty of that highest Court and degree: what should the Tribuns then meddle so much, and have their hand in all matters by vertue of their authority, as to suffer no publick counsel at all to remain in force? For a City can never be counted free, nor Laws equal and indifferent, but when each degree and estate retaineth still their own priviledge, and hold their proper pre-eminence. When the rest of the principal Senators had spoken much to the same effect, all the Tribes notwithstanding in general, allowed by their suffrages that which the Tribun had propounded. This was the first time that ever any triumph was granted by the voyces of the people, without the authority and assent of the Senators. But this victory of the Tribuns and the commonalty, had like to have turned to a dangerous surfeit of licentious liberty: by reason that the Tribuns conspired together and were fully agreed, to be chosen Tribuns again: and to the end that their own ambition should be less seen above others, they alledged to the Coss. for a sufficient reason (that they likewise should continue still in place of government) the agreement and consent of the Senators: through whose holding together and drawing in one line, the liberties of the Commons, to the great disgrace and reproach of the Consuls, were infringed and indamaged. For what would come of it, say they, if before the late Laws were fully established the (new) Consuls with their factious bandings, should set upon the new Tribuns: for we must not look to have alwayes such as the Horatij and Valerij, to be Consuls, men that would not regard their own weal before the freedom of the commonalty. As it hapned very well for that time, it fell to M. Duilius his lot especially, to be chief President of the Comices and Election: who like a prudent and wise man, foreseeing the heart-burning and hatred, like presently to ensue, upon the continuance of the same Magistratos still in place, said flatly, that of the old Tribuns he would not propound any one: and when his brethren in office laboured earnestly with him, to permit the Tribes to go to a free scrutiny, or else yield up the charge to him allotted, of holding the assembly, unto his brethren, who would keep the same and manage the matter, according to Law rather than to the will and pleasure of the Nobles: Duilius then, seeing their earnest contention, caused the Consuls to be called into their own pates and seats, and demanded their minds concerning the Election of the Consuls: and when they answered that they would create new, he having once got them to be the authors of a popular sentence, and not popular themselves, went forth together with them into the assembly of the people. Now when the Consuls were brought out into their presence, and were asked the question, what they would do in case the people of Rome should elect them Consuls the second time, and that, in remembrance of their liberty received and recovered by their means, and for their good service in war, and worthy acts by them performed: he finding them constant in the same mind still, and nothing altered from their resolution: after he had commended the Consuls, for their steadfast perseverance, unto the last (as altogether unlike to the Decemvirs) went presently to the new Election. And when he had created five Tribuns only, seeing there were not other competitors enough to reach unto sufficient voyces of the Tribes, in comparison of the other nine Tribuns his colleagues, who openly stood to be chosen again: he brake up the assembly, and from that time forward called no more about any Election. For he said, That he had fulfilled the Law in that behalf, which without setting down any precise and definite number of Tribuns, so that there were some left behind, and rooms void, gave authority to those that were created, to chuse and take unto them more colleagues, to make up the number. And therewith he recited the words of the Law, which run in this form. If I shall propound ten Tribuns of the Commons to be created, and they shall that present day make fewer Tribuns: they by vertue of this Law, shall be accounted Tribuns, whom those elected shall chuse and take unto them for their fellows, and as lawful shall they be hold, as those whom this day ye shall create Tribuns of the Commons. Thus when Duilius persisted still resolute unto the end, saying, That in any case the state might bear five and twenty Tribuns, and having thus conquered the greedy ambition of his colleagues: with great favor and the good liking as well of the Nobility as the Commonalty, he gave up his room. The new Tribuns now in the electing and making choise of their companions, carried favour with the Senators, and framed themselves to their will and pleasure, in chusing to them two of the Nobility, and those that had been Consuls, to wit, Sp. Tarquinij and Au. Aternus. And Consuls there were created, Sp. Horatius and Titus Virginius Cincinnatus. Who bearing themselves in a mean between Commons and Nobles, and not greatly inclining to one side or other, had peace as well at home as abroad. Ln. Tribunus, a Tribun of the Commons, being highly offended with the Senators, and spitefully bent against them, and saying withal, that in the cooperation of the rest of the Tribuns, he had been cunningly over-raught by them, and betrayed by his colleagues, propoied a Law, That whosoever hereafter propounded unto the Commons any Tribuns to be elected, should not give over, but still propound, until he made up the full number of ten. This continued he all his Tribunship in persecuting and molesting the Nobles, never letting them to be quiet: wherupon he was surnamed Asper.

After

After this, M. Geganus Macrinus, and C. Julius, being created Consuls, appeased the contentious Orations of the Tribuns, which were begun and raised against the young Gentlemen of the Nobility, so as without any bitter invectives against that authority of the Tribuns, they preserved still the sovereign Majesty of the Nobles: and by means of decreeing musters against the wars of the Volscians and Equians, stayed the Commons, and kept the City from all sedition and discord: saying, That by civil unity, all would be at quiet abroad: whereas through discord of citizens, forrainers took heart. The care likewise of outward peace, was the cause of inward and intestine concord. But evermore the one state disquieted the moderation of the other: for whiles the Commons were still and in good temper, the pny Senators began to offer them wrong and hard measure. And when the Tribuns would have assisted the weaker side, at first it bootied little, I and small good they did: but afterwards they themselves escaped not without abuse and hurt: and especially in their latter moneths, when as they received injuries, both by reason of the meetings and packing together of the mightier sort, and also for that toward the end of the year, the edge and vigor commonly of all authority waxeth dull and groweth feeble and weak. So that now the Commons had little, or no confidence at all in the Tribunship, unless they might have such as Isilius to be Tribuns: and as for these two years last past, they had them but in bare name, and not to any effect and purpose. The elders and ancient fathers of the Senate on the other side, as they believed verily that their youth were too forward and lusty: so they were of this mind, That if there needs must be trespass and excels, they had rather those of their own degree and coat should exceed measure, and have greater stomach, than their adversaries. So ticklish and dangerous a thing it is to keep a mean in maintenance of liberty: whiles under a colour of wishing and desiring equality, every man advanceth and lifteth up himself so, as that he thrusteth and beareth down another: and in pretending a care and regard that men should not stand in awe and fear of them, they make themselves dread and fearful to others, and so the wrong that we put off and turn from our selves, we impose upon others. As if there were no remedy, but that we must either do, or suffer injury.

Then weremade Consuls, T. Quintius Capitolinus the fourth time, and Agrippa Furinus: who found neither sedition within, nor war without. But yet both the one and the other was near at hand. For now could no longer the dissention of the citizens be held in, but needs it must break out. And both Tribuns and Commons rose against the Nobles. For in all the assemblies and meetings of the people, one or other alwayes of the Nobles and Senators were served with process: whereupon grew fresh troubles and new contentions. At the first noise whereof, as if the signal of battel had been given, and the al'arm stricken up, the Equians and Volscians took arms: and withal, their Leaders and Captains (such as gaped greedily after spoil and pillage) had born them in hand and perswaded them to believe, That for these two years past, they could not go thorough with their musters proclaimed: for that the Commons refused to obey, and brake their allegiance: which was the only cause, that there were no forces sent out against them. Besides, say they, The use and manner of their warfare, is now with their licentious looseness, discontinued and clean decayed: Rome was now no more a common-wealth and country to her citizens: For, all their anger, quarrels and malice, that they bare aforetime against forrein nations, was now turned upon their own selves: so that at this time they had fit occasion and good opportunity to surprize them, blinded as wolves with mutual rage and fury one against another. Hereupon they joyned their whole power, and first wasted the country of Latium: and afterwards seeing none to encounter them and make defence (to the exceeding joy of those that were the authors of this war) they came foraging and spoiling all the way to the very walls of Rome, even before the gate Esquilina, there braving and vaunting in reproachful and scornful terms before the whole City, telling them how they had laid their fields and territories wast. From whence they retired themselves without revenge and loss, driving their booties afore them, and marched along to Corbio. Quintius the Consul seeing this, assembled the people, and there (as I have heard) he made to them a speech in this wise. "Albeir

of Quintius
the Consul, to the people of Rome.

"I am not privy to my self, and my conscience accuseth me not of any fault. O Quirites, yea am I
"I exceedingly abashed and ashamed to come forth into this assembly of yours: that ever you
"shon'd know, or the posterity hereafter understand, how the Equians & Volscians (who of late "dayes were hardly comparable to the Hernicks) came when T. Quintius was the fourth time Cos.
"in warlike manner with banner displayed to the walls of the City of Rome: & went their wayes
"again clear and without any hurt by them received. This shameful dishonor, if I had known it "would have light, so just in this year (and yet for this good while the world hath so gone, and
"such hath been the course of our life and conversation, that my mind ever gave me there was no "goodness toward) I would have avoided this place of dignity, either by banishment or death, if "there had been no other way to escape it. And might indeed have Rome been taken in the time "of my Consulship, if those weapons which were under our gates had been in the hands of val-
"rous men? Then had I indeed enjoyed sufficient honor already, then had I lived long enough, "and a little too long, and might have dyed well when I was but the third time Consul. But who "were they, I pray you, whom these most base and cowardly enemies of ours, despised and set so "light by? Were we they that are your Consuls, or you (Quirites) the people of Rome? If we were "in the fault, take from us as unufficient & unworthy persons, our rule and government: and if that
"be not enough, let us over and besides be wel punished, and abide the smart. But if the blame be "in you Quirites, let neither God nor man chāstise your trespass and offence, only do you repent
"your

- A "your selves. and be sory therefore. It was not your cowardise that they scorned and despised, neither was it their own valour wherein they trusted. For why? they having been so often deiated and driven out of the camp and the field, fined with forfeiture of Lands, forced to go under the gallows, and brought into servitude, knew very well both themselves and you also. No, no, the variance and discord between our own states and degrees, is the only bane, and nothing else, of this City: the jarres and debates, I say, between the Nobles and the Commons. Whiles neither we have any gage or stay of rule and command, nor you know mean of freedom and liberty: while you are weary of Noble men rulers, and we likewise of the Commoners Magistrates, they gave gotten heart, and wax bold. Now, (Gods will) what mean you to do, and what would you have? Tribuns of the Commons yelonged and sought after: for quietness and concord sake, we let you have your longing, Decemvirs you had a great mis of, and them you desired: we granted and permitted them to be created. Weary you were anone, and all too weary of Decemvirs: we forced them to forgo their office. And when your anger continued till against them, being become private persons again, we suffered to be put to death, and to be exiled, most noble and right honorable men. When you would needs elect anew your Tribuns of the Commons, you chose them at your pleasure. To create Consuls from out of your own faction, although we knew it hurtful and prejudicial to the Nobles, yet have we seen that dignity proper to Nobility, given away as it were, and made common with the Commonalty. The assistance of Tribuns, the appealing to the people, the Laws and Acts devised by the Commons, to be tendered and imposed upon the Nobles, to bind them thereto: and that, under the pretence and colour of Isonomi, or equal and indifferent Laws, our own rights and privileges should be overthrown we have abidden, and do still endure. When will there be an end once of discord and dissention? Shall we never have one City of it? Shall we never have this to be the common Country of us all? We can be content much better to be at quiet, when we are vanquished, than whiles we are victors. And is it not enough for you, that you are dread and feared of us? but still you seek for more? Against us it was, that you took the Mount Aventine, against us it was that you held and kept the Mountain Sacer. For when the gate Esquilina, was well-near surprised by the enemy, and when the Volscians our enemies were ready to climb our trench and banks, and to scale our walls, none of you there was to be seen, for to remove and set them farther off. Against us ye play the men against us ye can be armed. Well then go to: When ye have here beset the Senate-house, taken up the market place and common Hall with souldiers, filled the goal with Noblemen, and those of the chieftest and best quality, then with like courage and stoutness of heart, sally forth of the gate Esquilina. Or, if you dare not venture so much, behold and view all afore you from the walls discover your Lands and territories with fire and sword wasted & consumed, your goods and cattel had and driven away as booties and prizes, your farms and houses burning and smoking in every quarter. But all this time the Commonweal only (you think) by this means is in worse plight and poorer case, the villages fired, the City besieged, and the enemy goeth his way with the honor of the war. And in what taking, I pray you, is your own private estate the while? Tidings will come anon to every man particularly, from out of his own livings and possessions, of his proper losses: and what have you at home (if a man may ask) to make supply again? Will the Tribuns make you restitution, and amends for all your damages? You shall have words of them your fill. They will not stick to speak, to rail, and let fly slanders freely before you against the heads of the City, Laws upon Laws you shall have heaped thick and threefold. Assemblies, convocations, and seditious invectives good store. But from thence their assemblies, never came there any of you home to his house, richer of one gray groat or single denier, nor in better state to live than before. Was there ever any one carried ought from thence to his wife, & children, but hatred and malice, displeasure and rancour, grudges and heart-burnings, both publick and private? From which at all times ye have been shielded and defended, if not with your own virtue and innocency, yet by the help and aid of others. But certainly, when ye served in wars under the conduct of us your Consuls, and followed not the leading of your Tribuns: when you served I say in camp, and not in the Hall and common place: when in battel your enemies quaked to hear you shout, and not in your assemblies, the Romans were in dread of your ira and outcries: then you wan prizes, and conquered Lands from your enemies, then you returned home with triumph to your houses, full of riches and wealth full of honor and renown as well publick as private. Whereas now, you suffer your enemies to depart, fraught and laden with your goods. Stick to your Ward-Leets, as if you were nailed and fast pinned to them: dwell still in your Hall, and lead your lives continually there: yet must you needs war when all is done, fly from it as fast as you can. Grieved it you indeed, and thought you is a trouble and painful thing, to take an expedition so far as into the Volscians and Equians country? Lo, the war is come even unto your gates: if it be not put from thence, it will anon be within the walls, it will scale the Castle and Capitol, it will follow you, even into your houses. Two years ago, the Senate gave order and commanded that there should be souldiers mustered, and an army conducted into Algidum. But we sit still at home & do nothing, but hide & scold (as it were) one at another like curst and shrewd women, contenting our selves, and joying in a present peace, and little seeing that if that rest, there will come sundry wars again, and that right shortly. I know full well, there are speeches more pleasing & plausible than these. But to speak the plain truth for your good rather than to flatter and sooth for your pleasure, if mine own nature and disposition did not teach and "admonish me, even very necessity doth force and constrain me. Willing would I be, and most "willing, O Quirites, to please you: but much more would I have you to be in safety, think what"soever ye will of me. It falleth out commonly, as a thing that cometh by kind, that who so spea-

 "keth to a multitude in his own cause, and for himself, is better liked, and heard with more ap"plause, than he whose mind aimeth at nothing else but a publick weal. Unless peradventure you "think these common flatterers, these clawbacks, and men-pleasers, which give you no rest, nei"ther in war nor peace, do stir you up and provoke you for your good. But will you have the "truth? ye being once solicited and pricked on by them, serve their turns in good stead, either
 "for their honor or gain. And because they see themselves to be of no worth and regard, while "the states do agree, they desire to play small game, rather than to sit out: to be Captains of mis-
 "rule and lewdness, rather than of nothing: and in one word, to be the heads, the ringleaders
 "and guides of troubles and dissensions. Whereof, if you be so blest and happy, as to be weary now "at length, and will betake your selves to the ancient manners and fashions, both of your own,
 "and of your ancestors, in lieu of these new fangles, I will refuse no punishment: nay, let me be "put to the most shameful death that is, if I do not before many dayes pass over my head, defeat,
 "discomfit and put to flight these robbers and destroyers of our fields, and send them packing out
 "of their own camp, and finally translate and remove this terror of war, wherewith ye now are "so affrighted and astonished, from our gates and walls, even unto their own Towns and Cities.
 Seldom at any time else, had there been a speech delivered by a popular Tribune, more acceptable unto the Commons, than was the sharp Oration at this present of a most severe Consul. Yea, and the very youth, which amid such terrors of war, had been wont to refuse soldiery, the only keen and sharp weapon they had to fight withal against the Nobles, now desired war and to be in armes. Over and besides, the country kerns that fled (to Rome,) such also as were spoiled and wounded in the villages about, reported more foul and cruel outrages in their ears, than were presented unto their eyes, and set all the City in an hot an angry broil. Now when the Senators were assembled together in the Councel House, then verily they all cast their eyes upon Quintius, beholding and regarding him well, as the only patron and maintainer of the Majesty of Rome: but the chief peers and Lords of the Senate spake out and said: That he had made an Oration, be-seeming the sovereign Government of a Consul, befitting so many Consulships by him already born, befitting the whole course of his life, that had passed oft through many honorable digni-ties, and yet alwayes deserved more. As for other Consuls, they either in flattering and soothing up the Commons, had betrayed the dignity of the Nobles: or else in seeking by hard courses to maintain the rights, preeminencies and royalties of their state, and to tame the multitude, have thereby made them more fell and untractable. But T. Quintius, he hath made a speech, respective and tending, as well to the royal dignity of the Nobles, as to the concord and unity of the States, and principally regarding the condition of the times. They would request him therefore, together with his brother Consul, to take in hand the care of the Common-weal. They would request the Tribuns likewise, to joyn in one accord with the Consuls, and shew themselves willing and forward, to have the war kept off and put back from their City walls: and in so fearful and dangerous a case, to reclaim their Commons to their due obedience to their Nobles: saying moreover, That the native Country, the common mother of them all, calleth unto the Tribuns and craveth their aid, now that the territories are wasted, and the City at hand to be assaulted. Whereupon, they all agreed generally to decree a muster, and presently to make a levy of soldiers. And when the Consuls had pronounced before the whole people then and there assembled, that it was no time as then to hear excuses, but that all the younger sort, should betimes the next morning by day-light, be ready to attend in Mars field: and that after the war was ended, they would find out and appoint a time, to enquire into their allegations and reasons, that entred not their names:
 and that he should be taken for a traitor and rebel, whose excuse they allowed not: the whole manhood and youth of the City shewed themselves the morrow after in readines. Each cohort or regiment chose their Centiners or Captains, and every Regiment had two Senators for their Provost Marshals. All this was performed (by report) with such speed and expedition, that on the very same day, the standards and ensigns were by the Questors had forth of the Armory and Chamber of the City and brought into Mars field: and by the fourth hour (or ten a clock) the same day, set forward and advanced out of the field. And this new army, with a few bands of old soul-diers, who willingly of their own accord followed them, marched on and rested, at ten miles end. The day following they discovered their enemies, and at Corbio encamped close unto them.
 And by the third day, there was no stay on both hands, but they must needs encounter and fight.
 For why? The Romans for anger were sharp set: the enemies again, upon a guilty conscience that they had so often rebelled, were grown desperate. Now, whereas in the Roman army the two Consuls were in equal commission, yet gave Agrippa place unto his brother Quintius, and yielded unto him the entire and absolute command. A course most profitable in the managing and execution of great affairs. And being thus preferred, he again in courtesy answered and required the others Gentleness and inclination to submission, in this wise, by imparting unto him all his Counsels: by parting with him all his honor and praise, and by making him his equal, who was indeed his inferiour and underling. In the battel, Quintius commanded the right point, Agrippa led the left: Sp. Posthumius Albus, the Lieutenant General, had the conduct of the main battel. And P. Sulpicius the other Lieutenant, they set over the horsemen. The footmen

A men of the right point fought most valiantly, and the Volscians received them with equal valour. Sp. Sulpitius with his men of arms, brake through the main battel of the enemies: & albeit he might have retired himself the same way again unto his company, before that the enemies could bring their ranks again into order, that were dilarayd: yet he thought it better to charge them upon their backs. And in one moment he had discomfited and quite defeated his enemies, by assailing them behind, and thus affrighting them on both sides, but that the Volscian and Æquian Horsemen recharged him, held him play in his own fight, and so kept him occupied a good while. Thereat, Sulpitius said, it was no time now to linger and to drive off, but to bestir themselves, crying out aloud, that they were environed round, enclosed within their enemies, and excluded from their own fellows, unless they set to, and bent their whole force, quickly to dispatch the Horse-fight: and that it would not serve, to put the Horsemen to flight and save their lives: but kill both horse and man, that none might ride back again from thence into the battel to renew the fight. And to make head and resistance against him and his horsemen, they were never able, since that the main thick battel of footmen had given him ground already. Good ear they gave to his words, and soon harkned to his direction: and with one entire assault they gave a fierce charge, and defeated the whole power of the Cavallery, unhorsed and dismounted a number of them, and with their javelins goared both them and their horses. And there's an end of the horse-service. Then they set upon the battel of the footmen and dispatched messengers unto the Consuls with news, what they had done: where also by that time, the battel of the enemies began to shrink. And when tidings came unto the Romans that were already upon the point of victory, they verily were more encouraged: but the Æquians that were about to retreat, were stricken with greater fear. In the main battel first began the overthrow; namely, whereas the men of arms before had broken the array. After them, the left point also began to be distressed and driven back, by Quintius the Consul. But in the right there was hardest hold, and most ado. Where, Agrippa being a tall man of his hands and young withal, seeing in every part of the battel things go better than where he was: caught the ensigns from the ensign-bearers, advanced them forward his own self, yea, and fell to flinging some of them against the thickest of his enemies. For fear therefore of so shameful a disgrace, the soldiers bestir themselves, and freshly assailed the enemy. And so on all hands alike, they achieved the victory and won the field. Then came a messenger from Quintius, & brought word, that he had the better hand, and was now ready to give an assault upon the camp, but would not break in, and enter thereinto before he knew for certain, that they in the left point also had gotten the upper hand, and made an end of the battel. In case therefore he had discomfited the enemy, he should joyn his forces to him, that the whole army altogether might gain the spoil and pillage of the tents. So Agrippa, who also for his part was victor, came to his brother Consul and the camp of the enemies, and met with mutual congratulation one to the other. There, finding but a few to defend, whom they discomfited in the turning of an hand, they brake into the rampier and munitions, without conflict or skirmish: and so besides the recovery of their own goods again, which they had lost by the overrunning of the country, they gained also a rich booty, and retired back with their whole army. I cannot learn, that either they themselves

E should either refuse, or not hope for that honor. For mine own part, so far as I can guess in so long distance of times, seeing that Valerius and Horatius, who over and besides the conquest of the Volscians and the Æquians, had the honor also of dispatching and finishing the Sabines war, were denied triumph at the Senate's hand: these Consuls might not with modesty, sue for the same: having performed but half the good service of the others: lest if they had gotten it granted, there might have seemed more regard had of the persons, than of the deeds.

But this noble and honourable victory over the enemies abroad, thus achieved, was obscured and foully distayned with a shameful doom of the people, in a controversy of their allies, about the bounds and meers of certain Lands. The inhabitants of Aricia and Ardea, having warred oftentimes one with the other, about some Lands in question between them, and by giving and taking sundry foils and overthrows outweapied, chose the people of Rome their Umpire to decide and determine this quarrel. And when they were come with their counsel to plead the case, the Magistrates granted a Court of Assises of the people. Where was much arguing and dispute on both sides before them: and after the witnesses were deposed and that at length the Tribes should be called to the scrutinie; and the people give their voices, there steps forth an old father, one P. Scaptius, a Commoner. And I (quoth he) for my part, O Consuls if it be lawfull to speak for the good of the State, will not suffer the people to erre, and be deceived in this question. When as the Consul's denied him audience, as being an old fool, and of no credit: and commanded him (as he cryed still that the publick cause of the City was betrayed) to be had away, he callerh for the assistance of the Tribuns. The Tribuns then, who lightly are ever overruled by the multitude, rather than able to rule them, yeilded unto the Commons: That for as much as they were desirous to hear what the old man could say, Scaptius should speak his mind at large. Then setteth he the tale on end, and beginneth thus: I am (quoth he) fourscore winters old, and three on the head of it: and even upon that very ground for which all this strife and variance is, I served as a souldier, when I was no young man neither but one that had been preft to wars, and received pay twenty years afore. And it was, I remember well, during the siege before Corioli. Hither am I now come, to give evidence of a thing by long continuance of time,

A controversy between the Ardeates and Aricians, decided by the people of Rome.

The evidence given by old Scaptius.

“worn out clean and forgotten of other men, but fresh in my knowledge and remembrance: to “wit, that the Lands thus litigious, and in controversy, had been sometime within the confines “of the Coriolans: and after the winning of Coriolis were seized by right of conquest, to the Com“mons of the people of Rome. I marvel much therefore, by what custome and prescription, the “Ardeates and Aricines, who never had right and interest, and were not possessed of the land, “(so long as Coriolis stood in prosperity) should hope to defeat the people of Rome thereof, whom “being the LL. in fee of the ground, they had chosen for their Arbitrator. As for me, I have “but a small while to live, and one foot already is in grave: and yet I cannot find in my heart, but “(to that Land, which as old, I being a young and lusty souldier, did my best to fight for, and “conquered with sword in hand) make claim now that I am aged, by word and mouth, the only I “means left me to recover it. I advise the people therefore in good sadness, that in a vain respect “of bootles modesty, they condemn not their own cause, nor give away their right. The Con“suls marking well what audience was given to Scaptius, and that he was heard not only with si“lence, but also with good liking and contentment, cryed out upon this abominable practise: cal“ling both Heaven and Earth to witness, and therewith sent for the Lords of the Council: and “joyning with them, went to the Tribuns, fell in hand with them, and instantly besought them “not to go forward with this most lewd action for the present, and a more shameful precedent “for the time to come: namely, that Umpiers and dayes men, should convert the thing in suit “unto their own and proper vantage: especially considering, that, Admire it were a lawful thing “for a judge himself to have an eye and regard to his own commodity: yet would there not be K “so much gained and gotten by coming thus between, and interverting the Land, as there would “be damage and hinderance another way, in alienating by those hard courses, the hearts of their “good friends and Allies. For the losses (verily) and cracks of name and credit, are such as may “not be valued at any price. And should the Embassadors indeed, say they, go their wayes home “with this goodly award: and make report abroad how they have sped? should our confederats “hear this? should our enemies come by the knowledge thereof? with what grief the one? with “what joy the other? Think ye that our neighbour nations will impute, attribute, and ascribe “this, unto the speech made by Scaptius, a prating old busy body, and one that loveth to hear “himself speak in assemblies? Nay, this is certain: well may Scaptius be famous and much talked “of, in the playing of this pageant: but the people of Rome shall incur the obloquy, to have acted I
 “the part under the visour of Scaptius, of a cunning promoter, and a false interceptor to himself, “of other mens right in suit. For, what judge at any time in a private matter, hath done the like,
 “as to award the thing in question, unto himself? Why, even Scaptius, past all shame and grace “as he is, would never have done it. These and such like words, spake both Consuls and Senators “aloud in all their hearing. But the covetousness of men, and Scaptius that first set them a longing “and their teeth a watering, prevailed more than they all. The Tribes were called to the Scrutiny “of their voyces, and gave judgment, That the Lands pertained to the common Territory of the “people of Rome. Neither can it be denied, but it would have so appeared indeed, in case it had “been tried before other judges. But now, for all the goodness of the cause, is not the ignominy “of the arbitrement one jot the less: Nay, the Aricines and Ardeates themselves, thought not M “more shamefully and hardly of it, than the very Senators and Peers of Rome. The rest of the year

The Fourth Book

Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the Foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of E. Florus upon the fourth Book.

THE Law concerning marriage between the Nobles and the Commons, was proposed, and with much ado enacted by the Tribuns of the Commonalty: notwithstanding, the Nobles withstood it. Tribuns military with full authority of Consuls, were created. Under this kind of Magistracy was the State ruled for certain years, both in City and in war. The Lands of the Ardeates, which had been awarded from them by an arbitrement of the people of Rome, were restored again unto them, and Coloners sent to inhabit the same. In the time of a great dearth and famine at Rome, one Sp. Melius, a Roman knight, O dealt corn amongst the people freely, at his own proper charges: by which deed he won the favor of the Commons: and thereby aspiring to be King, was at the commandment of Quintius Cincinnatus, the Dictator, slain, by the hands of C. Servilius Hala, General of the Horsemen. L. Minutius, who disclosed the treason, had a bullock with gilded horns given him for a reward. The Embassadors of the Romans, which were murdered by the Pidenates, had their Statues or Images erected at the Roftra, or the common Cross of the City, because they died in the service of the Common-wealth. Cornelius Cossus a Colonel, having slain with his own hand Tolumnius, the King of the Veremians, was and bare away the second

A second royal spoils. Mamercus Æmylius the Dictator, limited the Government of the Censureship, within the compass of one year and six months, which before that time continued five years: and for that act, was shamefully disgraced by the Censors. Fidene was conquered and subdued, and thither were Coloners sent to dwell. Whom the men of Fidene slew, and revolted from the people of Rome: and by Mamercus Æmylius the Dictator were subdued, and the City forced. The conspiracy of the bondslaves was suppressed: Potthumius a Tribune military, was for his cruelty slain by his own souldiers. The souldiers then first, and never before, had their pay out of the common treasury. Moreover, this book containeth the wars against the Volscians and Veientians, the Fidenates and Falisci.

The fourth Book of T. Livius.

Here succeeded Consuls after these, M. Genucius and P. Curvius. A year full of broils, both at home and abroad. For in the beginning of the year, both Canuleius, a Tribune of the Commons, proposed a law, concerning alliance of the Patricians with Commons, by way of marriage. Whereby the Nobles supposed their blood to be stained, and the Rights and Privileges of Families and Houses confounded. Also, whereas at first the Tribuns by little and little had moved, That one of the Consuls might be created out of the Commons: now the matter proceeded so far, that of ten Tribuns that then were, the other nine propounded this in plain terms for a law, That it might be in the peoples power to chuse both the Coss. (if they would) either out of Commons or Nobility. Mary, if that should come to pass the Nobles thought indeed that the sovereign rule and authority, was not only made common with the basest sort, but also translated altogether from the great men and best of the City, to the commonalty. Glad were the Senators therefore to hear say, that the people of Ardea, for the wrongful awarding away of their Lands from them, were revolted: and that the Veientians had wasted the Frontiers of the Romans: and that the Volscians and Æquians grudged and muttered for the fortifying of Verrugo; So much preferred they any war, miserable though it were and dangerous, before a shameful and dishonourable peace. Having heard therefore these news, and taken them in the worst manner: to the end that amidst the rumour and bruit of so many wars, the Tribunitian troublesome suits might stay and be dead for the time: they command musters to be taken, souldiers to be levied, all turnure of war, and all manner of force to be prepared, and (if it might be) with more indeavours, than it had been when T. Quintus was Consul. Then C. Canuleius, after some hot words which he spake aloud in the Senate; namely, that the Consuls by frightening the Commons, went about but in vain, to avert them from the regard of their new Laws: and that so long as he had any breath in his body, they should never go through with musters, unless the Commons had first ratified those things, which by him and his brethren had been propounded: forthwith assembled the people together. Thus at one instant the Consuls animated the Senate against the Tribune, and the Tribune incited the people against the Consuls. "The Consuls gave it out plainly and said, that no longer now might these furious courses of the Tribuns be endured. Now were they come to the very height and extremity, and raised more war in effect, at home, than the enemies abroad. Which thing (no doubt) happied not so much through the fault of the Commons, as of the Nobles, nor of the Tribuns more, than of the Consuls. For look what thing was best rewarded in a City, the same always most increased: thus men in peace (we see) prove excellent, thus in war they come to be singular. In Rome (say they) seditions speed ever best, and have been reputed both to each one in particular and to all in general most honourable. But let the Senate call to mind the dignity which they themselves had received from their fathers, and compare it with that which they were like to leave to their children: and see, whether they may boast as the commonalty doth, how that their condition is much bettered and more glorious than before. Well, neither is there any end now, nor ever will be, so long as the Authors of seditions be as highly advanced, as the sediti-ons themselves are prosperous and fortunate. See what matters and how great hath Canuleius attempted! He would bring in a commixture or rather confusion of kindreds and houses, a perturbation in the managing both of publick and private affairs: that nothing might be sincere and intire, nothing pure and undefiled: that all difference and distinction being taken away, no man might know either himself or his. For what thing else do these mixtures of states and degrees by marriages draw after them, without all order and discretion: but that like brut beasts in a manner, Commons and Nobles may go and couple together? so that the children between them born, shall not be able to tell of what blood he is descended, and to what Religion he doth belong, being a mungrel, as it were, the one half a Noble, the other a Commoner; and not well serving and according with himself? They thought it not enough (be like) that all divine and humane Laws, were confused and shuffled together: for now these mutinous persons, these busy heads and troublers of the common people, address themselves to shoot at the Consulship. At first, they sounded in private speeches and secret discourses, only, how to compass. That one of the Consuls might be created out of the body of the Commons: but now they go roundly to work and carry it before them: they are so bold to prefer laws (forsooth) that the people might make them both either Nobles or Commons, at their good pleasure. Whereby (no doubt) they would make chosse from out of the Commons, of the most seditious persons of all other.

The allegations of the Consuls against the Tribuns of the Commons.

"We

The Oration
of Canuleius to the Commons, against the Nobility,

"We shall have then the Canuleians and Isilians to be our Coss. But Jupiter (that great good God) forbid, that ever the Royal and Imperial Majesty, should come to that low ebb or desperate pass: dye they would a thousand deaths rather, than suffer so great a shame and indignity: knowing this assuredly, that their ancestors also, if they had once suspected or foreseen, that by granting the commonalty every thing as they desired, they would not have proved more lovely and chearful towards them, but rather more churlish and untractable: and when they had obtained their first suits, to proceed still to demand worse and worse, one thing after another: they would sooner have indured at the first, any contending and debate whatsoever, than suffered those hard conditions to be imposed, and put upon them: and because they had once relented, that Tribuns should be created, therefore to grant them again the second time. I So that as now, there is no quietness with them, nor end of quarrels will be none, so long as in one and the self same City, Tribuns and Senators remain together. Nay verily, either this state must be put down, or that office utterly abolished. And better late than never, to withstand and meet with their rash and desperate boldness. What? shall they without controlment, first sow discord at home, and then stir up forrein wars abroad? and afterwards, against those wars which themselves have raised, debar and hinder the City, for to take arms and defend it self? and when as they have as good as sent for the enemies to come to their dores, then, nor suffer an army to be levied against them. But let Canuleius (if he dare) speak these words out in the Senate, That unless the Nobles suffer his laws, as if he were a Conqueror to be admitted and received, he will slay the mustering? For what else is that, but to threaten that he will sell and betray his country, and suffer it to be assailed and lost? What encouragement will such a word give as that, I say not, to the commonalty of Rome, but to the Volscians, Equians and Veientians? Will not they hope, under the conduct of Canuleius, to be able to scale the Capitol and the Castle, if so be the Tribuns shall take from the Nobility their courageous hearts, as they have bereaved them already of their right, their honor and dignity? Let him know therefore, that the Consuls are ready, first to shew themselves to be Captains and Leaders, against the mischievous practises of their own citizens, before they will make head against the armed forces of their enemies? Whiles these matters were debated of with great contention and heat in the Senate house, Canuleius for the maintenance of his laws, and to cross the Consuls, made this Oration unto the people. How greatly the Nobles have despised you, O Quirites, how unworthy they have ever thought you, to live among them within the walls of one City, me thinks I have, as often heretofore, so now especially and most of all perceived: in that they have risen up altogether so fiercely to check and withstand our proposed laws. "Wherein, what pretend we else, but to tell them and put them in mind, That we are, as well as they, citizens: and although we are not of the same wealth, yet we inhabit the same country with them? In the one, we request marriage; a thing to borderers, yea, and to forrain nations usually granted: and to speak of our selves, we also have afforded even to our conquered enemies, the benefit of our City, which is far more than marriage. In the other, we move no new matter, but only claim again and challenge that, which is the peoples right, to wit, that the people of Rome may bestow their offices and dignities, upon whom they please. What reason have they then, I pray you, to set all on an uprore, as if Heaven and Earth should go together? and what is the cause, that erewhile I had like to have had violence offered unto me in the Senate? What moved them to break out and say, they could not forbear nor keep their hands from me, and threaten to abuse and violate the sacred authority of the Tribuns? Set case that the people of Rome may have their free voyces and suffrages, to elect the Consuls whom they will, and that no Commoner be denied, so he be worthy of the highest place, for to obtain the sovereign dignity. How then? cannot this City possibly stand any longer? and is our Empire come to an end for ever? And all one it is (be like) and importeth as much, to disable a Commoner, for being made Consul, as if a man inferred, that a bondman or a freed libertine should become Consul. Perceive you not yet (my Masters) in what contempt you live? They would, if they might, bereave you in some measure of this day light: that ye breath and speak, that ye have the shapes of men, they think much, they repine, and it goes to their heart. And what else? They give it out flatly and say (if God will) it is unlawful, that a Commoner should be a Consul. I beseech you hear me a little. If we may not be allowed to read the Chronicles, nor to peruse the High-priests records and registers, know we not those things then, that even all strangers know? namely, That Consuls entred in place of Kings, and succeeded them, and have no other right, preheminance or dignity at all, than Kings had before? Think ye that men have never heard, that Numa Pompilius, a man not so much as a citizen of Rome, much less then, a Patritian and Nobly descended among them, was sent for out of the Sabines countrey, and by the peoples voyces, and the assent of the Nobles, created King of Rome? Also, afterwards, how L. Tarquinius, who was no Roman born, no, nor yet so much as an Italian, but the son of Demaratus the Corinthian, a stranger inhabitant at Tarquinius, and from thence removing, albeit King Ancus his sons were living, attained likewise to the crown? Moreover how Servius Tullius after him, the son of a captive woman of Corniculum, whose father was unknown, whose mother a bondwoman, through wit and vertue, obtained and held the Kingdom? For what should I speak of T. Tatius the Sabine, whom Romulus himself, the father and founder of this City, admitted to reign together with him? Well, so long as no stock was disdained, no race rejected, wherein appeared sparks of vertue, the Romans Em-

- A "pire became mighty, and flourished. Scorn ye then at this day, a Consul out of the Commonalty, when our forefathers despised not Kings that were aliens and strangers? No, nor when the Kings were expelled, was this City denied and shut against forreiners, that were valorous, and men of action. The kindred and whole name (I am sure) of the Claudii, after the Kings were exiled, we not only admitted into our City, from out of the Sabins, but also received into the number of the Patritians and Noble men. And may a meer forrainer indeed become a Noble-man, and so a Consul? And shall a Citizen of Rome, if he be of the Commonalty, be wholly disabled and out of all hope for ever of being Consul? Tell me I pray you, Think ye it not possible, that a valiant and hardy man, approved both in war and peace, being one of the Commons,
- B "may prove like to Numa, L. Tarquinius, or Servius Tullius? and if he do, whether shall we suffer him to govern the Common-weal, or no? And whether will ye have our Consuls, such rather as the Decemvirs (the most wretched and wicked persons under the sun, who, by your leave, were at that time of the Nobility) than strangers and new-commers, which of all the Kings were simply the very best? But forsooth, presently after the KK. were deposed and expelled, there was not one of the Com. a Consul. What of that? ought no new thing to be ordained, and which hath not been already taken up afore? For many things have not yet been practised, (as in a state newly incorporate) ought not such then to be put in use, if they be thought expedient? While Romulus reigned, there were no Bishops nor Augurs: by Numa Pompilius they were created. There was no Sessing of the people at all in the City, no description of Hundreds and Classes. By S. Tullius they were instituted. Coff. were never heard of before: when the KK. were driven out, they were elected. The time was, when neither the absolute rule nor yet the name of a Dictator was known. In our fathers dayes it first began. Tribuns, Ediles, Questors there have been none: it was ordained they should be made. Within this ten years, we have both created and also abolished out of the common-weal, Decemvirs for the making and penning of our laws. And who doubteth, but in a City founded for ever to endure, and increasing still infinitely, there will be brought in new Governments, new Priest-hoods and sacerdotall dignities, new priviledges both of kindreds and private persons? And even this one thing in question, to wit, that the Com. and Nobles might not joyn in marriage, were not the Decemvirs they that first within these few years made that Edict? A most shameful ensample and precedent in a free state, and tending to the manifest wrong of the Commons. Can there be any greater or more notorious injury, than that there should be in a City one part and member, as defiled and polluted, thought unworthy of the bond of marriage? What else is this, but to suffer exile and confining within the same walls, when they debat us that we should not be either allied in affinity or knit in kindred? They provide (forsooth) and take order that blood should not be mixed, nor families confused. How then? If this do pollute this great gentry of yours, which most of you descended from the Sabins and Albans, have not by right line from the Patritians, but by copration and election into the number of the Nobles, as being chosen either by the favour and grace of the Kings, or else by the peoples voyces after the KK. were expelled: could not your wisdoms have kept your blood uncorrupt by some private means and provisi-
- E "on, namely, by taking heed neither to espouse wives from among the Commons, nor to suffer your daughters and sisters to be married to any other than Nobles? No commoner (ye might be sure) would have forced a daughter of any noble house: no, these insolencies of lascivious lust are appropriate to Gentlemen only of the Nobility: none of us would have compelled any of you against his will, to make covenant and contract of matrimony. But I wor, that by an express law it should be forbidden, and that marriage between Nobles and Commons should be condemned, that is it, which to the commonalty is a plain contumely and open injury. And why confer ye not and lay your heads together, that the rich may not marry with poor? That, which at all times and in all places, hath been a matter left unto particular policy and consideration; namely, That into what house soever a woman cast a liking and fancy, there she might
- F "be married: and into what family a man obliged himself by word, promise and covenant, from thence he might take a wife: even that, restrain ye within the bonds of a most proud and tyrannical law: whereby ye might break in sunder all civil society, and of one City make twain. Why forbid ye not by a positive Law, that a commoner should not dwell by a Noble-man, or go the same way that he doth, or frequent the same feast, or converse in the same market or common place of assembly? For in effect what difference is there, if a Gentleman marry a commoners daughter, or a commoner espouse a Gentlewoman? What right I pray you or condition of state is thereby changed? surely the children still take after the father. Neither seek we for any thing else by marching with you, but only this, that we may be reckoned in the number of men and of citizens. Neither is there any cause, why you should so contend and stand upon it (unless it do
- G "you good to cross and take a pleasure to exercise your selves in working us disgrace and shame,) Finally I would gladly know whether the sovereign government of the state resteth in you or in the people of Rome? When the Kings were driven out, got you thereby to your selves Lordly sovereignty, or purchased all men equal liberty? It must needs be granted, that the people of Rome may at their pleasure publish and ordain a law. And will ye then as soon as any law whatsoever, is by them proposed, appoint a muster presently for their punishment? and as soon as I that am Tribun, shall begin to call the wards to give their voyces, shall you that are Consuls by and by swear all the younger sort, press them to warfare, lead them forth unto the field, and
- "menace

"menace the Commons, menace I say, the Tribun also? What? If ye had not twise already good "experience, how little these goodly threats of yours prevailed against the Commons, when they "agreed and stuck together, it were somewhat. Will ye say, that ye forbore to strive, ye rendered
 "our good, and for pity spared us? Nay rather, to say a truth, was not this the cause that no fray
 "was made, For that the stronger side was also the more cool and modester of the twain? Neither
 "(O Quirites) will there now, I warrant you, be any combat, nor blows dealt: they will al"ways assay and sound, what stomacks and hearts ye have, but never will they feel your fits, and "try how keen your swords be. Therefore to these wars (be they falsely pretended, or truly in"deed reported) O ye Consuls, the Commons are ready prest to follow you: provided alwayes,
 "that by granting them liberty of mutual marriage, ye will make at length this City one: that "they may be linked, joynd and united unto you, by private alliance and affinity: that hardy and "valiant men may have hope and possibility, to honors and dignities: that they may be allowed
 "fellowship and society in the Common-weal: Finally, that (which is due unto equal liberty)
 "they may one with another in alternative course, obey annual Magistrates, and be obeyed again "in their turns. If any of you shall gainsay and withstand these conditions, prate still and talk at "your pleasure of wars: multiply and make them as many and as great as ye will: There is not "one shall give his name, nor one shall take arms, nor one shall fight for those proud Lords, with "whom they can have neither fellowship of dignity in the Common-weal, nor alliance of mar"riage in private estate. Now when as the Consuls also were come forth into the open assembly "of the people, and that they fell on all hands from continued and long Orations, to short dispute "and altercation: the Tribun demanded why a commoner might not attain to a Consulship? Unto "whom the Consul returned an answer, as to the substance perhaps truly, so for the present con"tention not very wisely and to the purpose: Namely, because that no commoner had the Au"spices: which was the cause why the Decemvirs ordained distinct marriages, lest upon a doubtful "and mingled issue, there should follow a troubled confusion of the Auspices. But hereat, the "Commons stormed and stamped most of all: that as odious men unto the immortal Gods, they "were flatly denied and deemed unworthy to observe the flight and singing of birds. And never "gave they over their heats of clamorous debate (whiles the Commons had gotten unto them a "most sharp Tribun to set them a work, and were themselves in obstinacy no whit behind him) un-
 "till at length the Nobles were overcome and driven to grant, that the Law as touching marriage "should pass: supposing by that means especially, that the other Tribuns would either clean give
 "over their suit for making commoners Consuls, or at least wise put it off, until the war were ended:
 "and that the Commons in the mean while being well pleased and contented with marriage among
 "the Nobles, would be willing and ready to levy a muster. Cannuleius for this his victory over the "Nobles, and for the favours he gat among the Commons, became a great and mighty man. Where-
 "upon, the other Tribuns were kindled to the like combat: and for the proceeding of their Law "also, indeavoured with all their might and main. And albeit the rumour of the war encreased daily
 "more and more, yet they hinder the levy of souldiers. The Consuls seeing now that no decree
 "and order could pass the Senate-house, by reason that the Tribuns interposed their negative voyce:
 "took counsel together with the chief of the Nobility at home in their private houses. And well
 "they saw that they must yeeld either the victory to their enemies, or the buckler to their own ci"tizens. Of all the Senators that had been Coss, only Valerius and Horatius were not present at "these counsels. C. Claudius his opinion was, That the Consuls should put themselves in arms a"gainst the Tribuns: But the two Quintii, Cincinnatus and Capitolinus, abhorred all bloudshed and "violent proceedings against those, whom by a solemn covenant made with the Commons, they "had received and accepted for to be as sacrosanct and unviolable. But in these counsels they "grew to this point in the end, that they suffered military Tribuns of equal power with the Con"suls, to be created indifferently from out of the Commons and Nobles: provided alwayes, that "as touching creation of the Consuls, there should be no alteration from the old manner afore-
 "time. And herewith were both Tribuns and Commons well satisfied and contented. A general "assembly therefore was proclaimed for the chusing of three Tribuns in Consuls authority, which "being once published: forthwith as many as had spoken or done ought tending to sedition, and "above all others those that had been Tribuns of the people, began in their whited robes to take "hold of men and run to and fro about the common place labouring for this dignity. At the first,
 "the Nobles partly in despair of obtaining the place (seeing the Commons so set a store) partly for
 "disdain and indignation to bear any honourable office joyntly with them of so base condition,
 "were scared and affrighted from standing therefore: at the last (but they were forced thereto
 "first by the heads and the chief Lords of the Senate) they were content to be competitors and sui-
 "ters for the dignity: lest they might seem to be fully excluded forth of the possession of the Com"mon-weal, and leave it entirely for the Commons. The event and effect of this Court, shewed "plainly, that mens minds are otherwise affected in contending about liberty and dignity, than "presently after such contentions laid away, they are in weighing and judging aright without passi"on and affection. For the people satisfied herewith, that there was some account made of the "Commoners, and that they were not shut out, elected military Tribuns all of the Nobles. This "modestly, this equity, this noble mind, where shall a man now adaves find in one person, which "then was to be seen in the whole people? In the three hundredth and tenth year after the City of "Rome was founded, were the first military Tribuns created, that bare office in the room of the Con-

A Consuls, to wit, A. Sempronius Atratinus, L. Atilius, and C. Cecilius: in whose government, concord at home caused also peace abroad. There be writers, who affirm, That upon occasion of the Veientian war, and the rebellion of the Ardeats, because two Consuls were not able to manage so many wars at once, therefore were three military Tribuns chosen: without making any mention of the Law published, concerning election of Consuls of the Commons: and that they were invested both in the jurisdiction, and also in the ornaments of the Consuls. Howbeit, the exercise of that government, stood not fast and sure, nor continued long. For within three months after that they entered, they forewent their office, by a decree of the Augurs, as if there had been some error in their creation. It was alleged that C. Curatius, who was President of that Court of Election, had taken his quarters amiss for the observation of the lucky signs by flight of birds, and not according to the Augurs skill.

B There came from the Ardeats to Rome, Embassadors, complaining of wrong received, in these terms: That if it might be redressed, and amends made, and their grounds restored, they seemed willing to abide still in league and amity. Answer was made them by the Senate, that the judgment of the people, already passed, could not be reversed by the Senate, if it were for nothing else but for concord sake and agreement of the States: besides, they had neither any precedent to lead them thereto, nor Law and authority to warrant them. Marry, if the Ardeats would wait their times, and put to the Senates arbitrement and discretion, the redress and easement of their injury pretended, it would come to pass, that in process of time they should not repent of governing their passions, and bridling their choler: and should well know, that the Nobles had a good regard, that there should no wrong be offered unto their friends, as they were careful, that if any were offered, it should not long continue. Thus the Embassadors, promising, to make a true report, unto their citizens of the matter, wholly as it was: were friendly dismissed, and had their discharge.

C The Senators seeing now the Commonweal, without any sovereign Magistrate of the chair and of State, went together, and made an Interregent: and whiles they strove whether Consuls or Tribuns should be created, the Interregent continued many dayes. The Interregent and the Senate laboured, that there should be an Election of Consuls: the Tribuns on the other side, and their Commonalty, were for the Tribuns Consular. But the Senators prevailed, because both the people seeing they were to confer the one office or the other, upon the Nobles, surceased to strive any more: and also the chief of the Commons, chose rather to have that Election, wherein they should not be once propounded, than wherein they were sure to take the repulse, as unworthy. The Tribuns also gave over to contend any longer to no purpose, and without effect, seeming thereby somewhat to gratify and pleasure the LL. of the Senate. So T. Quintus Barbatus the Interregent, chose for Consuls L. Papirius Mugilanus, and L. Sempronius Atratinus. Whiles these were Consuls, the league with the Ardeats was renewed. And this is the only evidence and proof, that they were Consuls that year, for that neither in the ancient yearly records, nor in the Calendars of the Magistrates, they are found at all. I take it, because the military Tribuns were created in the beginning of that year: and therefore, although these Consuls were in their stead chosen, yet their names were left out, as if the other had remained in office the whole year.

Consuls chosen again.

E Licinius Macer affirmeth, that they are mentioned both in the composition with the Ardeats, and also in the linen books or registers in the Church of Juno Moneta. Albeit there had been so many terrors and bravados, threatened from the borderers, yet both abroad and at home, all was quiet. And whether Tribuns only, or Consuls also chosen in the room of Tribuns governed in this year: certain it is, that the next following, had Consuls M. Geganius Macerinus the second time, and T. Quintus Capitolinus the first time. This was the very year when the Censors office came up first. A thing that rose of a small beginning: which notwithstanding afterwards, increased to that height, that it had government of the manners and discipline of the Romans: and under the jurisdiction thereof, the Senate and Centuries of the order of knights, the distinction of worship and shameful disgrace, were reduced. Likewise, the survey of publick and private Edifices, F yea, and the tributes, revenues and subsidies of the people of Rome were at the disposition, ordering, and discretion of that office. The beginning of which thing arose upon this occasion: For that the people in many years space had not been assessed and numbred, and seeing the Cense could be deferred no longer, nor the Consuls (by reason of wars, from so many nations imminent) had leisure to go about and accomplish that business: the Senate therefore made a motion, that the charge being painful, and not for the Majesty of Consuls to busy themselves in, required a special Magistrate, and a peculiar officer by it self. Under whom should attend the Secretaries and Clerks, who likewise should have the keeping and charge of the rolls and publick records: and at whose discretion should pass the scedoles and instruments of all Assessments. The Senators therefore accepted gladly of this overture, although it were but a trifling matter: yet because there should be the more Magistrates of the Nobility. Supposing (I ween) it would come to passe, as (it proved indeed) that shortly the power and wealth of those, who bare the office, should win more authority and credit unto themselves. Yea, and the Tribuns also made no great ado, but suffered it to pass, being an office (as it was in truth, no other at that time) rather of necessity and attendance, than of show, pomp, or honor: because they would not seem to be cross and peevish in every small matter. When as therefore this dignity was of the principal of the City required, the people by their voices chose to that Office, Papirius and Sempronius, of whose Consulship there was some doubt: to the end, that by that office they might supply and make up the the defect and mis of a Consulship. And of the exercise and function it self; Censors were they H called.

Whiles these things were a doing at Rome, there came Embassadors from Ardea, craving as well in regard of their most ancient amity, as also of the late league renewed, their helping hand for their City, welnigh undone and overthrown. For, peace (which wisely and by right good advise they had kept, and maintained with the people of Rome) they might not enjoy at home, by reason of inward debate and domestical quarrels. The cause and beginning whereof, as it is reported, arose from siding and factions, which have been and will be to most States more pernicious, than for-rain wars, than famine or plague, or other adversities, which men attribute to the anger and wrath of God, as the extremity of all publick calamities whatsoever. There was a maid, a Commoners daughter and no better, by birth, but for her rare beauty of singular note and passing renown: whom two young men were suiters unto. The one of the same condition or estate that the maid was of, and who relied upon her guardians and tutors, who also were of that degree and calling: the other a Gentleman, enamoured on her, only for her beauty. As for him, he had the good wills of the best in the City, by whose means the strife of partaking, entred even into the house of the Damoysel. For the Gentleman in the Mothers judgment, was the more welcome and better liked of, whose desire was, that the maid should be preferred by marriage, and be most worship-fully bestowed. The Guardians also banded themselves, and laboured for their party. But when as the matter might not be ended within doors, it came to suit in Law. And when thereasous and allegations were heard, both of the Mother, and also of the Guardians, the Judges pronounced sentence of marriage to be at the disposition of the Mother. But might prevailed more than right. For the Tutors aforesaid, openly in the market place of the City, having amongst those of their party and faction, complained of that injurious award, with a troupe of men by force, set the maid out of the Mothers house. Against whom arose a stronger power of the gentry, and following the young Gentleman, who was incensed and set on fire upon this injury offered. Whereupon ensued a cruel fray. The Commons being defeated, went forth (far unlike to the Commons of Rome) armed as they were out of the City, and took for their hold a Hill, and invaded the Lands of the Nobles with fire and sword: and having gathered to them a multitude of Artisans and handicrafts men, whom in hope of spoil they had called forth, they purpose and prepare to besiege the City also, which aforetime had been altogether unacquainted with the like storms. In such sort, as no kind of calamity that followeth war, was wanting: as if the poor City had been tainted, infected, and poisoned with the furious madness of two brain-sick young men, seeking a woful and deadly marriage, with the utter ruin and destruction of their native Country. And neither part thought it enough to war and fight at home among themselves. For the Nobles solicited the Romans for to rescue their besieged City: the Commons stirred up the Volscians, to help to force and sack the City. The Volscians under the conduct of Equus Cluilius came first to Ardea, and against the walls of their enemies, raised a countermure, and cast a trench, and blocked the Town round about. Which tidings being brought to Rome, forthwith M. Geganinus Consul, went forth with an army, and incamped himself three miles from the enemies: and the day being now far spent and drawing toward night, he commandeth his souldiers to refresh and make much of themselves, and take their rest: and afterwards at the relief of the fourth watch, he brought forth his ensigns, set his men to work, and sped his business once begun, so that by the sun rising, the Volscians might see themselves invested more streightly by the Romans, then the City beleaguered by them. And on another side the Consul had joyned a sconce to the wall of Ardea, by which way his souldiers might go and come in safety. The Captain of the Volscians, who had to that day prepared no victuals, but sustained his army only with the corn which he had for the present from day to day robbed by foraging the Country, seeing himself intrenched, and of a sudden to be destitute of all things, called the Consul forth to emparle, saying, That if the Romans coming was to raise the siege, he would remove and dislodge from thence. To which again the Consul made this reply, That vanquished men were to take, and not to make Articles of Conditions: neither should they, as they were come at their pleasure to assault the allies of the Romans, so depart again when they list to Volsai. He commandeth therefore to yeeld their General, to lay down their weapons, confessing themselves overcome, and to be at his devotion. Otherwise he would be a bitter and mortal enemy unto them, whether they departed or tarried still, and carry home to Rome the victory of the Volscians, rather than their faithless peace. The Volscians, when they had assayed that small hope they had in their weapons (for all hope else was cut off) besides all other things that were cross unto them, encountred in a place of great disadvantage for fight, but worse for flight: and seeing themselves on every side beaten down and slain, turned from fighting to intreating, delivered up their Captain, yeelded their weapons, were driven under the Gallows, and in their single doublet and hose with great shame and calamity, were let go and sent away. And sitting them down to rest themselves, not far from the Town Tusculum, the Tusculans upon an old grudge and hatred against them for upon them thus dismissed and naked as they were at unawares, and were suspect with them, that secretly there remained any one to carry news of their ill day and unfortunate overthrow. Then the Roman Cpl. appeased the troubles at Ardea: beheaded the chief Captains of that combination, and confiscated their goods to the common cheft and Chamber of the Ardians. And so by this great favour and benefit of the people of Rome, they suppleed the injury of the former arbitrement was done away and recompensed. But yet

At the Senat of Rome, thought somewhat behind still for the cancelling of the memorial of publick avarice. The Consul returned, triumphing into the City, leading Clulius the Captain of the Volscians before his chariot, with the spoil born afore him of the enemies, whom he had disarmed, and brought under the yoke. Quintus the Consul again for his part, in his long robe and gown of peace, countervailed (a thing not usually seen) the glory of his Collegue in his bright armor, who had so great regard at home to entertain concord and peace among the Citizens, by ministering justice indifferently, as well to the highest as to the lowest, that the Senators reputed him a severe Consul, and the Commons accounted him as meek and gentle a person. And more he won at the Tribuns hands by countenance and reputation, than by contention and debate. His five Consulships wherein he carried himself after one and the self same manner and order, the course of his whole life, ever Consul-like, caused his person to be in a manner more revered than his honourable place. By this means, while these were Consuls, no words were made of military Tribuns. Then created they for Consuls M. Fabius Vibulanus, and Posthumius Eburnus Cornelianus. These Consuls, by how much greater and more glorious the acts both at home and abroad, were achieved by those, whom they saw they were to succeed (and surely that year was right memorable among the borderers, as well allies as enemies, and namely, because the Ardeats in so hard distress, were by them succoured so much the more earnestly endeavoured for their part, to raze out of mens minds the infamy of that judgement afore said, and made an Act and Decree of the Senat in this form, That for as much as the City of the Ardeats, by reason of Civil troubles, was dispeopled and brought to a small number of Citizens, there should be enrolled certain inhabitants to beset the City for a Garrison, and defence against the Volscians. This was openly ingrossed in publick Tables, and Instruments, for a policy, that their secret intent and purpose of reverting and disannulling the arbitrement, might not be perceived by the Tribuns and the Commons. But they closely complotted, that when they had enrolled a far greater number of Rutilians than of Romans, for to inhabit Ardea, neither should any other lands be divided, but those which by that infamous and dishonest award were intercepted: nor that one foot or clod of ground should be assigned to any other Roman, before the whole lands were parted among all the Rutilians. Thus the domain that had been in question, returned again to the Ardeats. The Triumvirs for the conveying of a Colony to Ardea, were created these, Agrippa Maenius, T. Cladius Siculus, and M. Eburnus Helus. Who, besides that, they offended the Commons by their ready service and nothing popular, in regard, that they assigned and set out to their allies, that land which the people of Rome judged their own, were not well thought of neither, by the chief of the Nobility: because in the execution of their charge, they did nothing of affection, and for favour. Howbeit they avoided all troubles and dangers that were toward them (albeit they were accused by the Tribuns before the people.) For when they had registered and placed the Coloners, they remained still themselves in the same Colony, which they had as witnesses of their innocency, and just dealing.

In this year, and the year following, when Caius Furius Pacilius and Marcus Papirius Crassus were Consuls, there was peace at home and abroad. The plays which had been vowed by the Decemvirs, according to the Senats decree, during the time of the Commons insurrection and departure from the Nobles, were this year set forth. Petilius sought for some occasion of sedition, but in vain. Who being made Tribun the second time, albeit he harped still upon one string, and threatened the self same things that he had before, yet he could not bring about, that the Consuls should propose unto the Senat, concerning the division of lands among the Commons: and when as with great ado he had obtained thus much, that the Senators should be moved and their opinions asked, whether they would have an election of Consuls or Tribuns (Consular:) determined it was at length, that Consuls should be chosen. So, that the menaces of the Tribun, that he would hinder the muster, was a ridiculous matter of game: seeing that when the borderers were at quiet, there was no need either of war, or preparation for war. After this great quietness of the State, followeth a year (wherein Proculus Geganius Macerinus, and L. Menenius Lanatus were Consuls) for sundry calamities and perils memorable: namely, Seditions, Famine, and hazard of receiving upon their necks the yoke of Kings rule again and that, by the sweetness of a Largess. There wanted only forraign war: wherewith if the Common-weal had been afflicted too, hardly could the help of all the gods above, have recovered the State. These calamities began with hunger. But whether it were, for that the year was unseasonable for corn, or that they were so in love with the plausible and seditious Orations, and of the City it self, that they slighted and neglected the Tillage of their ground, it is uncertain. For both the one and the other is reported. The Lords of the Senat blamed the idleness of the Commons: and the Tribuns of the Commons laid the weight, one while upon the fraud and naughtiness, another while upon the negligence and remissness of the Consuls. At the last the commoners enforced and drave the people (but not against the will of the Senat) to chuse L. Minucius Master of the provision or principal purveyor of corn and victuals: a man who in that office proved more lucky to preserve the liberty of the City, then happy in the exercise or ministry of his charge: albeit at the latter end, he deserved and had, both praise and thanks, for bringing down the price of Corn. Who, notwithstanding many Embassages sent both by sea and land to the neighbor nations round about, and all to little purpose (but that out of Hetruria there was brought some little sprinkling of Corn) nothing eased and mended the Market: and therefore he turned again to the dispensing or dealing the present dearth indifferently.

indifferently among all, by forcing every man to confesse what corn he had, to open his graners, to bring it forth, to vent and sell that, which he had more then would serve a month. But where by this practise, and by defrauding servants a portion of their daily food, and by securing the corn-mungers and exposing them to the furious ire of the people, he had with all his hard courses and sharp inquisitions rather laid open then eased the present need and necessity: many of the common people despairing of all hope, rather then they would live thus miserably constrained, pining and wearing away in hunger, covered their heads, and threw themselves headlong into Tyber. Then Sp. Melius, by calling a Knight or Gentleman of Rome, a man (as in those days) exceeding rich, enterprised a thing, commodious I must needs say, but a dishonest precedent of dangerous consequences, and proceeding of a worse mind and intent of his. For having with his own money bought up the corn out of Britannia by the means of his friends and vassals, whose ministry he used: which thing (I believe verily) was an hindrance that all the publick care and providence, took small effect, and nothing helped the general want and scarcity, he devised to bring up a free dole and distribution of corn: and to the end that when he had once by this benefit and liberality won the hearts of the Commons, then he might, what way soever he went, carrying a port and majesty with him above the degree of a private person, draw after him a train of the people, promising him by their favour of support, undoubted and assured hope of a Consulship. But himself (as mans nature is unsatiable) not content herewith, aspired to higher matters: then fortune promised him, and those unlawful, and beyond his reach. And for as much as even the very Consulship was to be wrested from the Nobles against their wills, he plotted to make himself King, and thought that, the only guerdon due for so deep reaches and designs, and worthy that great contention and strife which he was to abide with much toil and sweat of brows. Now drew the Election on apace for Consuls, which thing prevented him afore he had brought his devices to full ripeness and perfection. Consul was created L. Quintius Capitolinus the sixth time, a man most unfit for his turn, that should go about innovations and to change the state: and with him was joined Agrippa Menenius, surnamed Lanarius. And L. Minutius, was either made again the master victualler, or else created he was at first without limitation of time, to continue so long as the case should require. For there is no certainty thereof, but only the name of Corn-master, recorded both years in the linnen Books or Registers among other Magistrates. This Minutius was vigilant, and as careful for the Common-weal, as Melius for his private wealth: and upon occasion that men of the same quality, to wit, the Commons, were conversant in both houses, namely, in his own and in the house of Melius, he came to the knowledge by their means, of Melius his treason: and declared unto the Senat the whole complott. Namely, That there was armor and weapons good store, carried into the house of Melius: that he kept conventicles there, and made seditious Orations, and that it was past all peradventure that he practised to be King. As for the time of working the feat and to put it into action, as yet it was not determined and certainly known: all other things were already agreed upon. Item, that the Tribuns were bribed and hired to sell and betray the liberty of the City: That to certain Captains of the multitude divers charges were appointed. And herewithal, he excused himself (and said) That because he would not be reputed the author of any uncertain or vain intelligence, he uttered these matters somewhat M with the latest, and later well-neer, then might stand with the common safety of the Weal-publick. Which news after they were heard, and that on every side the chief Senators had given both the Coss. of the former year a check, for that they had suffered those Largesses of corn, and tolerated meetings of the Commons in a private house: and rebuked the new Consuls also, for that they had stayed so long and waited till a matter of so great importance was by the corn-master detected and declared unto the Senate, which required a Cos. to be not only the informer, but also the reformer: Then T. Quintius answered, That the Consuls were blamed without just cause, who being bridled with the laws of appealing, tending to the great prejudice and dissanulling of their sovereign government, had not commission sufficient by vertue of their place, to punish the thing according to the hainousnesse and quality thereof, as they had courage and heart thereto: N and that there was need now, not only of a valiant and stout man, but also of one that was freed from all bonds of laws and tied to none. And therefore he would name L. Quintius for Dictator: in whom there was courage answerable to that absolute authority. When all men liked wel therof, Quintius himself at the first refused: demanding what they meant, to object and expose him, an unwieldy man & so fast slept in years, to so great trouble, and manifest danger. Afterwards, when as they replied on all hands, and alledged how in that heart of his for all his age there was more valour, and in his head more policy, then in all men besides: heaping on him right due and deserved praises, and commendations: and whiles the Consul also importuned him still and gave not over: then Cincinnatus, after he had prayed to the gods immortal, that his decrepit old age in so fearful a case, might not turn either to the losse or dishonor of the Common-wealth, was by the Consul pronounced Dictator. And he forthwith nominated C. Servilius Hala General of the horsemen. The morrow after, when he had set and disposed certain guards, in divers places of the City, and was come down into the common place: the common people wondring at the strangenesse of the matter, had their eyes upon him: and the adherents and complices of Melius, and he himself their Captain, saw well that the force and power of this so great a magistrate was bent against them. But they that were not acquainted with those plots and designs that tended to the setting up of a King, asked one another, what tumult or sudden war, should require either a Dictators

A Dictators majesty, or that Quintius such fourscore years of age, should be the only Ruler of the City. With that, Servilius the General of the horsemen was by the Dictator sent to Melius. Who said unto him, The Dictator callth thee. Whereat he being afraid, asked again, What he would? and Servilius said, That he was to make his answer and purgation, of a crime that Minutius had informed against him, before the Senat. Then Melius began to retire himselfe back into the throng of his followers, and looking about at the first, thrunk only away from him, and refused to obey. At the last the Apparitor at the general of the horsemen's commandment, began to force him to go with him: but he being rescued by the standers by, found his feet and began to fly, and besought the aid of the Com-mony of Rome: saying, That the faction of the Nobles conspired his overthrow, and persecuted him for the good he had done unto the Commons, and for his liberality be-stowed upon them: beseeching them to help him in that extremity, and not to suffer him to be murdered afore their face and in their very sight. As he spake these words, Hi-la, Servilius overtook him, and killed him on the right hand being sprinkled with his blood thus slain, and guarded with a company of tall Gentlemen of the Nobility, he brought word to the Dictator, how Melius being cited to shew unto him, put back the Appari-tor, and raised the multitude, and now had suffered the punishments for his defects. Then (quoth the Dictator) On forth in this valor and yetts of thine. O C. Servilius, thou des-ervest great praise, and hast delivered the Common-wealth this day from tyranny: but then as the multitude murmured and made a din upon some doubt, what they should thinke of the fact, and what might be the occasion thereof: he commanded them to assemble together, and openly avowed the deed, and pronounced that Melius was justly Min-ya, albeit he had been clear from seeking to be King: for that being summoned and con-vented before the Dictator, and that by the General of the horsemen, he refused and gave not, for my selfe (quoth he) was set judicially to examine and enquire of the cause: and upon the trial thereof, Melius should have sped no worse then his cause deserved: but because he went about by violence to withdraw himself from judgment, by violence therefore was he restrained. Neither was he to be proceeded against as a Citizen, who being born in a free state, where justice and law were in force: and in that City, where-D out, he was not ignorant that the KK were sometimes expelled: and where in one and the same year, Collatinus sisters sons, and the sons of that Cos, that was deliverer of his Country, detected of a complor and conspiracy of receiving again into the City the KK blood, were by their own father beheaded: out of which City Publius Collatinus Cos, for the detestation only of the name, being commanded to give up his office, suffered exile: in which City, many years after Sp. Cassius for practising and plotting only to be King, suffered condigne punishment: wherein also of late time, the Decemvirs, for a tyrannical pride, where deprived of their goods, banished their country, and bereft of their lives. That in the same City (I say) Sp. Melius should conceive any hope of reaching to a Kingdom? And a man (I pray you) of what quality and condition? And yet, no gentility of birth, no dignities nor defects were sufficient to make way to any E for lordly rule and tyranny. Howbeit, the Claudii and Cassii, by reason of the Consul-ships, and Decemvirships of their own, by reason of the honourable estate and reputati-on of their ancestors, and the worship and glory of their lineage, took upon them, be-came hangry and proud, and aspired to that, whereunto Sp. Melius had no such means to induce him: who might have set him down well enough, and rather wished and prayed to God, then hoped once for so much, as a Tribuneship of the Commons. And supposed he, being but a rich corn-masser, that with a quart (or measure of corn of two pounds) he had bought the freedom of his fellow Citizens? or thought he by ca-sting morsels of bread and victuals afore the common sort, that the victorious people, conquerors of all nations about them, might be allured into thraldom? and whom the City could hardly brook to be a Senator, him they should endure their King, to have the regal ensigns, and the government of Romulus, the first founder of the City, de-scended first from the gods, and to them ascended up again: why, it was a thing not so wicked as monstrous. Neither was this act sufficiently satisfied for, with the shedding of his blood, unless the house and walls, within which so horrible madness was conceived and forged, were cast down and razed: and unless these goods, which were tainted and infected with the prices and hire that should have purchased the Kingdom, were forfeit and confiscate. He commanded therefore the Questors, to sell those goods, and to bring the money into the common Treasury. And then he caused forthwith his dwell-ing house to be overthrown and made even with the ground, that the plot or floor thereof, might be a monument of a wicked attempt, smothered and stifled in the very hope and hatching thereof. This is the place which was called afterwards Aequilium. As for L. Minutius he had an Ox with gilded horns given him for an honour and reward without the gate Trigemina. The Commons therewith were not miscontented, for that to them he divided Melius his corn, at the price of one As a Modius. Among some authors

I find, that this Minutius forsook the Nobles and went to the Commons, and was taken in to be the eleventh Tribun of the Commons, and appeased the mutiny that arose upon Melius his death. But it was not like that the Senators suffered the number of the Tribuns to be increased: and especially, that such an example should be given and taken up by a man of their coat: or that the commonalty would not keep it still, if it had been once allowed; or at leastwise attempt it again. But above all, this consuteth and reproveth the false tide of Tribune set upon his image, for that a few years before, it was by a statute expressly provided, That Tribuns might not chuse and take unto them a Colleague in office. Q. Cecilius, and Q. Junius, and Sextus Titinius were the only men of all the Colledge of Tribuns that propounded not the Law for the honour of Minutius: but rather accused unto the Commons, both Minutius and Servilius, and ceased not to make complaint of the cruel and unworthy death of Melius: and in fine prevailed so much, that there should be an election for military Tribuns rather then for Consuls: nothing doubting, but if he were chosen (for so many at that time might be created) some of the Commons also, by promising to revenge the death of Melius, might step in and be elected. The Commons for all they were tossed that year with many and sundry troubles, chose no more then three Tribuns with Consuls authority: and among them, L. Quinctius the son of Cincinnatus: Upon the hard conceit and hatred of whose Dictatorship past, they thought to pick some occasion of quarrel and tumult: and Mamercus Emilius, a man of great credit and reputation, was by voices preferred afore Quintius, and obtained the first place. And L. Julius they created for the third.

bassadors.

Whiles these bare sovereign rule, Fidene the Colony of the Romans, revolted to Lars Tullinius, the King of the Veientians, and to the State of the Veientians. And besides their revolting, a more horrible fact they committed: For at the commandment of Tullinius, they slew C. Fulcinius, and C. Julius, Sp. Nautius, and L. Roscius the Roman Embassadors, who came to demand the cause of this their change and sudden alteration. Some here do excuse and elevate the act of the King, saying that upon a lucky cast of dice he uttered a doubtful speech, which was by the Fidenatians taken, as though he seemed to bid the Embassadors to be killed; and that (forsooth) was the occasion of murdering the Embassadors (a thing incredible, that at the coming in of the Fidenatians, his new allies, who were to consult with him and ask his advice, about a murder that should break the law of Nations, his mind should not be turned away from earnest studying about his game) and so this hainous fact proveth to be but an error. More credible it is, that he had a further meaning and deeper reach: namely, that the people of the Fidenatians should be bound unto him, and only rely upon him; being attaint with the guiltlesse of so foul a murder, and not to look and hope for any mercy or favour at the Romans hands. The statues of these Embassadors which were at Fidene murdered, were set up openly at the charges of the City in the Rostre. [A publick crosse (as it were) or pulpit in Rome, one of which the Magistrates made Orations to the people, beautified with the beak heads of ships and their brazen pikes called Rostre.] Thus was there like to be a cruel conflict with the Veientians, and Fidenates. Who besides that they were people confining on their frontiers, had also in the beginning of their war given so wicked and horrible a cause of quarrel. Therefore when as the common people and their Tribuns, in regard of the care for the publick State, were at quiet; there was no question, but that M. Geganius Mucrinus the third time, and L. Servilius Fidenus (named (I suppose) so, upon the war which afterwards under his conduct was fought) should be created Consuls. For this man first encountered with the King of the Veientians on this side Anio, and gat the victory: but not without much bloodshed of the Romans. So that the grief was greater for the loss of his own souldiers, then the joy for the discomfiture of his enemies. And the Senate, as in all fearful times and dangerous occurrents, ordained Mamercus Emilius to be created Dictator. Who, out of the brotherhood of Tribuns military in Consuls authority, the year before, named for the General of his horsemen, L. Quinctius Cincinnatus, who had been a Tribun with him, a toward young Gentleman; and a worthy son of so worthy a father. To those souldiers that were by the Consul mustered and levied, were the old Centurions, experienced and skilful warriors, adjoined: and the number of those, which in that last battel were slain, was supplied. The Dictator commanded to follow him as Lieutenants, Quintius Capitolinus, and M. Fabius Vibulanus. This greater power and authority, and the man likewise nothing thereto inferior, drave the enemies out of the Roman ground, and set them farther off, even beyond Anio. Who removing their camp still backward, seized upon the hills between Fidene and Anio: neither durst they come down from thence into the open plains, before that the Legions of the Falisci came to succour. Then at length, the Tulcians encamped themselves under the walls of Fidene. And the Roman Dictator likewise rested and abode upon the banks of the Confluent (where both rivers run into one) and flanked himself thereby. And when he had cast up a trench and rampart afront, reaching across from the one river to the other, the morrow after he brought his power forth, and set them in order of battel. The enemies

A mies were of sundry minds. The Faliscians, who hardly could away long with military service farre from home, and trusting withal in their own selves, that they were good enough, required battel. The Veientians and Fidenates had more hope in drawing out the war on length. Tolumnius, albeit the advice of his own men liked him better, yet because the Faliscians should not endure lingring warfare, sendeth a trumpet, and proclameth battel against the morrow. The Dictator and the Romans, for that the enemies for the present shifted off fight, took more heart unto them: and on the next morning, when as now the souldiers gave out brave words, and menaced, That unlesse they might have battel, they would assault both the Camp and the Town: the armies of both parts came forth into the midst of the plain, between the two Camps. The Veientians, as being more in number and having to spare, sent covertly out certain companies to fetch a compass behind the Hills, who in the time of the conflict should set upon the Roman Camp. And in this order stood the main Army of three Nations together embattelled. The Veientians kept the right point, the Faliscians the left, and the Fidenates the middle of the battel. The Dictator in the right point advanced his standard against the Faliscians, and on the left Capitellinus Quintius charged the Veientians: and against the main battel between both, marched the Coronel of the Cavalry, with his Cornets of horse. Thus as they stood arranged in battel array, for a pretty while was there silence on either side, and all quiet. For neither would the Tuscans begin first, unlesse they were urged: And the Dictator looked ever and anon backward toward the Capitol of Rome, that the Augurs should set up a signal aloft (as it was agreed between them) so soon as the flight of fowls gave approbation accordingly: which he no sooner espied, but he put out presently the men of arms, with a great shout against the enemies. The army of the footmen followed hard after in the tail, and seconded them with a lusty charge. But on no hand were the Tuscan legions able to abide the force of the Romans. The Cavalry stood hardest to it, and made head still. For the King himselfe, the best horseman and most valiant of them all, when as on every side his enemies charged and pressed sore upon him, rode airon them, held out and maintained fight. There chanced then to be among the Roman horsemen, a Tribune or Marshal, one A. Cornelius Cossus, a goodly tall man of body, and as valiant and strong withal, who set before his eyes the noble house from whence he was descended, and carried this mind, as it was right honourable already by his ancestors left him, so to recommend the same to his posterity more glorious and renowned. This man seeing the troops of Romans waving to and fro, for fear of the violence of Tolumnius, which way soever he bent and turned; and knowing him by his rich and royal furniture, wherein he bare himself like a brave Knight, riding all over the battel. "Is this (quoth he) the forsworn breaker of humane league, is this he that hath violated the laws of arms, and of nations? Now will I presently, if it be Gods will that any thing in the world should remain wholly and inviolate, be his Priest, I will sacrifice and betake him to the ghosts of our Embassadors deceased. Herewith, setting spurs to his horse, with bent spear in rest, he rode full against that one enemy, singled from the rest: smote him, and dismounted him from his horse. Then bearing upon his staff, alight presently on foot, and as the King was getting up again, he overthrew him backward with the bofs of his target, and laid him stretching long & after many wounds given him, at length fastned him with his spear to the very ground. And when as he was once dead, he disarmed and dispoiled him, and struck off his head: and carrying it aloft on his lance, presented a fearful spectacle to the enemies of their King slain, and so discomfited them. Thus was the strength of the horsemen defeated also, which only had made the battel doubtful. The Dictator having put likewise the legions of footmen to flight, pursued them still, and drave them to their fort, killing them all the way in the chase. Many of the Fidenates which knew the coasts of the Country, fled into the mountains, and escaped. Cossus with his horsemen passed over Tyber, and brought home into the City a great booty out of the country of the Veientians. As this battel was in fighting, there was a skirmish also in the Roman camp, with that part of the forces, which (as it is aforesaid) was sent by Tolumnius to surprise it. Fabius Pibullanus first defended the rampart, ordering his men all within, in compass like a garland: and while the enemies were wholly bent about the assault, he with the Triarii or souldiers of the rereward, suddenly issued forth at the gate, called Principalis, on the right hand, and gave an hot charge upon them: Upon which they were affrighted, but there ensued the less slaughter, because the number was smaller. Howbeit, they fled no lesse in disarray, than those in the very battel. Thus the Dictator having prosperous success every where, returned with triumph into the City, by the decree of the Senat, and grant of the people. In which triumphs the greatest shew and goodliest sight of all, was Cossus, bearing the rich & royal spoils of the King, slain by his own hand. For of him the souldiers chanted divers rude ballads without rime and metre, comparing him in their songs with Romulus. Which spoils with a solemn manner of dedication he bestowed and hung up in the Temple of Jupiter Feretrius, neer unto those of Romulus, which were the first and only spoils, until that time, called Opima Spolia. And as he went he withdrew from the Dictators chariot, the eyes of all the people unto himselfe, and hee in manner alone, carried away the magnificence and glory of that festiual day. The Dictator by order from the people, presented in the Capitol for the honour of Jupiter, a golden Crown, weighing one * pound weight, raised out of the common money of the City.

Thus have I set down (as following all other writers before me) that Aulus Cornelius Cossus, a Colonel or Marshal, brought into the Temple of Jupiter Feretrius, the second royal spoils. Howbeit, over and besides, that those spoils onely are by right accounted Opima, or royal, which a General hath taken from a General, and we acknowledge none I for General, but him under whose conduct an high Commission a war is managed, the very title also written upon the spoils, doth check and reprove both them and me. The words whereof are these, [That Cossus being Consul, won those spoils.] When I once heard say, that Augustus Caesar himself, the founder or repairer of all Temples, entred into the house of Jupiter Feretrius, which he re-edified, being by injury of long time fallen to decay, and read it so written in a linnen Jack or Curaze: I thought it little better then sacriledge, to discredit and cancel the testimony of Cossus himself concerning his own spoils, and of Augustus Caesar, the benefactor of that very Temple. Which error, if it grow hereon, That so ancient Records and Chronicles, and that the Books of the Magistrates, which being of linnen, and laid up in the Temple of Moneta, Macer Licinius doth very often quote and K cite as his Authors, do represent unto us Aulus Cornelius Cossus, the seventh year after Consul, with Titus Quintius Pennus: let every man abound in his own sense, and have his opinion by himself freely. For more then all this may be alledged to prove, that so famous a battel could not be transferred to that year: because that for three years space about the Consulship of Cossus, there was no war at all, in a manner, by reason of pestilence and dearth of corn: so as some records, as it were, mourning, and bewraying the calamity of the time, deliver unto us nothing but the bare names of the Consuls. In the third year, after that Cossus was Consul, he was military Tribun in Consuls authority, and in the same year General of the horsemen also: in which government he fought another notable battel with horsemen. But hereof a man may conjecture and guesse what he will. L But (as I think) we may tols these things of small importance to and fro, according to every mans opinion: and when all is done, the author of this battel his own selfe, having set up these fresh and new spoils in a holy place, in the sight of Jupiter himselfe standing thereby, to whom they were vowed, and Romulus also, two witnesses, not to bee despised nor abused with a false title, hath written himself, [A. Cornelius Cossus Consul.]

When Marcus Cornelius Maluginensis and Papyrius Crassus were Consuls, the Armies were led forth: the one into the Veientians Country, and the other into the Faliscians, and booties both of people and cattel were from thence driven and carried away. As for the enemies themselves, no where in the Country were they to be seen, nor any battel was M fought: and yet for all that, the towns were not assaulted, because the people at home died of the pestilence. And within the City, Sp. Melius Tribune of the Commons sought occasions and pretences to move seditions, but without effect. Who supposing by the popular favour of his name to prevaile and raise some mutiny, both arrested Minutius to make his answer, and also put up a bill for the confiscation of the goods of Servilius Hala: laying hard to Minutius his charge, that Melius was falsely accused and circumvented by him: and burdening Servilius with the murdering of a Citizen uncondemned. All these surmises were with the people of less credit and importance, than the author himselfe. But the violence of the sickness still encreasing more and more, troubled them: besides the fearful and strange prodigious tokens: but especially, the fresh news that divers houses in the N Country were by many earthquakes cast down. Whereupon the people went in solemn procession and made their supplications, whiles the Duumvir going afore pronounced the prayers, and the people said after him word for word. But the year following, when C. Julius the second time, and L. Virginus were Consuls, was more contagious by reason of the plague, and caused both in Town and Country, so great a fear of utter desolation, that not only there were none set forth in any roads without the territory of Rome to raise booties, whiles the Nobility and Commons had no mind of making war: but the Fidenates also of their own accord, who before time had kept themselves either within their Towns, or Mountains, or Fortresses, entred now into the lands about Rome, and foraged all the Country. After this, having gotten also unto them a power of the Veientians (for the Faliscians could not be induced either by the calamity of the Romans, or prayers of their confederates, to take arms again) these two Nations passed over Anio, and not far from the gate Collina displayed their ensigns. So the fear was no less within the City than in the Country. Then Julius the Consul bringeth the forces abroad, and placeth them upon the rampart and the

A the walls: whiles Virginius assembled the Senate in the Temple of Quirinus, for to ask their opinion. Where agreed it was, to create for Dictator, A. Servilius, surnamed (as some say) Priscus, or as other, Strictus. Virginius making no longer stay than until he had consulted with his Colleague, by his permission declared the Dictator in the night season. And he nominated for his General of the Cavalry, Posthumus Ebutius Helus. The Dictator commanded every man to be ready without the gate Collina, by the break of day: and so many as were able to bear arms were in a readinesse. The Standards and Ensigns were taken forth of the treasury or chamber of the City and brought to the Dictator. Whiles these things were in doing, the enemies were retired and withdrawn to the higher grounds and places of advantage: and thither marched the Dictator with his army in order of battle. And encountering with them not far from Nomentum, he discomfited the legions of the Tuscans, and drave them into the town of Fidene, and cast a trench about it. But neither could the town be scaled for the high site thereof and the strong walls about it: and to lay siege unto it might not avail: for that they had corn not only to suffice the ordinary need of men besieged, but also plenty to spare, of their old store and provision gathered aforehand. Thus the Dictator being without all hope both of winning it by assault, and also of forcing them to yeeld by composition, purposed in certain places for the neernesse to him well known, at the backside of the City which was slenderly guarded, most neglected, and for the natural situation the surest, to undermin unto the Castle. And he himself in places farthest off from thence, approached close under the walls, with his army divided into four parts, to succeed one another by turns in order: and so, by continual skirmishing day and night, he kept the enemies at a bay and withdrew them from all perceiving and intelligence of the work under ground: until such time as by digging through the hill from the Camp, there was a way and passage made straight up into the Castle. And when as the Tuscans were wholly amuled upon the vain threatnings, and bravado's of their enemies before them, nothing minding the present danger wherein they stood: behold, the alarm of their enemies even over their heads, made an out-cry, that the town was taken. In this year Cn. Furius Pacilius and M. Geganius Macerinus, Censors, appointed and dedicated the Large Hall, named Villa Publica in Mars field: and there first by them was held the Seffing and numbring of the people. I find in Macer Licinius, that in the year following, the same Consuls were made again, namely, Julius the third time, and Virginius the second time. But Valerius Antias and Q. Tuberus, do name M. Manlius and Q. Sulpitius for the Consuls that year. Howbeit in so different report, both Tuberus and Macer professe that they followed the linnen Records: and neither of them both conceal, that which the ancient writers have set down, namely, That the same year were Tribuns military, in Consuls authority. Lacinius without doubt is addicted to those linnen Registers, and Tuberus is uncertain of the truth. But among other antiquities, not known by reason of long time, this also is left in doubt and not cleared.

Fidene won by a Stratagem.

Villa Publica.

After the winning of Fidene, great was the fear in Hebrunia: whilest not only the Veientians were scared, fearing the like destruction: but the Falisci also, remembering the war began first with them, albeit they were not assistant in their rebellion. When as therefore these two States had sent their Embassadours abroad to the twelve Cities about them, and obtained a Diet or General Parliament of all Hebrunia should be assembled at the Temple of Votumna: the Senat, as if some great troubles were likethereof presently to ensue, thought good that Mamercus Emplius, should be created Dictator the second time. By whom, A. Posthumus Tuberus was named General of the horfemen. And with so much greater endeavor made they preparation of arms than in the last war afore, by how much more danger there was from all Hebrunia banded together, than had been from two nations combined and no more. But this business was much more quiet than all men looked for. When as therefore news came by Merchants, that the Veientians were starly denied help, and bidden to end that war by their own means and forces, which they had begun on their own heads: nor seek to embark them in the association of their misery and adversity, unto whom they had not imparted their mind & hope in their upright state, and when they were in their height: then the Dictator, to the end he should not seem to be created in vain, seeing all matter of acquiring renown by war was cut off, desirous yet in time of peace, to doe some notable piece of work for a monument, setteth in hand to abate and diminish the Censorship: either supposing it to be too high an office, or else offended not so much with the greatnesse of the honour, as with the continuance and length thereof. Having therefore assembled all the people together: For as much as the immortal Gods (quoth he) have undertaken to govern the Common Weale abroad, and performed all safe and sure: I for my part concerning that which is to be done at home within the walls, will take order and provide for the freedom of the people of Rome. The greatest preservation, and defence whereof resteth in this, when offices of great command are not long enduring: but when they be limited by term of time which may not be restrained or gaged in jurisdiction. Tribuns Military in Consuls room, chosen again.

"for other magistracies they are from year to year: but this of the Censors continuing five years, is very heavy and grievous. And hard it is for men to live so many years, even a great part of their life, in danger of the same Rulers still. Minded therefore I am, to propose a law, That the Censorship continue no longer than one year and six months. With great applause and consent of the people, the next day after, he both published the law and enacted it. And now that ye may (quoth he) O Quirites, know in very deed, how I mislike of these long lasting offices, here presently I render up my Dictatorship. Thus having given over his own place, set a limitation to the rule of others, and absolutely ended one, with exceeding congratulation and favour of the people he was brought home to his house. The Censors taking it grievously that Mamercus had abridged an office of the people of Rome, displaced him from his own Tribe, laying on him an eightfold tax in the subsidy Book, disfranchised and disabled him from giving his voice, and made him no better then a Tributary. Which disgrace (they say) he took with a noble stomach, looking rather to the cause of this shameful note, than to the ignominy it self. Moreover, the Lords of the Senate, albeit they were willing enough that the Censorship nails should be pared and their power taken down, were offended yet, with this example of the rigour and severity of those in place: for as much as they all saw plainly, that they should be both longer time and oftner under Censors, then Censors themselves. But so great an indignation of the people (by report) grew hereof, that by the authority of no man but of Mamercus himselfe, could they be restrained from offering violence to the very persons of the Censors. And the Tribuns of the Commons, with their continual Orations and Remonstrances, prohibited the Election of Consuls. When as the matter was well near brought to the point of an Inter-reign, they obtained at length with much strife and contention, that there should be military Tribuns chosen, with Consular authority. But reward of this their victory, whereat they shot, could they get none: namely, that a Commoner might be chosen for one. They were all of the Nobility that were created, to wit, M. Fabius Vibulanus, M. Folius, and L. Sergius Fidenas.

The plague that year was the occasion of quietness from all other troubles. A Temple then was vowed to Apollo for the health of the people. Howbeit, great loſs was there both in town and country, by the the mortality of men and murrain of cattel, one with another indifferently. And fearing lest the husbandmen of the country should be famished, they sent for corn into Hetruria and the country of Pomptinum, to Cumes, and at last even into Sicily. And not a word all this while about the election of Consuls. So there were military Tribuns elected, with Consuls authority, all again of the Patritii, namely, L. Pinarius Mamercus, L. Furius Medullinus, and Sp. Posthumius Albus. That year the violence of the sickness abated: neither was there any danger or fear of scarcity of Corn, because they had made provision aforehand. Great sitting and consultation there was in the general Diets of the Volscians and Æquians, and in Hetruria at the aforesaid Temple of Votumnia about making war. There, the matter was put off for one whole year: and by an Act or Decree it was provided, that no Assembly or Parliament during that time should be held: notwithstanding the M people of the Veientians complained but all in vaine, that the same fortune was like to happen unto Vei, which had fallen already upon Fidene, even the utter subversion of the State. In this mean season, at Rome the chiefe heads of the Commons having aspired and gaped now a long time, but still in vain, after higher place of dignity and honour, took their vantage whiles all was quiet abroad, and began to have their conventicles and meetings in the houses of the Tribunes, and there entertained secret Counsels. Some complained that they were much despised of the common people: for whereas in so many yeares, There were Tribunes Military created with Consuls authority, yet never was there any one of the Commonalty advanced to that Dignity. Our forefathers (say they) in great wisdom and deep fore-cast, have done well to take order, that none of the Nobility at any time should have access to any office of the Commonalty: for if that were not, the Commons should have had ere this some of the Patritii for their Tribuns: so odious are we become to those of our own coat, and are as little set by of the Commons as of the Nobles. Others excused the people, and laid the fault upon the Senators: by whose ambition, by whose crafty fetches and subtil policies it came to passe, that the Commons were stopped from the highway to advancement and promotion. But if the Commons might have any respite or breathing time, and not be solicited and tempted by their prayers interlaced with threats: they would remember themselves and those of their own calling, in giving of their voices: and having once gotten assistance unto them, would also win the highest pitch and sovereign type of authority. For the abolishing therefore of this ambitious seeking and standing for offices, they agree and resolve, that the Tribuns should prefer and publish a Law, that no man might wear white more then ordinary, or refresh the bright hue of his upper garment, while he sued for any dignity. A smal matter now adayes, and may seem scarcely worth the debating in serious counsel, and not

A not be solicited and tempted by their prayers interlaced with threats: they would remember themselves and those of their own calling, in giving of their voices and having once gotten assistance unto them, would also win the highest pitch and sovereign type of authority. For the abolishing therefore of this ambitious seeking and standing for offices they agree and resolve, that the Tribuns should prefer and publish a law, that no man might wear white more then ordinary, or refresh the bright hue of his upper garment, while he sued for any dignity. A small matter now a days, and may seem scarcely worth the debating in serious counsel, which notwithstanding at that time, set both nobles and commons in a great heat of contention. Yet obtained the Tribuns so much, that this law passed, and it appeared, that the Commons when their blood was once up, would affect their own, and wholly incline to them in their suffrages. But to the end that they might not have their full scope and put it in practice, an Act of the Senate was, that there should be held an Election of Consuls. The occasion thereof, was a tumult or commotion, which, as the Latins and Hernicks advertised them, arose from the Equians and Volscians. T. Quintius Cincinnatus, the son of Lutius (surnamed also Pennus), and G. Julius Mente were elected Consuls. Neither was this fearful news of war entertained any longer. For the enemies having by a sacred law (which amongst them was of greatest force to levy an army) suffered their power, set forth two mighty armies from both parts, into Algidum, and there met. Where the Equians and Volscians, severally by themselves encamped strongly, and more earnestly studied the Captains to fortifie their camps, and to train and exercise their souldiers, than at any time afore. Whereupon, the news was more fearful, that the messengers brought to Rome. So the Senate agreed to create a Dictator. For, although those nations oftentimes had been vanquished by them, yet now they rebelled in more forcible manner, and with preparation, than at any time before. Also, by reason of the late sickness, the youth and flower of the Romans, was sore diminished. But above all, the private discord of the Consuls one with another, and the debate and difference in all their counsel terrified them most. There be that write, how these Consuls had but unlucky fortune, and lost a field in Algidum; and that it should be the cause of making a Dictator. But this one thing is certain, that howsoever else the Consuls disagreed, yet they jumped in one to execute the wills of the Senators, in that they would not nominate a Dictator until such time as after news brought, still worse and worse, and yet the Consuls would not be ruled by the Senators: one Quintus Servilius Priscus, a man, who right worthy and honourably had borne the highest offices, made this speech: "My Masters, ye that are Tribuns of the Commons (quoth he) in this exigent and desperate case, the Senate calleth for your assistance; that in so great hazzard of the Common weal, ye by virtue of your authority, would force the Consuls peremptorily to make a Dictator. Which speech being once heard; the Tribuns supposing now they had good occasion offered, to stretch and extend their power to the full, departed aside, and in the name of their Colledge or society, pronounced, That it was their pleasure and will, that the Consuls should be obedient unto the Senate: and in case they proceeded to do farther, then the content of that most honourable House would bear them out, they would command them to ward. The Consuls chose rather to be over-ruled of them than of the Senate: saying yet withal, that the prerogative of the highest government was by the Senators betrayed, and the Consulship made thrall and subject to the Tribuns power, if so be the Consuls might be compelled to do ought by vigour of the Tribuns authority, and (than which, a private person could fear no more) be sent also to ward, or committed to prison. The last fell to T. Quintius (for in this also they could not agree between themselves) to nominate the Dictator: who named A. Posthumius Tubertus, his wives father, a grim Sir, and a man of most severe and stern government. By whom was L. Julius nominated for General of the Cavalry: Herewithal was proclaimed a vacation or law-feece, and that throughout the whole City they should go in hand with nothing but war. The taking knowledge of such as pretended to be freed and exempt from souldiery, was put off until the war was ended. So that they that were before doubtful suffered themselves to be enrolled: and souldiers were levied out from the Hernicks and Latins, who from both places obeyed the Dictator to their uttermost. All these things were dispatched with exceeding expedition. Then the Dictator having left C. Julius the Consul, for the defence of the City, & L. Julius the General of the horsemen for all sudden occasions incident unto wars, that they might not be to seek for any thing whereof they had need in the camp, took with him Anulus Cornelius the High Priest, & saying after him certain prayers, word for word, he vowed great and stately playes, in regard of this tumultuous and troublesome war: and thus departing from the City, and dividing his whole Army between himself and Quintius the Cos, at length he approached the enemies. And like as they had discovered the two camps of their enemies, a little space distant one from another, so they also, about a mile from the enemy, intrenched themselves: the Dictator neer to Tusculum, and the Consul to Lanuvium. So these four Armies, and as many fortified camps, had a spacious and large plain in the middle, sufficient not only for small excursions to skirmish in, but also to display their armies of both sides. And all the time that they lay encamped encamped one against another, they ceased not to make light skirmishes: for the Dictator was well content, that his men by making proof, and comparing their strength and puissance with their enemies, and assaying by little and little to try the event of these skirmishes, should conceive a forerhand some hope of the entire and general victory.

The enemies therefore having no hope left, to speed well in a set field and pight battel, assailed by night the Consul's camp, and put all to the hazard of a doubtful issue. The sudden cry and alarm, awakened not only the Consul, Sentinels, his corps de guard, and so his whole army, but the Dictator also out of their sleep. And where need was of present help, there failed not the Consul, either in courage or counsel. Some soldiers ward and defend the gates, others compass the trench, ranged in a round array. In the other camp of the Dictator, look how much less sleep there was, so much more leisure had they, and studied what was most needful to be done. Forthwith aid was sent unto the Consul his camp, under the leading of Sp. Posthumius Albus, a Lieutenant. The Dictator himself in person, with part of his power, fetching a small compass about, gained a place most apart from all noise and tumult, and from whence as unawares he might charge upon the back of the enemies. And leaveth as Vicegerent in the leaguer Q. Sulpicius, and to M. Fabius a Lieutenant, he committed the conduct of the horsemen, commanding him not before day to stir with his horse, as being unruly and hard to be managed in tumult and troubles of the night. And all things else, that a provident and industrious Captain in such a case might command and do, that commanded he, and did orderly. But for one thing above the rest, he shewed singular proof of policy and courage, and worthy no mean praise: in that he sent out first M. Cerginus with certain chosen Squadrons to assail the camp of the enemies, from whence he knew by his espials there was departed a greater part of the forces. Who after that he surprised the enemies there, amused wholly upon the event of other mens dangers, careless and secure for their own selves, and therefore neglecting their fronts and guards; wan their hold, in manner before the enemies knew well it was assailed. From whence the Dictator having descried a smoke (which was the signal agreed between them) crieth aloud, that the enemies camp was won, and committeth news thereof to be carried every way. Now it waxed broad day light, and all was clearly to be seen: by which time both Fabius with the horsemen, had given the charge, and the Consul also had made a sally out of the camp; upon the enemies that now already were scared. But the Dictator on the other side, charging upon the rearward and the middle battel, came on every side with his footmen, and horsemen in train of victory against the enemies: who were forced to turn round and fight every way, according to the dissonant cries, and sudden alarms. Thus being environed round about, they had in the midst died for it every one, and suffered punishment due for their rebellion, had not Vellius Messius, one of the Volscians, a man more renowned for his valiant acts, then noble by his parentage, rebuked with a loud voice his fellows, being ready now to cast themselves into rings, and said: What will ye here without making your defence, without revenge, offer your selves to be devoured of the enemies sword? What do you with your armour and weapons? Why began ye war first? Are you trouble-some and unruly in peace, and cowards in war? What hope have ye in standing still? Do you look for some god from Heaven to protect and deliver you? You must make way by dint of sword. Go to then, and stick to it like men, and that way whereas ye shall see me go afore, follow ye after, as many of you as mind to see again your home, your parents, your wives and children. It is neither wall, nor rampart and trench, but armed men that must withstand armed men. In valour ye are their matches, but in respect of necessity (which is the last and strongest engin of all other) ye are the better. When he had these words spoken, and done accordingly, with a fresh shout they followed after, and made head to that quarter whereas Posthumius Albus had placed against them his cohorts: and compelled the victors to lose ground, until such time as the Dictator came to succour his men thus distressed, and now ready to retreat: and so he bent thither all the force of the whole battel. In one only man, Messius, rested all the hope and fortune of the enemies. Many a man was there hurt on both parts, and many a one slain outright, and left dead in the place. So as now the very Roman Commanders, fought not without bloodshed. Only Posthumius being smitten with a stone, which had broken and bruised his head, went out of the throng: for neither the Dictator, wounded as he was in the shoulder, nor yet Fabius, albeit his thigh was almost nailed to his horie, nor the Consul, for all his arm was quite cut off, once retired or departed out of that dangerous combat. But Messius amidst the enemies that there lay dead on the earth, with a guard about him of most hardy & tall men passed through in forcible manner, and escaped clear to the Volscians leaguer, which as yet was not lost: and so the whole battel inclined thither. The Consul, after he had chased them, scattered in parties here and there, even as far as to the trench, assaileth the very camp and the rampart. Thither also bringeth the Dictator his power to another side. Neither was the assault less hot there, then the fight was sharp afore. It is said moreover, that the Consul threw an ensign within the rampart, to animate the souldiers, that they might more eagerly get up after it: and

A and so by recovering the banner again, was the first breach and entrance made. Thus the Dictator having broken through the mure, came to close fight and hand-strokes even within the camp. Then began the enemies every where to fling from them their weapons, and to yeeld themselves prisoners. So being themselves and their pavilions taken, they were all sold, but those of Senators calling. Part of the pillage was restored to the Latins and Hernicks, namely, to as many as knew their own goods: part thereof the Dictator sold in port-sale. And leaving to the Consul the charge of the camp, rode himself triumphing into the City, and gave over his office. Of which his noble and famous Dictatorship, they blemish the memorial, who write, that A. Posthumius (the Dictator his son, for that upon advantage offered of a fortunate service, he departed without leave from

B his quarter and guard) was after his victory achieved, by his fathers Commandment beheaded. But I list not to believe it. And lawfull it is for me so to do, among so divers opinions: and a good proof it is on my side, that such imperious and rigorous proceedings were called Imperia Manliana, and not Posthumiana. For like it is, that he who had given the first example of such cruelty, should have gotten afore all others, that noted title of cruelty. Besides, Manlius it was, that was surnamed Imperiosus. But Posthumius is not marked with any odious note at all.

Imperia Manliana.

C Q. Julius Consul, in the absence of his Collegue, without any casting of lots, dedicated the Temple of Apollo. Quintus having discharged his army, when he was returned into the City, took not that well. But it was no boot to complain in the Senat house. Moreover, in this notable year, so full of brave and worthy acts, there is recorded one thing, that was thought in those days no thing pertinent to the State of Rome, namely, that the Carthaginians (so great and mortal enemies in time to come) passed the seas then first: and (upon the occasion of civil dissention and discord among the Sicilians) with a power landed in Sicily, for to take part with a side and faction. In the City of Rome the Tribuns of the Commons laboured, that Military Tribuns might be with Consuls authority chosen: but it could not be obtained. Consuls were made, Lu. Papyrius Crassus, and L. Julius. The Aequians Embassadors suing to the Senat for a league, and for that league, pretending very often to yeeld themselves, and be in subjection, obtained a truce only for 8. years. The Volscians after their overthrow in Algidum, fell to continual debate and contention, whiles some perswaded peace, and others war: so long, until at length they grew to brawls and mutinies. So on every side the Romans were at rest. The Consuls understanding that the Tribuns of the D Commons were comploted (for one false brother among them bewrayed and detected all) to put up a bill, and make a law, concerning the estimation of fines and penalties (a thing right pleasing and acceptable to the people) they themselves prevented them, and preferred it. Then were Consuls, L. Sergius Fidenas, the second time, and Hostius Lucretius Tricipitinus. In whose year nothing was there done worthy of rehearsal. After them succeeded Consuls, A. Cornelius Cossus, and Titus Quintius Pennus the second time. The Veientians made rodes into the lands of the Romans. And a rumor went, that some of the Fidenarian youths were accessory unto them, and had their hands therein. For which were appointed as Commissioners to make inquisition, L. Sergius, Quintus Servilius, and Mamercus Aemilius. Some of them were confined to Hostia, for that they could make no sound excuse, and justifie their absence for certain days out of Fidene. So the number of the inhabitants there, was encreased: and their lands, who were slain in the wars, assigned unto them.

An act for fines and penalties.

E In that year hapned an exceeding great drouth. For not only there wanted rain water from above, but also the very earth lacking her natural moisture, scarcely sufficed to maintain the running stream in main rivers. The scarcity of water besides about springs that were dried up, and the small rivulets and brooks caused a great death and mortality of cattel for default of drink: whereof some died of the scab: by contagion whereof the people also were diseased generally. The malady first began among the rustical sort, the bond-slaves and hinds: and afterwards spread into every corner of the City. Neither were men only rained and diseased with this infection: but their minds also were troubled and possessed with sundry sorts of superstitious religious, and

A great drouth about Rome, and much mortalitye thereupon.

Rome added to superstitions.

F those for the most part strange and forrain: whiles upon vain and foolish prophecies, they brought new rites and ceremonies of sacrificing into mens houses: and made good gain of such as were given to superstitious devotion, and made conscience of every little thing: until such time as now it grew to a publick offence, and the chief of the City were ashamed to see in every street and chappel, strange and unaccustomed purgatory sacrifices and expiations, for to procure the favour and mercy of the gods. Whereupon the Ediles had in charge and commission, to look straightly to this disorder: and that no other gods were worshipped, then those of the Romans: nor after any other manner than had been usual in their native country. So their anger against the Veientians, and desire of revenge, was put off unto the next year following, when C. Servilius Hala, and L. Papirius Mamilianus were Consuls. And even then, they made some scruple to proclaime

G war immediately, or to make out any power against them: but they thought good to send their Heralds afore, to make claim for their own and challenge restitution. For whereas of late years there had been a field fought with the Veientians before Nomentum and Fidene: whereupon there followed no peace but only a truce concluded: both the time was now expired, and also before the day they had rebelled. Yet were there Heralds sent unto them. And when they had demanded amends by a solemn oath and other ceremonies according to the ancient manner, they might have no audience, neither were their words regarded. After this there arose some question, whether the war should be proclaimed with the peoples allowance & suffrages, or the Senates decreed were alone sufficient. The Tribuns by giving out and threatening that they would stop the numbers, obtained in the end, that Quintius the Consul should propound this matter concerning the war unto the people. And it passed clear through all the Centuries. Herein also had the Commonalty the better of it, for that they prevailed that there should be no Consuls chosen the year following. So there were four Tribuns military created with Consuls authority, T. Quintius Pennus immediately from his Consulship, C. Furius, M. Posthumius, and Cornelius Cassus: of which Cassus had the charge and government of the City. The other three after they had mustered, took a journey to Veii, and made good proof how hurtful in war is the rule of many Commanders. For whiles every man was inclined to his own counsel and advice, and took divers courses one from another, they made way for the enemies and gave them advantage. For the Veientians taking their opportunity and time, entered upon the army thus distracted; whiles some commanded to sound a retreat, others the alarm and to strike up the battel. Whereupon they were disordered and put to flight. But for as much as the camp was neer at hand, either they retired themselves in safety: so, as the shame they gat was more then the harm in this defeat. The City was pensive and hereupon sorrowed, as not used to take foiles and overthrowes. The Tribuns they hated, and required a Dictator: in whom rested ever the whole hope and stay of the City. And when as even in that behalf, they made a matter of conscience, because there might not be any Dictator nominated, but by a Consul, the Augurs were consulted withal: who resolved them of that doubt and rid them of their scruple. So A. Cornelius (a consular Tribun) nominated Mamercus Emilius Dictator: by whom he was himself also pronounced Grand Master of the horsemen. At such default was the City then, of right valour and true vertue, that notwithstanding the prejudice by the Censors, yet there was no remedy, but the whole government of the state should rest upon that family, which had been wrongfully disgraced and unworthily noted by the Censors.

The Veientians proud of their late good success, albeit they sent their Embassadors about all the nations of Heruvia, boasting and vaunting that in one battel they had discomfited three Roman Generals, yet could not they with all their solliciting, persuade any to be seen to take part with them in publick action: but they procured divers from all parts for hope of spoil, voluntarily to aid and assist them. The people of Fidene only agreed to rebel. And as though it had been in no wise lawful, to begin any war but with some wicked, heinous and execrable fact: like as afore they had embrewed their hands, and bathed their swords in blood of Embassadors, so then, they began with murdering their new received Coloners: and so handed themselves with the Veientians. Then consulted the Princes and States of those two nations, whether they should make Veii or Fidene the seat town of the war. Fidene was supposed the fitter and more commodious. So the Veientians passed over the Tyber, and translated the war to Fidene. Great fear was there at Rome to see the army of their enemies removed from Veii, and implanted at Fidene. And being shrewdly danted by their late overthrow besides, they encamped even before the gate Collina. On the walls were armed souldiers placed, vacation in all courts of law was ordained, shop windows shut up, and all more like a Leaguer then a City. Then sent the Dictator the Criers about into all streets and lanes, to summon the Citizens thus terrified, to a general assembly. Where he rebuked them for carrying such wavering and doubtful hearts upon so small accidents and events of fortune, having received but a slight loss and smal foil: and that, not through the manhood of the enemy, or cowardise of the Roman army, but only through the disagreement and difference of the Leaders. "Also for that they were afraid of the Veientian enemy, whom five or six times afore they had put to the worst and vanquished, and especially of Fidene, which had been oftner in a manner won, then assaulted. As for the Romans and their enemies (saith he) they are even the same still that always for so many hundred years, they had been: bearing the same minds, the same bodily strength, and the same armor; and even my self am the same Mamercus Emilius, and no other, who heretofore discomfited at Nomentum, the Veientians and Fidenatians, with the Falcians power also adjoined unto them. And as for A. Cornelius, he wil no doubt be the same General of horsemen in this battel, as in the former war he was: at what time he being a Knight Marshal, slew Lars Tolumnius the King of the Veientians, in the fight of two armies: and brought into the Temple of Jupiter Feretrius, the rich armor of him despoiled. Wherefore ye ought to remember this, that we have on our side triumphs, spoils and victory: whereas with the enemies remaineth the wicked and detestable fact of killing the Embassadors, against the law of all nations: also the massacre of the Fidenatian inhabitants, in time of peace: the breaking of truce, and their revolting now seven times to their ruin and overthrow. Take weapon therefore in hand like men: for I trust assuredly, that so soon as we shall join our camps together, and encounter these most wicked enemies, they shall have no long joy of the shameful discomfiture of the Roman army. And the people of Rome shall understand, how much better they have deserved of the Common-weal, who made me Dictator now the third time, than those, who for clipping the Censors wings and abridging them of their kingly rule, had disdained and disgraced my second Dictatorship with the shameful blot of ignominy and reproach. After this speech, when he had made his vows accordingly: he entamped a mile and an half on this side Fidene, flanked on the right hand with the hills, and on the left with the river Tyber. And commanded T. Quintius Pennus his Lieutenant, to gain the hills afore, and be possessed secretly of that cape or hill, which was on the back part of the enemies. Himself the next morrow when

A when as the Tuscans, (full of pride and stomach for the prosperous success of former dayes, which was much better than their service in fight) came forth into the field: after he had stayed a while, until the scouts and spies brought word, that Quintius was gotten safely unto the Hill top near adjoyning to the Castle, or fort of the Fidenatians, he advanceth forth his standards: and with his footmen ranged in battell array, marched against his enemies with full pace: commanding his General of the Horsemen not to charge without his warrant: for that he himself "as need should require, would give the signal for the aid of his cavalry to come in, willing him then, to quit himself like a brave Knight in remembrance of his glorious combat with a King: "of his rich present and oblation: and of Romulus and Jupiter Feretrius. Thus the legions assailed

B one another and encounter right hardily. The Romans kindled and enflamed with rancour and malice, termed the Fidenatians, wicked and godless wretches: the Veientians, Robbers and Theeves: truce-breakers both, polluted with the abominable murder of Embassadors: sleyned with the execrable massacre of their cohabitants: faithles and treacherous allies, cowardly and dastardly enemies: thus both in word and deed they satisfied their hatred to the full: And at the very first shock forced their enemies to shrink. At which instant all at once, there issued out of the open gates of Fidene a strange army, not heard of nor usual, before that day: A mighty number armed with fireworks, and shining all over with burning lights, after a fanatical and mad manner, ran as if they were carried with spirits, upon their enemies: and with the uncouth sight of this kind of fight, amazed the Romans a pretty while. Then the Dictator busy in fight, having sent both for the General of the Cavalry with his troups of Horsemen, and also for Quintius

C from the mountains, hastened himself to the left point: which being terrified with a scarefire more like than a battell, had given place unto the flame, and stepped back. Where with a loud voyce he thus spake: "What? will ye be overcome with smoak like a swarm of Bees, and lose your "ground, and retreat from your naked and unarmed enemies? will ye not put out this fire with redoubled stroke of brandishing swords? And will ye not every man for his part, if we must needs "fight with fire, and not with weapons, pull from them their torches and firebrands, and sling "them again at their own heads? Go to, I say, like hardy men, mindful of the renown of Romans, remembering the prowess of your Fathers, and your own selves. Turn this fire upon your "enemies City, and consume Fidene into ashes with her own flames: this disloyal Fidene, which

D "by no favors and good turns of yours, ye were ever able to win and pacifie. The bloud of your "Embassadors, the bloud of your Colonies thither sent to people their City, your Frontiers and "Borders by them wasted, put you in mind of no meaner revenge. At the Dictators commandment, the whole battaillon was moved and encouraged. Some catch the firebrands as they flew, others by force snatch them from them, so that now both battels were armed with fire. The General of Horsemen for his part, renneth the Horse service: commanding them to pluck the bits out of their Horses mouths, and was the first himself, that setting spurs to, rode with bridle in Horserieck, into the midst of the fire: and the other Horses also being pricked forward, and eased of their bridles, carried the riders with full career against the enemy. The dust rising together with the smoke, took the light from mens eyes, and Horses both. And that sight which had terrified the

E souldiers, nothing at all affrighted the Horses: Wheresoever therefore the men of arms rode: they bare down all afore them as if some Houses had come tumbling upon their heads. Herewith happened a new alarm to be heard, which having caused both armies to wonder and listen thereunto, the Dictator cryeth out aloud, That Quintius the Lieutenant and his Regiment, came upon the back of the enemies: and himself reenforcing the shout, advanceth his ensigns forward more freshly. When as now two armies, and two divers battels, pressed sore upon the Tuscans, and environed them both before and behind: and that the enemies could neither flye back to their camp, nor yet retire or withdraw themselves unto the mountains, from whence a fresh supply of enemies, made head, and affronted them: and that the horses being unbridled, carried the riders every way hither and thither: the most part of the Veientians ran scattering in disorder, and highing

F them as they fled toward the Tyber: and the Fidenatians that remained to the City Fidene. But in that fearful flight they ran upon their own death. Some were killed on the banks of the River, others were driven into the water, and the stream and whirlepirs carried them away. And even they that were cunning swimmers, what with wearinesse, and what with faintness of their wounds and with fright, sunk and were drowned: so that few of many swam over in safety. The other army fled through their camp into the City. The same way also the Romans followed forcibly after: and Quintius especially, together with them who erewhile came down from the mountains, and were the freshest souldiers for fight (as who came last into the battell) and so afterwards entred pell-mell among their enemies into the gate, climbed upon the walls, and from the walls set up a banner to their fellows, in token that they had won the Town. Which as soon as the Dictator

G espied, (for now by this time had he made an entrance into the forlorn, and abandoned camp of his enemies) he brought the souldiers, upon desire to run to a spoil, and hoping of a greater sacrifice in the City, streight unto the gate. And being gotten within the walls, marcheth directly forward to the Castle, whereinto he beheld the multitude to flye for refuge and safety. The execution in the City was no less than in the field: which continued until they threw away their weapons, and craving nothing but life yeilded themselves to the Dictator. So both City and camp was spoiled and sacked. The morrow after, the Dictator disposed of his prisoners thus: He drew them by lot, and gave to every Horseman and Centurion one, and to as many as had done more valiantly than other, two apiece: the rest he sold in portſale. And ſo with triumph brought home to Rome his victorious army, enriched with a great booty: and having commanded the General of the Horſemen to reſign up his office, himſelf alſo ſurrendreth his own, upon the ſixteenth day after his creation, yeelding up his government in peace; which in time of war, and in a fearful ſtate he had received.

There be ſome that have recorded in their Chronicles, that there was a battel fought with the Veientians at Fidene by ſhips upon the water. A thing verily, no leſs impoſſible than incredible. Conſidering that even at this day, the river is not broad enough for ſuch a purpoſe: and at that time, (as by ancient men we have learned) it was far narrower than now it is. Unleſs haply in croſſing over the river ſome veſſels or bottoms, that were put out to meet and to receive them, I were ſtayed. And ſo, men making the matter greater (as uſually it cometh to paſs) have deſired a vain title of a naval victory at Sea. The year following, there were military Tribuns; with Conſuls authority, A. Sempronius Atratinus, L. Quintius Cincinnatus, L. Furius Medullinus, and L. Horatius Barbatus. Then was there a truce granted unto the Veientians for twenty years, and to the Æquians for three years, whereas they had made ſuit for more. Reſt there was alſo from all ſeditious and broils in the City. The year following, having neither war abroad, nor yet ſedition at home, was famous yet for the playes which in time of war had been vowed: both in regard of the great preparations that the Military Tribuns made, as alſo for the frequent reort and concourſe of the Nations adjoyning. The Tribuns with Conſuls authority were Cl. Crasſus, Sp. Nautius Rutilius, T. Sergius Fidenas, and Sextus Julius Tullus. The fight of theſe games and paſtimes, K whereunto thoſe ſtrangers were come by publick conſent of their States, was unto them more acceptable in regard of the courteſy of thoſe friends that gave them intertainment. After theſe “playes: there enſued ſeditious Orations of the Tribuns of the Commons, who rebuked the com- “mon multitude, for that they being beſotted with admiration of thoſe whom they had ſo ha- “ted, kept themſelves in perpetual thraldome. And not only durſt not attempt to put forth them- “ſelves for to bring in again the poſſibility to have Conſuls of their part, as in time paſt: no, nor “ſo much as in the creation of Military Tribuns (the Election of whom was indifferent as well “for Commons as Nobles) were mindful or thought either upon themſelves or their friends, “and thoſe of their own body: And therefore they ſhould ſurceaſe to marvel, why no man plea- “ded for the benefit of the commonalty. For, travel is well beſtowed, and danger well adventu- L “red, where profit and honor might be hoped and looked for. And nothing is ſo difficult but “men would employ themſelves to enterpriſe the ſame, if for the adventuring of great exploits, “there might be propoſed as great rewards. But, that any Tribun of the Commons ſhould run de- “ſperate y and blindly into a world of brawls and troubles, with great hazard of his perſon, and “no hope at all of fruit and profit in the end: for which contention, he might be ſure that the No- “bles againſt whom he ſtrived, would perſecute him with deadly and irreconcilable malice: and “at the Commons hands, for whom he thus contended, he ſhould be honored and advanced “never the more. It was a thing neither to be expected, nor required. The only means to get “courage and magnanimity, is advancement to high place of honor and dignity. And as for them, “they would not diſdain the meanest commoner that was, if they themſelves might be no more M “deſpised. To conclude the matter were worth the tryal in one or two, whether any commoner “were ſufficient to bear a great office of ſtate; or whether it were a wondrous thing and ſtrange “miracle, that a valiant and hardy man ſhould ariſe out of the commonalty. With much a do “(ſay they) we got and obtained that Tribuns military with Conſuls authority might likewiſe be “choien out of the commonalty: and men approved both in war abroad and in affairs of State “at home had ſued therefore. In the firſt years they being nipped by you; and ſo having the re- “pulſe, were had in deriſion of the Nobility: ſo that at length they forbore to give themſelves “thus contumeliouſly to be miſuſed and made fools. We ſee no cauſe therefore, why that law al- “ſo ſhould not be repealed, wherein a dignity was granted, and never like to be obtained. For “leſs ſhame would there ariſe, if the law were not indifferent nor reſpective unto them, than as N “unmeet perſons and unworthy, thus ſhamefully to be paſſed by and take the repulſe. Theſe and ſuch like ſpeeches, were heard with ſo good an ear and general applauſe, that ſome of them were “incited forward to ſue for the Military Tribunſhip: whiles every one promiſed in the time of his “office to do great matters, and to propoſe, ſome one thing, ſome another, for and concerning the “benefit of the Commons. Pretending great hopes of dividing the common Lands, and planting “of colonies abroad, and laying tributes and impoſitions upon landed perſons, for to pay ſould- “diers wages. But the Tribuns military then in place, deviſed to ſpye out a time, when upon ſome “occaſion of the abſence of much people departed out of the City, the Senators by a privy and “ſecret warning, ſhould at a certain day be called home: and then, whiles the Tribuns of the “Commons were away, an act of Senate ſhould paſſe in this form: That for aſmuch as it was O “noſed that the Volſcians were entred into the Lands of the Hernicks to forrage and rob; the mi- “litary Tribuns ſhould go to ſee whether it were ſo or no, and that in the mean while there ſhould “be held a general aſſembly for the Election of Conſuls. The Tribuns military took their “journey accordingly, and left Appius Claudius the Decemvirs ſon, Governour of the City, a “ſtout young Gentleman and a forward, who from his very cradle bare an inward grudge and ha- “tred againſt the Tribuns and the Commons. And bootleſs it was either for the Tribuns of “the Commons to find themſelves grieved with thoſe, who made the decree, now that they were “abſent, Absent, nor yet had they cause to quarrel with Appius Claudius, because the thing had been contrived and past afore his time. So, Comitia were created, C. Sempromus Atratinus, and Quintus Fabius Vibulanus.

A forreign matter, but yet worthy to be remembered and here inserted, is reported to have happened that year: to wit, that Vulsurnum a City of the Volscians, which now is Capua, was by the Samnites taken: and that it came to be named Canus of one Canus their Captain, or (which soundeth more like a truth) of the champion field. But they won it by this means. For upon occasion that the Volscians were wearied with former wars, they were admitted into the society of their City and territory. And on a solemn festival day, when as the citizens had filled their bellies and were found asleep, the new Coloners the Samnites, set upon the old inhabitants and in the night season slew them all.

But now to return. Things passing thus (as I said before) the Consuls shovenamed upon the *Ides of December, entered their government. By which time not only they which were of purpose sent to learn the news of the Volscians brought word that war was at hand but Embassadors also from the Latins and Hernicks, gave intelligence of the same. And namely that never at any time afore, the Volscians were more busy and occupied, either in chusing of good Captains, or in levying an army, giving out their speeches abroad and in every place, That the time was now come, either to forget warfare, and lay away soldiery, and for ever make account to bear the yoke of thralldom: or else not to give one foot, nor come behind those with whom they strove for sovereignty, either in manhood or in painful travel, or in Discipline of warfare. And surely they were no vain tidings that those messengers reported.

But the Senators would take no such knowledge, nor be greatly moved at the matter. And withal, C. Sempromius, unto whom the charge of that war was allotted, presuming upon fortune, as if she were alwayes right constant and at command, and leading an army of a people used to victory, against those that were wont to be overcome, did all things rashly and negligently. So as to speak a truth, there was more Roman Discipline in the Volscian host, than in the Roman. And so fortune (as oftentimes else) went with vertue. At the first encounter, which by Sempromius was speedfully and unadvisedly begun, before that either the battailions were reinforced and strengthened with fresh supplies of succour, or the Horsemen ranged in convenient place, they ran together, and came to hand strokes.

D token which way the victory would incline, was the manner of shout at the first charge, which by the enemy was more loud, more shrill and continual: but by the Romans, dissonant, unequal, dead and cold, often begun, and often ceased: and by their uncertain and variable noise, they betrayed the inward fear of their hearts. Whereupon the enemies so much the more eagerly charged them, pressing upon them with their shields, and laying at them thick with their bright swords: on the other side, the Romans helmets wag, and their crests nod every way as they look about them: and as they were to seek what to do, so they tremble and run together on heaps: one while the ensignes stand still, and were abandoned of the foremost fighting in the vanguard, another while they retired in again amongst their own squadrons. Yet was not the flight certain, nor yet the victory. The Romans sought more to cover and shrowd themselves than to fight: to ward blows rather than to strike. The Volscians set forward their ensignes, pressed upon the main battel, and saw more enemies under foot slain than running away. And now in all places the Romans retired, notwithstanding Sempromius the Consul both rebuked and also exhorted them to stick to it: for neither his commandment nor the authority and Majesty of his countenance availed ought. And immediately had they all turned their backs on their enemies, if Sex. Tempanius, a Decurion of Horsemen, had not in this desperate case, with a resolute courage and ready advice, helped at a pinch: Who cried with a loud voyce, that those Horsemen which would the safety of the common-wealth, should dismount off their Horses. And when the Corners of Horsemen bestirred themselves at his words, no less than if the Consul had given commandment: "Un-

F "leis (saith he) this troupe of men of arms, stay the violence of the enemies, we see the last of the "Roman Empire. Follow therefore in stead of banner displayed, the point of my lance: let "both Romans and Volscians see, that no nation is comparable to you, either for foot or "Horse. Whose encouragement being approved and received with a shout, he advanced forward, bearing his staff aloft: and what way soever they go, they enter and make room with forcible sway: and where they see their fellows in greatest distress, thither they make speed, opposing their targets afore them. And thus in every place whereas they thrust themselves forcibly, was the fight renewed: and doubtless the enemies had turned their backs, if possible it had been, for so few to have performed every thing at once. Now when as the General of the Volscians, saw his men not able to withstand them, he gave a signal and charge to give way to this new band of enemies, to wit, these Targetiers: until such time as they had put themselves so forward, that they might be excluded from their fellows. Which being done, these Horsemen were enclosed on every side: neither could they break through that way which they went, because the enemies were there thickest, where they had made their lane before. The Col, then, with the legions of the Romans, having lost the sight of those that had been a shield of defence and bulwark ere while to the whole army, lest that so many hardy men thus invironed, should be overpressed by the enemies: resolved to adventure any peril or hazard whatsoever. The Volscians were likewise diversly occupied & troubled. For on the one side they bare off the Col, and legions: on the other side they affronted Tempanius sore, & the Horsemen: who seeing that after many assayes and offers they could not break forth to their fellows, such up into a certain little Hill, and cast themselves into a ring and stood to their defence, not without doing some mischief to their enemies: neither gave they over fighting until night. The Consul also maintained the battel so long as he could see, and kept the enemy play. So the night parted them sunder, and uncertain it was who had the upper hand. And for that the event was unknown, who sped the better, so great a terrour came upon both parts in their camps, that leaving the wounded and a great part of their carriages behind, both armies as taking themselves losers, recovered the mountains that were next unto them. Howbeit the Hill or bank aforesaid, continued still beset round about, until midnight. But when word was brought thither to the Assailants, how that their camp was abandoned: they thinking their fellows vanquished, were also for their part affrighted, and made shift and fled in the dark as well as they could. Tempanius, fearing an ambushment, kept his men there together until day light. Then went he down with a few to discover the coasts: and finding by enquiry made of the wounded enemies, that the tents of the Volsicians were left and forsaken: he was full glad thereof, and called down his souldiers from the mount, and entred into the Roman camp. Where seeing all void and forlorn, and finding the same desolation which was amongst the enemies: before that the Volsicians upon knowledge of their error should return again, he took with him those hurt souldiers that he could: and not knowing to what quarters the Consul was gone, marcheth forward the next way to the City of Rome. And thither already the bruit of this unlucky fight, and of abandoning the tents, was arrived. But above all the rest, those Horsemen were bewailed, and great moan and lamentation was made for them as well in private as in public. The Col. Fabius, seeing the City also terrified with this news, kept ward before the gates: by which time, they might discover the Horsemen aforesaid afar off: but not without some fear of their parts, doubting who they were. But being soon known, they caused so great contentment after former fear, that in most joyfull manner, the posse went through the City, how the Horsemen were returned safe with victory. And out of those mourning and sorrowfull houses, which a while afore had bid adieu to their friends and kinsfolk, and bewailed their death, they ran into the streets and high wayes by heaps. The fearful dames also and wives, forgetting, for joy, all decent and womanly modesty, went out to meet the army, fell every one with open armes upon their own husbands and sons, took them about the neck, clipped and kissed them, and with all their hand and heart received them: yea, and for exceeding joy were almost past themselves.

The modest answer of Tempanius, to the former Interrogatories.

The Tribunes of the Commons, who had challenged and accused M. Posthumus and T. Quinctius, for that by their default, there was an unlucky fight before Veij: seemed to have good occasion and opportunity offered now, by bringing the Consul Sempronius into fresh and new hatred and disgrace, for to renew the conceived displeasure and malice of the people against them. Having assembled therefore the people together, with open mouth they declared, that the Common-wealth was betrayed first, at Veij by the leaders, and afterwards, because they went clear away withal, and unpunished, therefore the army in Volsi was likewise lost by the Consul: and that a troupe of most valiant knights were thus call away and given to be murdered, and the camp shamefully left and forsaken. Then C. Julius, one of the Tribunes, commanded Tempanius the Horseman to be called, and before them all said, "I would know of thee O Sextus Tempanius, whether thou think that C. Sempronius the Consul, either began battel in good time, or strengthened his battalions with good succors and supplies? or whether thou thy self, when as the Roman legions and footmen were discomfited, of thine own head and policy, causedst the Horsemen to alight on foot, and thereby reenforced the fight? Afterwards, when thou and thy men of arms were shut out from our battel, whether either the Consul himself came to rescue, or sent any succor unto thee? Last of all, whether the morrow after, thou hadst any aid or rescue at all? Whether thou and thy troupe of Horsemen brake through into the camp by your own hardiness and valor? And whether ye found in the camp any Consul or army, or rather the pavilions abandoned, and the souldiers left behind, hurt and wounded? To these premises and points, hast thou to speak this day upon thy vertue, and the faith of a souldier: by which only, in this war-service the Common-weal hath stood preserved. Finally, where C. Sempronius, and where our legions be? Whether thou wert forsaken thy self, or whether thou forlookest the Consul and the army? And to conclude; whether we have lost or won the field? To these demands, Tempanius made (as they say) no fine Oration, but a grave pithy speech like a souldier: not full of self-praises, nor shewing any gladness for the fault of another, and answered in this wise: How great skill (quoth he) of martial feats, and what sufficiency is in C. Sempronius, it is not for me a souldier to judge, nor yet to make any estimate of my General: but it was for the people of Rome to determine thereof, at what time as by their suffrages and voyces, in a solemn Election, they chose him Consul. "And therefore ye are not to enquire of me, and to be informed, either of the policies of a General Captain, or vertues and duties of a Consul: deep points to be examined, weighed, and discoursed by great wits, reaching heads, and high minds. But for that which I with mine eye saw, I am able to make report and testify; namely, That before himself was excluded out of the battel, I beheld the Consul fighting manfully in the vanguard, encouraging his men earnestly, and even amongst the Roman Standards; and Pikes of the enemies, busily employed. After which I was carried from the sight of my fellows, howbeit by the stir, noise and shouting, I well perceived, that the conflict continued until night. Neither was it possible (as I thought) for them to break through unto the Hill which I kept, by reason of the multitude

A " of enemies between. As for the army, what is become of it, I know not : But I suppose, that " as I my self in an extremity and fearful case, defended my self and my men, by advantage of the " ground : so the Consul for to save the army, took some more safe place to encamp in. Neither " think I verily, that the Volscians stood in better terms than the Romans fortune was. And the " darkness of the night (no doubt) caused error and confusion on every side, and in all places.
 After which speech when as he beought them, not to hold him any longer, wearied with travel, and faint of his wounds : he was with exceeding praise both of his valiant service and also of his modest speech, licenced to depart.

B Whiles these things thus passed, the Consul by that time, had marched by the way of Lavicum as far as to the Temple of * Quies : thither were wains, draught-beasts and sumpter Horses sent from the City, to receive and ease the army, toiled out with fight, and tired by journeying all night. Within a while after, the Cos. entred into the City : who endeavoured not more, to put the fault from himself, than to extol Tempanius, and give him his due deserved praises. Now whiles the City was sad and heavy for this hard hap, and angry also with the Captains : behold, M. Posthumius, who before had been accused, was now presented unto the people, for to wreak their choler and malice upon. He had been a Tribun Military in place of a Cos. at Veij, and now was condemned, & a fine set on his head of ten thousand Asles of brais. But as for Titus Quintius, his fellow in government, because that among the Volscians he had served fortunately as Consul, under the conduct of Posthumius Tibertus the Dictator : and likewise at Fidene, as Lieutenant of the other Dictator Mamercus Amylius, and laid the whole fault of that other time from himself upon his colleague before condemned : he was found unguilty and acquit by all the Tribes. It is said that the fresh remembrance of his father Cincinnatus, late a right worshipful citizen, helped him much : Yea, and Capitolinus Quintius a very aged man, did him no hurt, who humbly besought them that they would not suffer him, having but a while in this world to live, for to be the carrier of so heavy news unto Cincinnatus. The Commons made Tribuns of the commonalty, Sex. Tem- panius, A. Sellius, Sex. Antistius, and Sex. Pompilius in their absence : whom also the Horsemen had chosen for their Captains or Centurions, in the former exploit, by the advise and counsel of Tem- panius. But the Senators, because now for hatred of Sempronius, the name of Consuls misliked and offended them, determined that military Tribuns with Consuls authority, should be created. So D there were chosen L. Manlius Capitolinus, Q. Antonius Merenda, L. Papyrius Mugilanus.

In the very beginning of the year L. Hortensius the fifth Tribun of the commonalty, accused C.
Sempronius the Consul of the former year. And when as his other four fellows in office, in the sight of the people of Rome besought him, not to trouble their guiltless Captain, in whom nothing could be blamed or found fault withal, but adverse fortune : Hortensius could hardly abide, but thought it was but to prove and trye his resolute constancy : and that the party accused, trusted not upon the prayer and intercession of the Tribuns, which only for a shew was pretended, but upon their support and assistance. And therefore turning one while to Sempronius himself, demanded what was become of that haughty courage and stomach, so ordinary in those of Senators calling? and where was that magnanimity which rested and relied upon innocency? since that he having been a Consul, was fain to shelter and shrowd himself under the shadow and protection of E the Tribuns? Another while directing his speech to his fellow Tribuns : but you my Masters (quoth he) what will ye do? if I prosecute mine action against him still, and convict him in the end; Will ye take from the people their right, and overthrow the authority of the Tribuns among the Commons? When they again said and inferred, that the people of Rome had absolute power to do what they would, both with Sempronius, and all others : and that they neither would nor could abridge the people of their judgment. But if (say they) our prayers in the behalf of our General, who was to us in stead of a father, may not avail, then will we together with him change our weed for company. Nay, God forbid (quoth Hortensius) The Commons of Rome shall never see their Tribuns arrayed in soiled and mournful apparel. And as for C. Sempronius, I have now no F more to say to him, since that he hath carried himself so, whiles he was General, as that he hath gained thus much, as to be so dearly beloved of his souldiers. Neither was the kindness of those four Tribuns more acceptable to the Commons and Nobles, than the good nature of Hortensius, who at their reasonable request, was so easy to be pacified and intreated.

It was no long time that fortune fawned upon the Equians : who embraced the doubtful victory of the Volscians, and took it as their own. The next year after, when Cn. Fabius Vibula- nus, and T. Quintius Capitolinus, the son of Capitolinus, were Consuls : by the leading of Fabius, unto whom was allotted that Province, nothing was done there worthy of remembrance. For when as the Equians had made semblance of a battel, and brought their army only in sight, they were in fearful wise soon discomfited, and shamefully fled, ministring no matter of great ho-G nor to the Cos. And therefore was he denied triumph. But yet because the ignominy of the losse which happened by Sempronius was partly allayed, it was granted that he might enter Ovant into the City. A General was said to enter Ovant into the City, when ordinarily without his army following him he went on foot, or rode on Horseback only, and the people in their Acclamations for joy, redoubled Ohe or Oho. So that Ovatio is as much as Ohatio : Howsoever, some think th t Ovatio took the name of sacrificing a sheep. But he rode in triumph, when his souldiers attended him in his chariot, crying Io Triumphe. In this he carried a branch, or wore a garland of lawrel, in the other of Myrtle. So that the Ovation was a less honor than the Triumph. And it was granted to inferior persons, and for meaner desert. Whereas, none usually might triumph, unless he were Dictator, Cof, or Pretor, and had slain in field 5000 enemies at the least, won much spoil and pillage, and augmented the State of the Roman Empire.] Like as the war was dispatched with less ado than they feared: so in the City, after a calm and peaceable state, there arose between the Commons and Nobles, a world of discords and troubles more than they expected. Which began upon occasion of doubling the number of Questors. For when the Consuls had propounded, that besides two Questors or Treasurers of the City, there should be other twain ready to attend upon the Consuls, for all services and charges belonging to war: and when the Nobles also with all their power had approved it, the Tribuns of the Commons entred into a contention with the Consuls, and required that some of the Questors (for until that time they had been created from out of the degree of the Patritij only) might be likewise of the Commons. Against which demand, at the first, both Consuls, and also the Nobles, laboured with might and main. But afterwards having granted thus much, That as the use and practise was in creating of Tribuns with Consuls authority, so in like manner, in the Election of Questors, the people should have their free liberty to chuse. And seeing they gained little thereby, and could effect no good, they wholly let fall their former matter, about increasing the number of the Questors. But although it were thus by them given over, the Tribuns took it in hand again, and set it on foot: yea, and other seditious actions besides very often sprang forth, and among the rest, those also concerning the Law Agraria. Upon which troubles, when as the Senate was of mind, that there should be Consuls rather than Consular Tribuns created; and by reason of the Tribuns stepping between with their negative voyce, no decree of the Senate could passe, the government of the Commonwealth was devolved from Consuls to an * Interregnum, but not without exceeding great debate: for that the Tribuns kept the Patritij from meeting and packing together. Now when as the greater part of the year following was spent, with much strife and contention between the new Tribuns and certain Interregents, whiles one while the Tribuns stayed the Nobles from assembling together about the chusing of an Interregent, and another while crossed the Interregent for granting out any Act of Senate or warrant, for the election of Consuls: at the last, L. Papyrius Mugillanus, being declared Interregent, sometimes rebuked the Nobles, and sometimes blamed the Commons, and said: "That the Common-wealth neglected and forlorn of all men, was taken into protection of the Gods, and guided by their care and providence: standing upright and safe only, upon the truce observed by the Veientians, and the slow speed or small hast that the Aequians made to war. From whence, if any trouble should happen to arise, it is your will (quoth he) and pleasure belike, that the state should be surpris'd and assailed, whiles it is without any Magistrate of the Nobility. For neither is there an army ready, nor yet a Captain to raise an army. What think ye to put back forrain war abroad by civil discord at home? Which if they both should come together, there were no other remedy, though all the Gods in Heaven should set to their helping hand, but that the Common-weal of Rome should utterly be subverted. Yet rather remit every one of you somewhat of the rigor of your full jurisdiction, and (for the love of God) take some indifferent course to joyn in unity: the Nobles for their part, by suffering Military Tribuns to be created in lieu of Coss, the Tribuns again by no more thwarting and interposing their negative, but that four Questors may be chosen by the free voyces of the people, from out of the Commons and Nobles, one with another. First therefore was the High Court held for choosing sovereign Tribuns: and Tribuns there were created in Consular authority, all of the Nobility; namely, L. Quintius Cincinnatus the third time, Sex. Furius Medullinus the second time, M. Manlius, and A. Sempronius Atratinus. When this Tribun last named, was president of the Election for Questors, and the son of Antistius a Tribun of the Commons, and a brother besides to another Tribun, one Sex. Pompilius stood for the dignity, among certain other of the Commoners: neither all their own means that they could make, nor all the voyces they could procure, were able to prevail, but that the people preferred persons to the place, according to their gentry and high birth: namely, whose fathers and grand-fathers they had seen Consuls. All the Tribuns of the Commons stormed and chafed at this, but especially Pompilius and Antistius, being set on fire at the repulse of these their friends. "What should this mean (say they) that none of the Commons, neither in regard of their own merits, nor considering the injuries at the Nobles hands, nor yet for desire they might pretend to the first hanſel of that authority, which now was lawful, and never heretofore: that none of the Commons (I say) was created, if not a Military Tribun, yet not so much as a Questor? What, that neither the fathers prayer in the behalf of his son, nor a brothers suit in favour of a brother, being Tribuns both of them, invested in that sacred authority, and which first was erected for the maintenance of common freedom, could ought at all prevail? Surely there is some fraud and juggling in the matter: and A. Sempronius, hath in the Election used more art and cunning than truth and fidelity, Complaining that by his injurious and indirect dealing, their friends had taken the foil. When as therefore they might not by any violence touch his own person and attach him, being fenced with innocency in this Action, and secured by vertue of the office which then he bare: they wreaked their selves and discharged their choler upon C. Sempronius, the counſengermain of Atratinus by the brother: and with the help of M. Canuleius, one of their colleagues, arrested him for the ignominious service in the Volſcian war. Ever and anon, all the same Tribuns made some words and motion in the Senate-house, concerning the division of Lands, and revived the law

A Agraria (which C. Sempronius at all times most sharply and eagerly had withstood. Supposing, as it fell out indeed, that the accused person should either by giving over the cause, be less esteemed of the Nobles: or if he stood to it still until the time of judgment drew near, he should displease and offend the Commons. But he chose rather to be the object of the displeasure and malice of the people, that were opposed and bent against him, and so to wound his own private estate: than to betray the common and publick cause: and persisted resolute in the same minde still, that there should no bribing donative be granted, that might win and procure favour unto those three corrupt Tribuns: "For it is not land and living (quoth he) that they shoot at, for the benefit of the Commons; that is not their seeking: but their drift is to work and procure displeasure unto me: and therefore I will for my part, abide that storm and tempest with a resolute mind. And the Senate ought not to esteem either of me, or of any citizen else so highly, as to buy the sparing of one man so dear, even with the harm and damage of the whole state. The day of judicial trial came. When as he had pleaded for himself, and seemed nothing daunted at the matter: yet, for all that ever the Nobles could do, who tried all means, but in vain, to mitigate and delay the heat of the Commons, condemned he was in *fifteen thousand Asses. The same year Posthumia a Vestal Nun, was called in question for incontinency and incest, and came to her answer. A Virgin guiltless for any deed done: but scarcely of good name and fame: by reason that she was suspected for her apparel and going more light and garish in her attire: yea, and for her wit, more conceited and pleasant, than became a maid, and nothing respective of the speech of the world. Her trial was put over to a farther day, and she (after she had twice pleaded) in the end was acquit: only the high Priest by the advise, and in the name of the whole college, schooled her, and gave her warning to leave her sports, taunts, and merry conceits: and in her rayment to be seen not so gay as devout, and wear her garments rather saintly than lightly. The same year was Cumes, a City inhabited at that time by the Greeks, taken by the Campanians;

The year following had military Tribuns with Consuls authority, Agrippa Menenius Lanatus, P. Lucretius Tricipitinus, Sp. Nautius Servilius. A year, by the happiness and good fortune of the people of Rome, more notable for a danger escaped, than for any harm received. Certain bond-servants had conspired to fire the City in divers places far asunder: for this intent, when the people should be busily occupied, here and there, to save their houses, then by force and armes to surprize the Castle and Capitol. But Jupiter turned away and disappointed their wicked designs. For by the peaching and information of twain, the rest of the malefactors were taken and executed. But those that disclosed and revealed the conspiracy, had ten thousand pound in brasse money (which was in those dayes thought to be great riches) weighed them out of the City chamber, and freedom besides, for their reward.

After this, began the Æquians to renew war: and word was brought to Rome by credible persons, that certain new enemies also, to wit, the Lavicans, joynd together in counsel with the old. These Æquians, were good neighbours: for once a year ordinarily, they used to put the City of Rome to the pains of warring with them, and not miss. Embassadors then were sent to Lavicos, who brought doubtful answers from thence: whereby it appeared that neither at that instant they were ready to war, nor yet were like to continue long in peace. The Tusculans were charged, to take good heed, and have an eye that way, that no new stir and troubles should arise at Lavicos. There came Embassadors from Tusculum, to L. Sergius Fidenas, M. Papyrius Mugillanus, and C. Servilius, the son of Q. Servilius Priscus: (by whom, being Dictator, Fidenas was won) who were Military Tribuns in Consuls authority the year following. These Embassadors brought news that the Lavicans were out, and in armes, and joyning with the Æquians army, had foraged the country of Tusculum, and encamped themselves in Atidum. Then was war proclaimed against the Lavicans. And when by a decree made by the Senate, that two of the Consular Tribuns should go to war, and one manage the affairs of Rome: there arose a contention on a Sunday, among the said Tribuns. Every one thought himself the meekest and most sufficient man, to be General of the war, refusing the charge of the City, as a bale, dishonourable, and thankless office. As the Senators mused and wondred, to see amongst those that were fellows in government, so undecent a strife and contention; then Q. Servilius: "Seeing that (quoth he) there is no reverent regard, either of this honorable house, or of the Common-wealth: the father his countenance and dread Majesty, shall end this debate. My son without any lot casting, shall govern the City as President. God grant, that they which love war so well, may manage it with more discretion and concord than they wish it. As for a general muster to be levied out of all the people indifferently, that was not liked of. So ten Tribes were drawn by lot, out of which, the yonger sort were prest forth to war under the conduct of the two Tribuns. The strife which began to be kindled among them in the City, through the same desire still of sovereignty, brake forth and grew much hotter in the camp. In nothing agreed they, striving whose opinion should stand: each one would have his own way: his own commandments obeyed and none else: one despised another, and were despised one of the other: until at length, upon the Lieutenants reproof, they grew to this point, and this order was taken: That they should each other day, rule one alone by himself absolutely. Which news being brought to Rome, it is reported that Q. Servilius, a man for his years and long experience right skilfull, prayed of the immortal Gods, that by the variance and discord of the Tribuns, the Common-wealth sustained not more harm, than they had received at Veiis. As as if there were no doubt, but that some great loss and overthrow was ready ready to happen, he was instant upon his son, to levy souldiers, and to provide munition for war. H Neither proved he a false and vain Prophet. For by the leading of L. Sergius, whose day it was to rule, when as the enemy under a colour of fear, withdrew unto the trench, and to trayned them thither upon a foolish hope to win the camp, even under the very camp of the enemies in an uneven ground of disadvantage, they were suddenly charged by the Æquians, discomfited and chased down the valley: and many in their fall, which was greater than the flight, were trod under foot and slain, and with much ado that day kept they their own tents. The morrow after, when as now the enemies had beset a great part of the camp, they shamefully fled away, at the back gate, and forsook the camp. The Captains, Lieutenants, and the strength remaining of the army, which kept to their ensigns and colours, went to Tusculum. Other that were scattered here and there I about the fields by sundry wayes, made halt to Rome, and reported there the overthrow to be greater than indeed it was. Less was the trouble and sorrow, because men looked for no better issue and success: and also for that, there was help and succour (which they were to have an eye unto in so fearful a case) provided by the Tribune aforehand. At whose commandment, when as the tumult was by the inferiour Magistrates appeased in the City, espials were sent out in hast: who brought word that the Captains and the army was at Tusculum: and that the enemy had not removed his camp. And then (which encouraged them most of all) by the Senates decree, Q. Servilius Priscus was chosen Dictator, a man whose Providence over the Common-weal, the City as many other times afore, so in the event of that war had experience of: for that he only suspected the contention of the Tribunes afore this unhappy foil. Who having nominated General of the Horsemen, his son (as some say) by whom being military Tribune, himself was declared Dictator (for others there be that write how Servilius Hala was that year General of the Horse) went forth with a fresh army to war, and having joyned unto him those which were at Tusculum, he pitched his tents, two miles from the enemy. But see the fruit of good success. The pride and negligence which had been amongst the Roman Captains, went from them to the Æquians. Therefore in the first beginning of the conflict, when the Dictator with his Horsemen whom he sent against them, had disordered and put out of array the foremost ranks of the enemies, then commanded he the ensigns of the legionary footmen with all speed to follow hard upon: and one ensign-bearer of his own, who made some stay, he slew with his own hand. Then were they so earnestly set to give an hot charge, that the Æquians could not abide their force: and being in fight overthrown, when as they fled all amain to the camp, the assault thereof was both shorter and with less ado, than was the battel. When the camp was taken and spoiled, and that the Dictator had given the pillage unto the souldiers: and that the Horsemen, which chased the enemies from the camp, had brought word back, that all the Lavicans were overthrown, and a great part of the Æquians were fled to Lavicos: the day following was the army also led thither, and the Town compassed and beset round about, scaled, and sacked. The Dictator having brought home to Rome his victorious army, upon the eight day after he was chosen, gave over his office. And in very good time, before there was any sedition stirred up about the Law Agraria, by the motion of the Tribunes of the Commons, for the division of the Lavicans Lands: the whole body of the Senate appointed that a Colony should be sent to Lavicos. So there were sent from the City M a thousand and five hundred to inhabit there, and two acres apiece given them of Land.

Ap. Claudius to the Senators.

After the winning of Lavicos, there were created Military Tribunes with Consuls authority, to wit, Agrippa Menenius Lanatus, and L. Servilius Structus, with P. Lucretius Tricipitinus (all three the second time) and Sp. Veturius Crassus: and the year following A. Sempronius Atatinus, the third time, and these twain, M. Papyrius Mugillanus, and Sp. Nautius Rutilius the second time: for these two years there was peace abroad, but discord at home about the Laws Agraria. They that troubled the people, were Sp. Maelius, who now the fourth time, and Metilius, who the third time were made Tribunes of the Commons, both absent. And when they had published their Act, That all Lands conquered from the enemies, should be divided by the poll: by which Ordinance, the possessions of a great part of the Nobility became confiscate, (for since their City was N situate and built in a strange ground, there was in a manner no Land lay to it, which had not been purchased by the sword: neither enjoyed the Commons any, but that which either had been sold or assigned to the Commons) this seemed to be a bone cast between the Nobles and the Commons, to set them together at strife and contention. Neither knew the Military Tribunes any way to take counsel in this case, albeit one while they assembled the Senate, and another while met in private conference with the Nobility. Then Appius Claudius, (the nephew or grandson of notorious Appius the Decemvir, created for the making of Laws) the puny of all the counsel of the Nobility, made (as it is reported) this speech, and said, "That he would impart unto them that which he had received by tradition from his ancestours, to wit, an old devise, and appropriate to his house, for that his great grandfire Appius Claudius, had shewed unto the Nobles O "the only way, to abate and take down the Tribunes power; namely, by the coming between "and negative voyce of their fellows. For men new come up, and risen to promotion, might "soon by the authority of the chief rulers be brought from their purpose, and made to change "their mind if otherwhiles those great men in place would use some speech unto them fitted and "framed rather to the time and present occasion. than respective to their own high place and dignity: for evermore the heart and courage of such, is according to their degree and wealth. And "when they see once their fellows possessed first afore them of the cause, and thereby crept wholly "into

A "into all the favour with the Commons; and that no room is left for themselves to have any part thereof, they will be willing enough to decline and condescend unto the Senate, and take their part: by means whereof, they might wind into the love and good grace of that universal hate, and particularly with the principal Lords of the Nobility. Which speech, when they all had approved; and especially Q. Servilius Perpetuus, who praised the young Gentleman, for that he was not grown out of kind; nor degenerate from the stock and race of the Claudij; then every man was set about this business; to see whom of the College or company of Tribuns they could win and draw to cross and stop the Act for going forward. The Senate now being broken up, the chief of the Nobles caught hold of the Tribuns; and were in hand with them, perswading, exhorting, and assuring them, that they should every one in private gratify not only, but also the whole body of the Senate in general: and never gave over, until they had procured six of them to interpose their negative; and to cross the Law. The morrow after, when as of purpose a matter was propounded afore the Senate, about the sedition which Mecilius and Metellus had raised, by a Large and dangerous consequence; such speeches were by the principal of the Nobles delivered, that each one for himself confessed, that now they were to seek for counsel; and saw no other help nor remedy but in the authority of the Tribuns: so the protection and safeguard of which Magistracy, the Common-wealth betook her self; and fled for succour, as being beset with danger, like some poor private person, and had no other means to save her self: saying, That it would be both for themselves, and also for their authority, an honorable thing, if it might appear, that the puissance of their Tribunship were not more employed in molesting the Senate; and making discord among the States, than in resisting the peevish wilfulness of their collegues. Whereupon arose a great noise through the whole company of the Senators; whiles out of all parts of the Court there assembled, they called upon the Tribuns for their helping hand. Then after silence made, they (who for the favour of the Lords of the Senate were made aforehand to their cause) declared and confessed, that they were ready to cross that act; by their fellows published, seeing the Senate judged it to be prejudicial to the Common-wealth. These Tribuns for the offer of their good service, were by the Senate highly thanked. But the Authors and Patrons of the Act afore said, calling together an assembly of the Commons, when they had inveighed against their fellows most sharply, terming them betrayers of the Common-wealth, and slaves to the Nobles: and using other bitter speeches, gave over their action and suit.

D Two grievous wars had continued all the year next following (wherein P. Cornelius Cossus, C. Valerius Potitus, Quintius Cincinnatus, and M. Fabius Vibulanus, were military Tribuns in Consul authority) but that the Veientian war was deferred by the superstitious fear of their own Princes; whose grounds, Tybris (overflowing the banks) had spoiled and overthrown also the villages and houses that stood thereupon. The Equians likewise by reason of their loss received three years before, made no great haste to aid and assist the Volans, a people of their own nation. For they had made certain rides into the Lavicans Country, confining upon them, and wanted upon the inhabitants, lately there planted. Which trespass by them done they hoped to have been able to maintain, by the banding and assistance of all the Equians; but being forsaken of their allies, they

E lost both their Town and territory, only by siege, and one light skirmish, and never sought for it any memorable war. L. Sextius also Tribun of the Commons, assayed to make an Act, that there might be sent to Vols as well as to Lavicos, Coloners to people it: but by the negative of his Associates, who shewed, that they would not suffer any Statute of the Commons to pass without the assent of the Senate, it came to nothing.

In the year following, the Equians having recovered and won again Vols, and brought a Colony thither, fortified the Town with a fresh power, at what time were Tribuns Military in Consul authority at Rome, Cn. Cornelius Cossus, L. Valerius Potitus, Q. Fabius Vibulanus the second time, and M. Posthumius Regillanus. The war against the Equians, was committed to this Posthumius, a man of a crooked disposition, as his victory shewed more than the whole course of the F war. For having levied an army in haste, and brought it before Vols, after some small skirmishes, he tamed the Equians, and at length entered the Town. And when he had done with the enemies, he began to quarrel with his own souldiers: for whereas during the time of the assault, he had given out by Proclamation, That they should have the sacrage after the Town was once won: he brake promise with them. For I am induced to believe that this was the cause rather why the army mutined and was discontented, than for that in a Town lately sacked before and in a new Colony, there was found less spoil than the Tribun made boast of. But this displeasure and anger once conceived was made the worse after that he returned into the City: for being sent for by his fellows, upon occasion of the Tribunician seditions, there escaped him an indiscreet speech. I must needs say, yea, and without all fence, wily and honesty. Which he let fall in an assembly of the G Commons: wherein it hapned, that as Sextius, a Tribun of the Commons, was preferring the law Agraria, and saying withal, That he would propose an Act, that Coloners should likewise be sent to Vols, for that they were worthy to have both the Town and Lands of Vols, who had by sword and spear conquered the same. Posthumius caught the word out of his mouth. And that shall my souldiers, dearly abide (quoth he) unless they be more quiet. Which word being overheard, offended not so the Com. presently there in place assembled, as the Lords of the Senate awhile after. Moreover the Tribun afore said, an active man, and eloquent withal, having among his adversaries met with a proud humorous spirit, and an insolent and intemperate tongue, which walked so freely and so long by his provocation, that he uttered these speeches, which bred not only ill will and displeasure to himself, but also wounded the cause, and the whole state of the Patrij. This Sextus (I say) was bold, and quarrelling with none of all the Military Tribuns, more than with Posthumius. And even at that time, taking advantage of the same cruel and inhuman speech of his: Hear ye not, O ye Commons (quoth he) how he threatneth mist hiet unto his souldiers, as unto bondslaves? And yet this beast ye will think more worthy of so great dignity wherein ye have placed him, than those that indue you with house and land, that send you abroad to inhabit Colonies, that provide habitation for you against old age, that tending your wealth, take part and defend you against so cruel and proud adversaries. Begin now henceforth to marvel why so few take in hand to maintain your cause: For what may they look for, and hope at your hands? for honors, which ye bestow rather upon your adversaries, than those that are affectionate defenders of the people of Rome. Ye sighed even now and groaned again, at the words uttered out of this foul mouth. But what matter makes that? If ye were now to go to an election, and to give your voyces, ye would no doubt for all that, prefer this man (who threatneth to mischief you) afore them that are willing and desirous to establish your Lands, your dwelling places, and the whole state of your substance and living. But when that lewd language of Posthumius was reported once to the souldiers, it bred a far greater indignation (be sure) within the camp. How now? (say they) is he, who hath intercepted our booty, and defrauded us poor souldiers of our due, not content therewith, but must menace mischief besides unto us, as his varlets? When as therefore they openly muttered the same, and the Quetor or Treasurer P. Sestius thought that the mutiny might be restrained with the same violence by which it was first raised: he sent an Officer to one clamorous souldier, that kept a noise above the rest. Whereupon arose an outcry and a brawl: and he got himself a good rap with a stone for his labour, that he was faine to go out of the presse. And he that smote him, spake aloud besides, and had the Quetor take now that for his pains in a mischief, which the General had threatened his souldiers. Posthumius in this huriburly was sent for, and he, when he was come, made all worse and worke with his sharp examinations, tortures, and cruel punishments. At the last, when he could not see to make an end, nor bridle his choler: they all ran on heaps together, at the lamentable cry of those, whom he commanded to be choked in the mire and killed under the hurdle: and he half besides himself, full foolishly stept down in more hast than good speed from the Tribunal fear, to chastise one that contested with him, and made a great brawling. Now when as the Li-gions and Centurions every where laid about them to make way, and ill intreated the multitude in the throng, they moved their patience so much, that in that furious fit of the souldiers, the Military Tribun was by his own army stoned to death. Which horrible act, after it was noised at Rome, and the Military Tribuns by the Senates authority, were about to sit in commission for the examination of the death of their colleague, by way of rigour and torture: the Tribuns of the Commonalty opposed themselves, and resisted them. But that contention depended upon another quarrel. For the Senate doubting lest that the Commons for fear of those examinations intended, would in their anger create Tribuns military from out of their own body and degree, were very careful, and studied all they could, that Consuls might be chosen again. But when as the Tribuns of the Commons would not suffer an act of the Senat to pass, and hindered also the election of the Consuls, the matter came to an Interreign. But in the end the Nobles had the upper hand. For when as Q. Fabius Vibulanus the Interregent, held a Court for the said Election, there were created Consuls A. Cornelius C. f. f. f. and L. Furius Medullinus.

In the beginning of these Consuls year, the Senate made a decree, that the Tribuns with all speed possible should propose unto the Commons concerning the inquisition of Posthumius his death: and that they should make chief Commissioner and Judge, whom they would. The Commons by the consent of the whole people, gave the Consuls commission to see it done, and performed accordingly. Who notwithstanding, that with exceeding moderation and lenity, they dispatched and ended the matter, by punishing a few, who (as it was credibly thought) made themselves away: yet could they not for all that bring about, but the Commonalty took it very hainously, and in the highest degree, saying, That the Acts and Ordinances, which had been propounded concerning their weal and commodities, those lay a long time asleep in the deck, and nothing done: but an order granted for their bloudshed and death, that was presently put in execution. Of so great force and importance was it. Now this had been the fittest time, that after these mutinous souldiers were chastised, the division of the Volane territory, should have been offered unto them, for to comfort their poor hearts again. By which deed (no doubt) their hot desire and longing after the law Agraria, had been abated, which tended to dispossess at length the Nobles of the common grounds, which they injuriously were seized of. But this indignity stuck in their stomachs, and was taken neerer to the heart. when they saw the Nobility so stiffly bent, not only to keep the common grounds in their hands, which they held by force: but also unwilling to divide among the people so much as the wast and void ground, lately gotten by conquest from the enemies: but that it was like, within a while (as all the rest) to be a booty, and dividend, to be shared among a few.
The same year were the legions led by Furius the Consul, against the Volscians: who foraged the borders of the Hernicks. But finding not the enemy there, they wan Ferentinum, whither a great number of the Volscians had retired themselves. The booty there was less than they hoped
for:

A for: by reason that the Volscians, seeing small hope of keeping the Town, trussed up and carried away both bag and baggage in the night, and quit the Town: which was won the morrow after, being left well near destitute and empty. All the Lands were given freely to the Hernicks. When this year now was passed in good quiet by the modesty and peaceable carriage of the Tribuns, then in place: there succeeded another Tribun of the Commons, L. Teidius, when Q. Fabius Ambustus and C. Furius Pacilius were Consuls. Whiles this man in the very beginning of his year, was busy in stirring new seditions (as if it had been a task imposed upon his name and lineage) by proposing of the Agrarian laws: behold, there arose a pestilence, more fearful than hurtful, which turned away mens minds, from their publick assemblies and accustomed contentions, to tend their houses, and to care for the cherishing of their bodies. And (as men verily think) the sickness was less dangerous than the seditions were like to have been. When as the City was now excused, as it were, and well escaped, with the sickness only of many, and death of very few: presently after this pestilent year, followed (as it is commonly seen) a great dearth of corn, by reason of the neglect of tillage. M. Papirius Atratinus, and C. Manlius Rutilius being Consuls. This famine would have been more grievous than the plague, had they not provided well for corn, by sending forth their Embassadors to the neighbour nations all about, inhabiting along the Tuscan Sea and the Tyber, for to buy grain. Proudly were the Embassadors prohibited all commerce and traffique with the Samnites, who held at that time Capua and Cumes: but contrary-wise bountifully were they relieved by the Tyrants or Potentates of Sicilie. And such was the willing endeavour of Hetruria, that great store of victuals came down the Tyber. In what desolation the City was, during this affliction, the Cons. tryed by this: that when they could not furnish an Embassage, but with one Senator, they were compelled to adjoyn two Knights unto them. And letting aside the sickness and dearth, there was no trouble either at home or abroad for those two years. But when these storms were once overblown, and that care past: then began again the old troubles wherewith the City had usually been disquieted: dissention at home, and war abroad.

When M. Aemilius and C. Valerius Potius were Consuls, the Equians made preparation for wars, and banded with the Volscians. Who albeit they took arms by no publick commission; yet such as would of themselves serve for hire or wages, followed the wars. At the bruit of which enemies (for they were already come over into the Country of the Latins and Hernicks) whiles Valerius the Consul mustered his men and levied souldiers: M. Menenius a Tribun of the Commons, and a publisher of the Agrarian laws, opposed himself against him. And when as by reason of the protection and assistance of the Tribun, no man would be compelled to take a souldiers oath against his will: suddenly news came, that the Castle of Carventus was by the enemies forced. This dishonor thus received, as it was a cause that Menenius was hated among the Noblemen, so it gave to the rest of the Tribuns, who were already framed and prepared to withstand the law Agraria, more just cause to resist their colleague. The matter being thus for a long time protracted by much debating, the Consuls called both God and man to witness, that whatsoever shame or loss, either had been already received, or were like to be sustained by the enemies: the blame should be imputed to Menenius, who hindered the mustering. And Menenius protested again aloud, that if the unlawful Landlords, would surrender the tenure of the common fields which they unjustly detained, he would not stay the musters. Then the nine Tribuns, by setting down a decree between them, made an end of the strife: and pronounced by authority of their colledge, that they would assist C. Valerius the Cons. (all contradiction of their colleague notwithstanding) to award any penalty restraint or chastisement, upon them that refused to be enrolled for warfare. The Cons. being armed with this decree and warrant, after he had caused some few to be had away by the neck and laid fast, that called upon the Tribun for help, the rest for fear were sworn to serve. Thus the army was led forth to the Castle of Carventus. And although the souldiers were as odious to the Consul, as wickedly bent against him, yet at the very first coming, having manfully and lustily dispossessed the garrison, they recovered the fort. The souldiers who were slipt away from the hold, and gone a plundering, by their negligence gave the Romans a opportunity to enter and to surprize in. And a good booty there was: by reason that they had continually gotten prizes, and laid up all there as in a place of safety. Which being sold in portsale, the Consul commanded the treasurers for to bring the money into the common Chamber of the City: giving out these words withal, that the army should then have part of spoil, when they denied not their service in war. Hereupon both Commons and souldiers were more angry with the Consul. And therefore when as by a decree of the Senate he entered the City Ovant, in a pery triumph, the souldiers according to their licentious manner (in that case permitted) followed after with songs and sonnets, answering one another in rude time and gross meeter by alternative staves. Wherein the Consul was greatly blamed, but Menenius the Tribun, his name was set out to the height, his praises were blasoned and extolled aloft: and at every time that he was named, the affectionate favour of the people that stood in the streets appeared, by clapping of hands and great applause, striving much to exceed the songs charped by the souldiers. Which caused the Nobles to look to it, and troubled them more than the malapert sauciness of the souldiers with their Consuls, which is an ordinary and usual fashion among them. And Menenius (who doubtless had been one of the Military Tribuns, if he had sued for it) was excluded from that dignity by an Election of Consuls. So there were created Consuls, C. Cornelius Cossus, and L. Furius Medullinus the second time.

Never took he Com. the matter more to the heart, that the Election of Tribuns escaped their hands:

A pestilence;

hands: which grief of theirs in the Election of Questors, they both shewed and revenged. For H this was the first time that the Questors were made of the commonalty: so that in chusing of 4, there was but one place left for C. Fabius Ambustus, a Nobleman: and 3 of the commonalty, Q. Silius, P. Atilius, and P. Pipius, were preferred before young Gentlemen, of most noble houles. I find that the periwaders of the people to use their full liberty in bestowing their voyces, were the three Teilij, (descended of that house, which ever was most maliciously bent against the Nobles) who were for that year chosen Tribuns of the commonalty, and possessed the peoples heads with a world of great matters, after which they gaped greedily: but so, as they flatly gave out and said, They would not stir at all, if the people had not courage enough, so much as in the election of Questors, which only the Senat. had left indifferent to the commonalty and Nobility, to effect I that which so long they had desired, and now by law was warranted. Thus the Commons assured themselves hereby of a mighty great victory: and esteemed not the dignity of Questorship to be the end and type of honor, but that thereby they seemed to have made a way and overture for new risen upstarts, to be advanced to Consulships and triumphs. The Nobles contrary-wise stormed, not for that their dignities were made common and imparted to other, but for the utter losse thereof: protesting that if things went so on end, they would neither get, nor bring up children any more: who being put from their Ancestors place, and seeing others in possession of their dignity, should be disabled for bearing rule and authority in the state, and be good for nothing but only to be made Priests for Mars, and Flamines for Jupiter, imployed about nothing else but to sacrifice (forsooth) for the people. Thus on both parts were their minds nettled and provoked, K while the Commons took heart, and had three champions of great reputation to back them, and maintain their cause: and the Nobles, seeing all would prove like to the Questors Election (if it lay in the peoples choice) addressed themselves to the Election of Consuls, which as yet was not so free, and indifferent both for Commons and Nobles. Contrary-wise, the Teilij persisted still, and urged the point, that in any hand Tribuns Military should and must be created. For now it was more than time that the Commons had their part in offices of state. But no Action hitherto belonging to the offices and charge of the Consuls had been presented unto them, by the hindering whereof they might wring from them, that which they desired and sought for. But see, how even then, in wonderful good opportunity, word was brought that the Volscians and Equians were departed out of their own Confinnes, and made an expedition into the Latine pale for to rob I and spoil. To the which war, when as by vertue of an order from the Senat, the Consuls began to muster: the Tribuns laboured tooth and nail to hinder it: giving out that this occurrent fortun'd happily on their sides and the Commons. Three there were of them, and all most quick, active and courageous men: yea (and for commoners) of good birth, and worshipfully descended. Whereof twain took in hand, by their continual travel to attend and watch the Consuls, to keep them awork, and either of them to hold one occupied: the third, was appointed to entertain the commonalty: and in all assemblies, with their Orations, one whiles to rein them in, another while to give them the head, as occasion required. But all this while, neither Consuls went through with the musters, nor the Tribuns with the election which they desired. But afterwards when fortune began to incline to the Commons side, Messengers came with news, that while the souldiers that M lay in garrison at the Castle Carventiana, were slept aside to get a booty, the Equians having slain a few warders that kept the hold, entered it: and that all the souldiers were slain: some as they ran into the fort again, others as they were scattered in the fields. This thing falling out so cross against the whole State, gave strength yet unto the designments of the Tribuns. For being dealt withal, that now at length they would surcease from hindering the war, nothing would prevail: for that they neither gave place to the publick calamity and necessity, nor yet regarded their own private peril of displeasure: and they obtained in the end that an Act of Senat was granted for to chuse Tribuns Military. Howbeit with this expresse proviso, it was capitulated: That none of them who had been Tribuns that year of the Commons, should be eligible and propounded: no, nor chosen again Tribuns of the Commons for the year following. Whereby, no doubt, the Senat N noted and pointed at the Teilij, whom they charged to seek to be Consuls, for a reward of their seditious Tribunship. Then went the mustering forward, and preparation of war, by consent of all the States.

Sundry Authors write diversly and make doubt, whether both the Consuls went to the Castle Carventiana, or whether one of them stayed behind in the City for to hold the foresaid Election. In this they disagree not, but set down for certain: that when they had assailed the Castle a long time without effect they were compelled from thence to remove: and that Verragus in the Country of the Volscians by the same army was recovered, and that great foraging there was, and driving of booties, both in the Country of the Equians and also of the Volscians. Now at Rome, as the victory of the commonalty rested in this, that they had the Election which they desired: so O in the issue and successe of the Election, the Nobles had the better. For besides all mens hope and expectation, there were three Tribuns Military chosen with Consuls authority, all of the Nobility, C. Julius Tullus, Cn. Cornelius Cossus, C. Servilius Hala. Men say that the Nobles used a subtile practise and cunning device, which even then the Teilij charged them with: to wit, that by intermingling a many of unworthy and unmeet competitors with others of mark and quality, they had alienated the peoples hearts from the commoners, seeing them to be men of no worth, and loathing the notable balenefic that appeared in their persons.

- A After this, tidings came, that the Volscians and Equians (were it that the Castle of Carventus which they held and guarded still, put them into some hope: or their garrison and fort lost at Verrugo drave them into anger) were up in arms, with all force ready to make war: that the Antians were the principal and chief in this intended action: that their Embassadors had solicited the people of both nations, rebuking their cowardize, for keeping within their walls, and suffering the Romans the year before, to forrage and drive booties in their territories, and the garrison of Verrugo to be surprized and lost. Moreover, that not only hosts of armed men were sent against them, but Colonies also were planted in their frontiers and marches: and that the Romans not content to divide their lands and goods among themselves, had bestowed upon the Hernicks the town Ferentinum, which they had won from them. At these speeches they were kindled and set on fire: and in all places whither they went to solicit, the younger sort and able men in great number were levied. So the youth and manhood of all those nations, gathered together to Antium, where they encamped themselves, and expected the enemy. Which tidings being brought to Rome, caused more fear then need was. And the Senat presently (which in all fearful occurents was ever their last remedy and refuge) gave order that a Dictator should be created. Which thing Julius and Cornelius, two military Tribuns (they say) took in great displeasure. And hereof ensued much heart-burning and dissention, whiles the LL. of the Senat of one side complained in vain of their grievances, That the Tribuns Military would not be ordered by the authority of the Senat: and at the last had recourse to the Tribuns of the Commons for help: alledging withal, that the very Consuls power upon the like occasion had been by their authority overruled and set down. And the Tribuns of the Commons on the other side, rejoycing at the discord of the Senators, made answer again, and said, "That for their parts, they were not able to yeeld any succour at all, who were of no reckoning themselves, being reputed neither in the roll of Citizens, nor yet so much as in the number of men. But if so be (say they) dignities and honors were communicated to us, then would we provide and take order, that by no pride of any magistrat whatsoever, the Senats decree should be made frustrat and disannulled. And in the mean whiles, seeing the Nobles were exempt from all reverence of laws, and regard of magistrates, let them of themselves also exercise the Tribuns authority if they would. This discord falling out so unfitly, when so great war was in hand, occupied and possessed mens heads a long time: whiles Julius and Cornelius one after another, thus reasoned and discoursed: That seeing they themselves were Captains good enough for the conduct of such a war, it was not meet, that the honour once bestowed upon them by the people, should be made void and taken from them. Then Servilius Hala, who also was a Tribun Military spake and said: "I have been silent thus long, not for that I was doubtful in mine opinion, or to seek what to say, (For what good Citizen (quoth he) would have his advice by himself, and go from the publick Councel?) but because I had rather, that my brethren of their own accord should give place to the Senats authority, than to suffer the Tribuns power to be called for, against them. And even now also, if the case would permit, I could willingly give them time and space to retract their too too obstinat, perverse and peremptory opinion. But seeing that the necessities of war, wait not upon human counsel, I will have more respect and consideration of the Weal-publick, than of the favor of my brethren. Wherefore, if the Senat persist still in that mind and resolution of theirs, I will the next night following nominat a Dictator. And if any one withstand me, I will ask no more, than the power and vertue of the Senats Act. By which speech of his, having won deserved praise and thanks of all men, he declared Publius Cornelius Dictator, and was himself by him nominated General of the horsemen. A singular example to teach as many as beheld him and his Collegues, That otherwhiles favour and honor soonest fall to them that least desire the same. The war was smal and nothing memorable: for in one easie and slight battel were the enemies overthrown and slain at Antium. The army upon this victory wasted the Volscians Country, won by force the Castle upon the lake Fucinus, and within it took three thousand prisoners: having chased all the rest of the Volscians within their walls, not able to keep their frontiers. The Dictator, after he had performed this war in such sort, as only he might not seem to neglect his wonted fortune but keep it still in ure, returned into the City with greater felicity than glory, and resigned up his place.
- F The Tribuns Military, making no words at all of the chusing of Consuls (for anger, I suppose, that a Dictator had been created) published the election of Tribuns Military. But then the Senators were in greater care and perplexity, seeing their cause betrayed even by those of their own company. Wherefore, as in the former year, by sojsting in the basest of the Commons for competitors, they had caused even men of good worth to be despised: so, now by procuring the principal of the Nobility, both for honour and for favour, to stand for the dignity, they obtained all the places to themselves: so as no one Commoner could be chosen. So there were created four, all having afore born that Magistracy, L. Furius Medullinus, C. Valerius Potitus, Cn. Fabius Vibulanus, and C. Servilius Hala. This man was chosen again to the place, as well in regard of other vertues and worthy parts, as for the late favour which he won by his rare moderation, and singular carriage of himself.

of Servilius Hala.

In that year, for as much as the time of truce with the Veientian Nation was expired, they began by Embassadors and Heralds of Arms, to challenge of them amends and restitution. Whom as they entred into their territory, the Embassage of the Veientians encountred in the way requesting them not to go forward to Veii, before they had presented themselves to the Senat of Rome.

Who

Who being thither come, obtained of the Senat, that for as much as the Veientians were at civil discord among themselves, they would not claim any amends at their hands. Lo, how far they were from seeking their own vantage by other mens distress and calamity. Also at the Volscians hands they sustained damage by loss of their garrison at Verrugo. But (see what a thing it is to slack the time) For whereas the souldiers besieged there, by the Volscians and sending for aid in due time, might have been rescued if speed had been made, the army which was sent for succour, came too short, and after the fray was ended. Only this exploit they did: The enemies, who after their fresh massacre committed upon the garison, were gone abroad stragling for to raise booties, were by them overtaken and put to the sword. The cause of this slackness was imputed to the Senat, rather than the sovereign Tribuns: who because intelligence was given, that they in the garrison resisted and defended themselves most manfully, little considered, That there is no prowess of man whatsoever, but by valour again it may be overmatched. Most brave and valiant souldiers they, that neither whiles they lived, nor after death were unrevengeed.

The year following, when P. and Cornelius both surnamed Cossus, C. Fabius Ambustus and L. Valerius Potitus were Tribuns Military in Consuls authority, began the Veientian war by occasion of a proud and arrogant answer returned by the Senat of the Veientians: Who commanded that the Embassadors which came to claim amends, should take this for their dispatch: That unless they departed presently out of the City and Country, they would serve them as Lars Tolumnius had done others before. The Senators of Rome hardly could digest that: and therefore decreed, that the Military Tribuns should propose unto the people as speedily as might be, even the day before to morrow, concerning proclamation of open war, and sending defiance to the Veientians. Which as soon as ever it was noised and published, the younger sort and men of service, murmured and muttered in this manner: "That as yet they had not tully ended the war with the Volscians: that even of late two whole garrisons were lost, and their throats cut, and the forts kept still with danger and great hazard. There is not (say they) a year passeth over our heads, but one field or other is fought: and as if we had not work and trouble enough already, there was now intended new war with a most mighty nation confining upon us, and which was like enough to raise against us all Hetruria. And as they were forward enough of themselves to conceive thus, and utter these speeches, so the Tribuns of the Commons were not behind to buzze more matters into their heads, and set all on a light fire: Who gave out still, That when all was done, the greatest warring was between the Nobles and Commons: and that the Commons on purpose were to be toiled out with travel or warfare, and exposed to the enemies for to be murdered: and that they were to be kept far off from the City, and as it were confined and sent out of the way: left by being quiet at home, and minding their freedom and Colonies, they should consult and devise, both how to dispose of the common grounds, and to give their voices freely. And ever as they could meet with any old beaten souldiers, they would hold them with talk, take them by their hands, reckon up how many years they had done service in war, fall to telling of their gashes and scars, asking them what whole place they had left in their bodies to receive new wounds, and what blood was behind to spend and shed, in the quarrel of the Common-wealth? When as by iterating these and such like speeches, both in their private talk and conference, and also other whiles in their publick assemblies, they had turned clean away the hearts of the Commonalty from taking war in hand: the foresaid Act propounded, was put off until a farther day, and lay still for the time. Which no doubt, had been nipt in the head, and never would have passed farther, in case it had been referred and subject to the hard opinion and conceit of men, as then they stood affected. In the mean whiles agreed it was, that the military Tribuns should conduct an army into the Volscians country. Cn. Cornelius alone was left at Rome. The three Tribuns, after that they perceived the Volscians in no place encamped, and nothing minded to try a battel, parted themselves three ways to waste and forrage the frontiers. Valerius he marched to Antium, Cornelius to Eccure. And every way as they went, they spoiled all before them, both house and field, and all to amuse & keep the Volscians occupied that way. But Fabius without any forraging at all, came directly to assault Anxur, which was the service most desired. Now Anxur was that, which at this day is called Tarracino, a City seated upon marishes. And on that side Fabius made shew of assault. But there were four cohorts under the leading of C. Servilius Hala sent out to fetch a compass: who having gained the hill that over-looketh and commandeth the town, from that higher ground, with a mighty shout and outcry assailed the wall, where it was disurnished of guard to defend it. At which sudden alarm, they were amazed who manned the wall of the base town against Fabius: and suffered them to set ladders to, and to scale. By which means every place was full of enemies. And upon the walls for a good while there was nothing but killing, as well those that fled, as those that resisted armed and unarmed, one with another. So that, albeit they were too weak, yet forced were they to fight: because in yeelding they saw no way but one. But upon proclamation once made, that none but armed men should be killed, all the multitude besides willingly were disarmed. Of which number there were upon 2500. taken alive. From the sackage Fabius kept the souldiers, until his Colleagues were come: saying, that Anxur was taken as well by those armies, which had driven away the rest of the Volscians from the defence of that place, as by themselves. Who being come, the three armies jointly ransacked it, & had the pillage for their labor of that rich town, that had gathered wealth a long time.

Which

A Which courtesie and bountifullness of the commanders, was the first thing that reconciled Commons and Nobles together. Over and besides this munificence of the Rulers, the Nobles also began in a most happy hour to be liberal unto the multitude. For before that either the Commons or Tribuns made the motion, the Senat decreed, that souldiers might have their pay out of the City chamber; whereas before that time, every man in that service had born his own charges. Never was there any thing, by report, so joyfully accepted of the Commons: who ran by heaps together to the Councel house: took the Senators by the hands as they came forth, and said, "They were now truly called Patres, i. Fathers, confessing that now the day was come, that in the "quarrel of so bounteous a City, there was no man would so long as his breath lasted, spare either limb or life. Seeing that this commodity they should have to help them, namely, that during the time that their bodies were employed, and busily occupied in the defence of Commonwealth, their private estate should stand at one yet, and not decay. And forasmuch as it came of themselves, and never moved by any of the Tribuns of the Commons, nor called for and craved importunately, by their importune speeches; that was it, that multiplied their joy, and made the boon it self much more acceptable. But the Tribuns of the Commons (who only had not their part in this common joy and concord of all States) came in with their opinion, and said, that it would not prove so joyous and happy to the Nobles all in general, as they supposed: that this courte and order taken, was at the first sight better then it would be found in the practice and execution. For how could that money possibly be made and raised, but by levying a tribute or payment of the people? they were therefore liberal; but of other mens purses. But admit, or say, that the rest would bear it, yet those neither could nor would endure it; who were past war-service, and lived upon their pensions and annual salary: who would grudge and repine, that others hereafter should serve in war for more gain then they had in their time done; who having been charged with the pay of their own service, should now again be put to contribute to the wages of others. With these words they moved part of the Commonalty. Last of all, when there was a levy exacted, the Tribuns also proclaimed, That they would bear as many out, as would not contribute to the souldiers pay. The Nobles continued still to maintain that which they had so well begun, and were the first that opened their purse, and for that as yet they had no silver coin, some of them carried gross pieces of brasse in Wains to the treasure house, and made a goodly shew of Contribution. When as the Nobles had most faithfully paid according to the rate of their wealth: the chief of the Commons also, friends of the Nobility, as it was afore agreed, began to lay their penny to theirs: whom when the common sort saw both to be commended of the Nobles, and to be admired and revered of the souldiers as good Citizens: they all upon a sudden, refusing the Tribuns assistance, began to strive who should pay first. And the decree or act being once passed, of proclaiming war against the Veientians, the new Tribuns Military led an army to Veios, consisting much upon voluntary souldiers. Now the Tribuns were T. Quintius Capitolinus, P. Quintius Cincinnatus, C. Julius Tullus the second time, A. Manlius, L. Furius Medullinus the third time, and M. Emylius Mamercus. And these were the first that besieged Veii.

E About the beginning of which siege, when the Tuscans held a Councel in a solemn assembly at the Temple of Vaturna, they could hardly agree upon this point. Whether the Veientians should be defended by general war of the whole Nation, or no. The year following was the siege not so hor, by reason that some of the Tribuns, and part of the forces, were called away to the Volscian war. The Tribuns Military in Coss. authority, that year were, C. Valerius Potitus the third time, M. Sergius Fidenas, P. Cornelius Maluginus, Cn. Cornelius Cossus, C. Fabius Ambustus, Sp. Naminus Rutilius the second time. With the Volscians there was a pight field fought between Ferentinum and Eccetra; wherein the Romans had the day. Then the Tribuns began to lay siege to Artena a Town of the Volscians: where, by reason of a sallying forth by them attempted, the enemies were driven back into the town; and the Romans took occasion and vantage thereby, to break in with them pell mell, and so they won all, save only the Castle. Into this fort naturally fenced, a good company of armed men betook themselves: but beneath the Castle, many a man was either slain or taken prisoner. Afterwards was the fortress besieged also. Neither could it by assault be forced, for that there was a guard sufficient to man it, considering the bigness of the place: nor gave the assailants any hope of yeelding, for before the town was lost, they had conveyed all their publick provision of corn into the Castle. So that the Romans had for very wearisomness departed from thence, but that a bondslave betrayed it unto them: who let in certaine souldiers at a steep high place, and those were they that won the fortress: for when the warders were by them slain, the rest of the multitude with sudden fright were soon overcome, and yeelded. Thus, when both the Castle and town of Artena was sacked and spoiled, the legions were brought back from the Volscians, and all the Romans power employed against Veii. To the traitor aforesaid, there was given besides liberty, the pillage of two households for a reward. And he was named ever after Servilius Romanus. There be that think Artena was a town of the Veientians, and not of the Volscians: the occasion of which error is, for that there was a town of that name between Cere and Veios. But that town the Roman Kings destroyed: and it belonged to the Ceretes, and not to the Veientians: but this other, whereof we have reported the destruction, was in the country of the Volscians.

The Fifth Book
Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the fifth Book.

AT the siege of Veii, the souldiers had holds made them for to winter in. Which being a new kind of service, struck an heat in the Tribuns of the Commons, who complained that they had no rest from warfare, so much as in the winter season. Then the Gentlemen of Rome began first to serve upon their own horses. When the Alban lake overflowed, a certain Prophet or Wizard was taken captive from the enemies, who should interpret that strange wonder. Furius Camillus, after ten years siege, won Veii: he translated the Image of Juno from thence to Rome. The tenth part of the spoil and saccage he sent to Apollo at Delphi. The same Camillus being Tribun military, whiles he laid siege unto the Falisci, sent back again to the parents, his enemies sons that were betrayed unto him: Whereupon the Falisci yielded themselves; and so by his righteous and just dealing, obtained victory over them. When one of the Censors C. Julius was deceased, M. Cornelius was substituted in his place: Which was never done again afterwards, because in that five years space, Rome was taken by the Gauls. Furius Camillus, being indicted by L. Apuleius a Tribun of the Commons, departed into exile. When as the Senones a people of the Gauls, besieged Clusium, and the Embassadors sent from the Senat to conclude a peace between them and the Clusines, fought themselves in person against the Gauls in the Clusines army. The Senones hereupon made quarrel, and with a cruel army came against the City of Rome: and after they had defeated the Romans at the river Allia, they were Masters of the City, all but the Capitol, into which the able and serviceable young men of the City betook themselves. The elders with their ornaments of state belonging to the offices that eachone had born, they flew sitting in the porches and entries of their houses. And when they were now gotten up to the top of the Capitol, by the back side of the hill, they were discovered by the gagling of Geese, and were turned down, principally by the valour of M. Manlius. Afterwards when through famine the Romans were forced to covenant and grant for to give them the sum of 1000. pound weight of gold, and for that to buy their redemption from the siege: Furius Camillus, who was created Dictator in his absence, came with an army, whiles the gold was in weighing: and drove the Gauls out of the City, after they had been possessed of it six months, and slew them. A Chappel was built to Locutius: in that place where before the taking of the City, there was a voice heard, that the Gauls were coming: Whereas it was purposed and propounded to remove to Veii, because the City of Rome was burnt and razed: that course by the advice and authority of Camillus was crossed and dispatched. The people was moved thereto the rather, by occasion of the omen of a word spoken by a Centurion, who being come with his band of souldiers into the Forum, was heard to say thus, Stand souldiers, here will be our best abiding place.

The fifth Book of T. Livius.

VWhen peace elsewhere was obtained, the Romans and Veians were at war, with such mutual malice and hatred: that it seemed, whether part were vanquished, should come to final destruction. The assemblies for the election of the Rulers of both Nations, far differed one from the other. The Romans augmented the number of Tribuns Military in Consuls authority: for eight of them (so as never afore) were created: M. Aemilius Mamercus the second time, L. Valerius Potitus the third time, Appius Claudius Crassus, M. Quintilius Varus, M. Julius Tullus, M. Posthumius, M. Furius Camillus, and M. Posthumius Albus. The Veientians contrariwise, being weary of suing for dignities every year (a cause sometimes of civil discord) made themselves a King. Which offended the people of Hetruria: who as they abhorred all regal government, so they hated the person of the King himself. He had aforetime oppressed that nation, in regard of his greatness and pride withall: in that he had violently put down their solemn playes, the intermission whereof was held unlawful and detestable. For upon a time, in an anger that he received a repulse, and by the suffrages of the twelve Nations, another was preferred before him to be high Priest, in the very midst of their solemn Games and sports, he took from them the very Players and Actors, whereof a great sort were his own servants. That people therefore given to superstition above all other, and so much the rather for that they excelled in the skill of religious observing the same, decreed to deny the Veientians their aid, so long as they were governed under a King. This decree was suppressed and not spoken of at Veii for fear of the King, who would accompted him that should report such rumor, for a sower of sedition, rather then an author of news. The Romans, albeit they heard that all was quiet from Hetruria, yet because they were advertised that in all the Dicters and Councils of that Nation, the question was on foot and much debated, made their fortifications at Veii, so as they stood two wayes: some looked towards the City against all sallies and eruptions of the townsmen: others fronted Hetruria, to stop all succours that haply might come from thence. But the Roman Captains having greater hope in long siege, then in quick assault, began to build wintring harbours (a strange thing to Roman Souldiers.) Their intent was all winter time to keep continual war. Which after it was told at Rome to the Tribuns of the Commons

- A Commons (who now a long time could find no matter and occasion of troubles and alteration) they leapt forth into the assembly of the people, sounding and soliciting the minds of the Commons, and often saying, "That this was the only matter, why a set pay was appointed for the souldiers: and that they were not ignorant, That the gifts of enemies would prove to be belmeared with poison: That the freedom of the Commons was bought and sold: That their young men were sent away far off, and as it were banished from the City and Common-wealth, so that now they had not so much spare time as winter, nor any season else of the year, for to visit home and see unto their estate. What think ye (say they) is the cause of continuing this warfare? No other verily should they find it but this, left by reason of the frequent number of those young men, in whom the whole strength of the Commonalty consisted, there might be something dealt in, and effected, concerning their commodities. Over and besides they complained how they were much more hardly used, then the Veientians, For as for them, they spent the winter within their own houses, defending their City, fortified both with goodly walls, and also by natural situation of the place: but the Roman souldiers abode by it still in labour and travel, shrouded under booths of poor hides, overwhelmed with snows and frosts, not laying away their harness and weapons, so much as in winter the ordinary time of rest from all wars both by sea and land. This manner of hard bondage, neither the Kings, nor those proud and imperious Consuls (before the Tribuns authority was ordained to take them down) nor yet the Lordly ruling Dictator, nor the insolent and unsupportable Decemvirs, ever enjoined: thus to dwell in continual souldiery, as these Tribuns Military do: who exercise upon the Commons of Rome, an absolute and kingly authority. What would they do another day, when they were Consuls or Dictators indeed, who now but repreienting only the Consuls government (as Vice-Consuls) are so cruel and unreasonable? But we are well enough served, and justly have deserved no less. For that there was not so much as one place for a Commoner amongst eight Tribuns. Afore time, the Nobles were wont with much labour and toil, to fill but three rooms: and now they go eight in a rank together, to obtain all charges and dignities of State and Government: and in that throng, a Commoner cannot have a place amongst them, to put his Colleagues in mind (if he did nothing else) that they that go to warfare were freemen yet, and Citizens with them, and not bondslaves. Who in winter at the least, ought to be brought again to their houses and homes, and once a year visit their loving parents, their sweet children, and best beloved wives: to make some use of their liberty, and chuse their Magistrates. These and such like speeches, whilst they broadly uttered and multiplied, they met at length with an adversary that was able to match them, Appius Claudius, left for the purpose at home by his brethren in office, to restrain the Tribuns seditions: a man ever from his tender youth trained up in the broils and contentions of the Commons. Who certain years before (as we have said) gave shrewd and unhappy counsel to dissolve and put down the Tribuns authority, by the contradiction and inhibition of their own Colleagues. This man being not only in wit prompt and ready, but also exercised by long practice, made at that time this or such like speech: "If ever doubt were made, O Quirits, whether the Tribuns of the Commonalty have for love of your good or their own particular vantage, been always the authors and beginners of discord and dissention, this year I know assuredly, ye need no more stand in doubt. And as I rejoyce ye are at length come to an end of this your long wandering, so I congratulate both you, and the Common-weal for your sake, that this error is cleared, and especially in the midst of your prosperity. Is there any man maketh question now, that the Tribunes of the Commons were not offended, nor took snuff so much at the injuries at your hands received (if haply there have sometimes been any) as at the bounty of the Nobles, towards the Commons, in allowing pay to those that serve in war? What think ye else, either they feared then, or would at this day disturb and disquiet: but only the concord and agreement of the States? Which they suppose tendeth most, and is sufficient, to abolish and overthrow the Tribuns authority. And verily, as naughty Artisans or lewd leeches, seek for work still, and would be ever doing: so they likewise desire to have something or other out of frame and amis, in the Commonweal, that to the repair and cure thereof, they might be ever sent for and employed. For whether do ye (and speak truth) maintain or impugn the commonalty? Are you the adversaries or the advocates of them that serve in the wars? Unless peradventure this be your saying, Whatsoever the Nobles do, it misliketh us, be it for the good of the common people, or to the prejudice and dammage. And even as masters forbid their own servants and slaves, to have any dealing at all with strangers, and think it meet and reason, that they meddle neither hot nor cold with them: even so forewarn ye the Nobles from all commerce and entercourse with the Commons: to the end, that neither we by our courtesie and liberalitie, should allure and win them: nor they again become dutiful and obedient to us. How much more ought you (I pray you) if there were any spark (I say not) of civilitie, but of common humanitie and good nature in you, rather to favour, and as much as lieth in you, foster and cherish, as well the gracious kindness of the Nobles, as the willing service and obedience of the Commons? Which accord, if it were perpetual, who would not undertake to warrant, that this Seignory and Empire, within a while, might prove the mightiest and most renowned of all those States that border hard upon our confines? As for this purpose intended, and plot devised by my Colleagues, whereby they would not have the army withdrawn away from the siege of Vesii, before the service were brought to an end:

The Oration
of App. Claudius.

"how it would not be only profitable, but also necessary, I will hereafter argue and prove. Now
 "for this time, I list rather to treat and speak of the present condition and state of those that are "employed there in warfare. Which Oration of mine, if it were pronounced, not before you only,
 "but also in the camp, and there canvassed and scanned of, by the very army it self, I suppose, would "seem equal, and be received for good and reasonable. Wherein, if nothing else should come in-
 "to my head to speak, I would content my self, and rest satisfied with the only speeches given "out by the very adversaries. They said of late, That pay was not to be allowed to the souldiers,
 "for that never before it had been allowed. How then can they now be offended, and so male-
 "content, if they who have some new commodity coming to them, be enjoined also new labour "proportionably? For never lightly is there travel any where without gain, nor gain common"ly without travel and employment. Pains and pleasure, things of themselves in nature most un"like, yet by a natural kind of society (I know not how) are linked together. The souldier (afore-
 "time) thought much to bestow his labour & service upon the Common-weal, at his own pro"per charges: yet was he glad with all his heart, that one part of the year, he might look to home,
 "husband his land, and get maintainance to find himself and his, both at home in City, and abroad
 "in war. Now, taketh he contentment, and is well pleased, that the Common-weal is gainful to "him: and with joyful heart receiveth his wages. Let him likewise be content, with patience to
 "to forbear his house and family (since he is at no great charge) somewhat longer than ordina"ry. Might not the Common-weal, if she would call him to a reckoning, justly say: Yearly "pay thou hast, perform therefore thy yearly service? Dost thou think it reason, to receive full "wages for the whole year? and to be employed but six months for it? Much against my Sto"mach, O Quirites, enforce I this point, and dwell still in this one part of my Oration: for
 "in this wise ought they to reason that have mercenary and hired souldiers: but we will use "them as fellow Citizens, and think it meet likewise that they entreat us kindly, and speak unto "us as to their native Country. Either it behoved us, not to have begun the war at all; or else
 "to proceed forward, now it is begun: yea, and for the honour of the people of Rome, to finish
 "it with all speed possible. And finished it will be, if we press upon our enemies thus besieged:
 "if we depart not afore we have accomplished our hope, by the winning of Vesii. And surely, if "there were no other cause but this, even the very shame and indignity of the thing, might force
 "us to continue siege unto the end. In old time, the whole power, of Greece laid siege full ten years
 "to one City, and that for one only woman: How far (good god) from their own home? how "many lands and seas between? Are we then loth and weary being within 20. miles of our dwel"ling place, and almost in the sight of our own City, to endure the toil of one years siege? Be"cause (forsooth) we have but small cause given us to war: and not griefs enough that might "justly provoke us to abide and see the end. Seven times already they have rebelled: In peace
 "never were they true. Our Country have they spoiled and wasted a thousand times. The Fide"lats they have caused to revolt from us. Our inhabitants there by us placed, they have slain: and "against all law of nations they were the principal instruments of that unworthy and unhuman
 "murder of our Embassadors. All Hetruria would they have raised up against us, and at this day "about it they go. And when our Embassadors came to demand amends, they had like to have "run upon them and killed them. And ought we then with these kind of men to stand at a bay
 "and to war coldly and by leaseure? But if so just an hatred as this move us not: do these things
 "(I pray you) move a whit move you neither? Their City is environed and beleaguered with deep "trenches: blocked with mighty sconces, whereby the enemy is pent up and pinned within his "own walls. His fields he cannot till, and what so ever was afore tilled, hath been destroyed by "war. If we dislodge and withdraw our army back, who doubteth, but that they (not for desire
 "only of revenge, but upon necessity also and constraint to prey of other mens goods, having lost "their own) will invade and overrun our country? So that by this means we defer not the war,
 "but bring it within our own borders and confines. But now as touching that which properly
 "indeed concerneth souldiers (of whom our good Tribuns of the Commons would now in all "the haste seem to have so great regard, from whom erewhile they would have wrested their wa"ges:) but what is that (I say?) A trench they have cast, a rampart and platform they have raised,
 "(matters of exceeding travel and labour) so far about: sconces at the first a few, but after as "their army encreased, they have erected very thick in every place. Forts they have built, not "only to command the town, but also looking toward Hetruria, to impeach any relief, if any aid "should from thence come. What should I speak of the rolling frames and towers, the man-
 "tlets and other Fabricks? What should I speak of the Tarraces, Tortoises, Rams, and all other
 "engins of assault and battery? Think ye it meet, that after so great toil and pains taken, now "that the works at length are brought to an end, these things should be left and abandoned, that "against summer we should be new to begin again, and sweat afresh about the same? How "much less travail rather is it to keep these munitions already made? to be instant, and con"stant to endure, and abide? yea, and to rid our hands of all the care at once? For surely we may "soon dispatch the service, if it be plyed throughly and followed on still without stay; and if we "ourselves by these intermissions and respits between, make not a long piece of work of it, and "draw our hope at length. Thus much of the labour and loss of time. What else? Considering
 "these so many Parliaments, these Diets and Councils continually in Tuscany, about sending "aid to Vesii, can we forget the danger that we incur by deferring the War? Indeed (as things

- A "now presently stand) I confess the Tuscans with the Veientians are angry, they hate them and deny to send: and for any thing by them done, we might win Veii out of hand. But who dare warrant, that if the war be delayed, they will hereafter be of the same mind? Seeing that if the Veientians have any rest and breathing time given them, they are like to send oftner their Embassages, and those more honourable than heretofore. Also the King who newly is set up and created at Veii (the only thing that now offendeth the Tuscans) in process of time, may be changed for another governor, either by agreement of the State (thereby to reconcile the hearts of the Tuscans) or of his own accord: who will not peradventure that his princely regiment should be hurtful to the safety of his subjects. See how many things, how many inconveniences follow and ensue upon that course and manner of proceeding. The loss of the fabrick and fortifications, with so great labour already prepared and achieved: the imminent and present wasting our own borders: the Tuscans war instead of the Veientians. These your devices, O ye Tribuns, are much what like to his, that offering a sick man some kind of meat or drink, for the very present to gratifie him withal, to please his palat and to content his taste, maketh his disease long, and peradventure incurable: who might have been recovered out of hand, in case at once, he would have resolutely endured the right cure of a skilful Physitian. And surely, if it were not material to the managing of this war in hand, yet would it import much to martial discipline, that our souldiers should be acquainted, not only with the sweet fruit of a victory achieved, but also if occasion required longer time, to abide this tediousness: and to wait for the end of their hope, be it never so long, and if war be not finished in summer, to stay for winter: and not as summer birds by and by in the fall of the leaf, to look about and seek for housing, harbour and covert. Consider, I beseech you, and see. The love and pleasure of hunting carrieth men into mountains, woods and Forrests: through frost and snow, after their game: shall not we then use the like sufferance in the needful exploits of war, which passimes sports, and delights, are wont to draw and fetch out of us? Think we the bodies of our souldiers so effeminate, their hearts so tender and delicate, that they cannot for one winter abide in a camp, and forbear their home, but must needs war as men at sea, watching times and seasons, and observing the quarters of the year? Cannot they endure both parching heat and chilling cold? They would blush and be ashamed verily, if a man should therewith charge them: and they would stand still in this, and avouch, That they had both in body and mind manlike sufferance and patience: and that they were souldiers as well for winter as summer: and that they set not the Tribuns a work for any patronage of cowardise and shelter of idleness: but remembered well enough, that their forefathers were not under shade for fear of sun-burning, nor had their houses over their heads for taking cold, when they first created and ordained that magistracy of Tribuns. This rather is befitting the valour of your souldiers, this fitteth well the name of Romans, not to have their eye upon Veii only, and this war now in hand, but to seek for fame and glory both by other exploits, and also with other nations in time to come. And think ye that there would ensue hereupon a small crack of credit, and hazzard of reputation? Would ye have the neighbor nations confining upon us, conceive thus of the people of Rome, That if a City could receive their first brunt, and abide their assault for a very small while, it need not after to fear any more? Or rather should not this dread and terror of our name spread all abroad, both far and neer, That no wearisomness of long siege and assault, no violence of bitter winter, is able to raise the Roman army from any town once by them invested? as knowing no other end of war but victory? and whose manner of service is not by way of violent force more then of obstinate continuance, which (as in all other military occasions) so in besieging of Cities is most needful: the greatest number whereof, being either by strong bulwarks and other fortifications, or by natural situation impregnable, yet by famine, by hunger and thirst, process and tract of time only doth force and overthrow. As it will (I doubt not) Veii at length: unless the Tribuns of the commonalty succour our enemies: unless that the Veientians find that relief and aid at Rome, which they seek in vain throughout all Hetruria. For can there ought happen to the Veientians so wished for, as that first the City of Rome should be full of variance, and then the Camp, (as it were by a contagion from thence) as full of mutinies? But contrariwise I assure you, amongst the enemies, so good order there is and government, that neither the tediousness of long siege, nor yet the loathing of Kingly rule, hath caused any stir or commotion amongst them. No, nor the denial of help from the Tuscans hath one whit troubled and distempered their minds: but die he shall forthwith, that is the author of sedition. Neither shall any man there be suffered to speak those words, which are spoken here amongst you without any punishment or controlling. He deserveth the bastinado, to be dry beaten and wel cudgelled, that forsaketh his Colours, or departeth from his guard and quarter. But here, in open assemblies, they that perswade and counsel not one or two souldiers, but whole armies to leave their Standards and Ensigns, and abandon the very camp, have audience with applause. Inomuch, that whatsoever a Tribune of the Commons speaketh, although it were to betray the City, and undo the whole State, ye are used to hearken and give good ear to him: and being ravished and carried away with the sweetness of that authority, ye suffer under it to lurk any mischief whatsoever. There remaineth now no more but this, that the words they give out here with open mouth, the same they might iterate in the camp among the souldiers, to corrupt the army, and not suffer them to obey their Captains. For to such licentious liberty they are grown at Rome, that they fear and reverence neither neither Councel nor Magistrate, neither Laws nor ancient Customs, neither Decree of Senators, nor yet the Discipline of Military service.

Now was Appius with his Orations good enough for the Tribuns; and able to meet them at every turn: But see; (a thing that no man would have thought) a loss and foil received before Vei made Appius to have the better hand of the cause, wrought a greater unity among the States, and kindled an ardent desire to assail Vei more hotly, and to besiege it with more resolution. For when they had raised up a mount neer unto the City, and approached in a manner to the walls thereof, with their rolling towers and roofed mantlets, whiles (I say) they were not so vigilant in the night season to tend and watch these Fabricks, as they were busie and earnest in the day time to rear and plant them; behold, all of a sudden the enemies opened a gate, and armed in great numbers, especially with burning firebrands, set all on a light fire: and in the space of one hour consumed both the mount and the mantlets, which had cost so long time in making. And many a man besides that came to help (but in vain) by sword and fire lost his life. Which being reported at Rome, made all men heavy and sad, and caused the Senators to take care and fear, how upon this accident, they might possibly prevent and stay, either commotion in City, or mutiny in camp: doubting lest that the Tribuns would have insulted over the Common-weal, as if they had gotten a great conquest. At what time, they that were by calling Gentlemen and so assailed, and had no hopes of service assigned them from the City, after some consultation together among themselves, suddenly came into the Senat: and having liberty granted of speech, promised to serve in the wars with horses of their own. After that the Senat had right honourably thanked and given them most gracious words, the news thereof was no sooner bruited through the market place and whole City, but behold, all on a sudden the Commons came running unto the Councel house, saying, that as they were then to serve as footmen, so they offered their service to the Commonweal extraordinarily without mustering, whether they should be led, either to Vei, or to any other place whatsoever. And if they were conducted to Vei, they would not return again (they say) from thence, before they had won that City from their enemies. At which words, the Senators so exceedingly joyed above measure, that hardly they could temper themselves. For they took not order, as they did by the Gentlemen and horsemen afore, that they should be praised by the mouth of the Magistrates thereto appointed, nor called them into the Councel house, there to give them an answer, neither could they keep themselves within the Councel house door. But every one of them in his own behalf, so well as he could signified from aloft, both by word of mouth, and gesture of hand, unto the multitude standing in the Comitium, a general joy conceived: saying, That the City of Rome in that concord and unity would be happy, invincible, and perpetual: commending the horsemen, praising the footmen, extolling and magnifying that very day, and confessing that now they had surpassed the courtesie and bounty of the Senat. So that Nobles and Commons both, for joy wept again who could weep most, until the Senators were recalled into the Court: where a decree was made, That the Tribuns Military should assemble the people, and give thanks both to horsemen and footmen, and promise in the name of the Senat, that they would be mindful of their affectionate kindness to their Country: and to signify that it was their pleasure, that they all, who had offered extraordinary service so willingly, should have their pay notwithstanding: yea, and for the horses also there were assigned a certain rate and proportion of wages. This was the first time that the Gentlemen began to serve on horseback for money. This voluntary army marched to Vei, and not only repaired again the works which had been destroyed, but also went in hand to erect new. And from the City was provision of victual brought, with greater care of convoy than afore, that nothing might be wanting to an army so well deserving of the Common-weal.

The year following had for their Military Tribuns in Consuls authority, C. Servilius Hala the third time, Q. Servilius, P. Virginus, Q. Sulpitius, A. Manlius the second time, and M. Sergius the second time. In these Tribuns time, whiles every mans care was bent to the Veientian war, the sort of Anxur being neglected, by occasion that the garrison souldiers were disbanded and ranged much abroad, and commonly received Volscian Merchants into the town, was suddenly surpris'd, by reason that the warders of the gates were betrayed. Less company of souldiers there were slain: because that all of them (besides those that were sick) found themselves occupied and traded all the country over, and in the Cities adjoining, like to lawless lackies that follow the Camp. Neither was there better success at Vei, wherein rested the chief care now, of all their publick affairs. For not only the Roman Captains were more angred one at another, than courageous against the enemy: but also the forces of the enemies were encreased by the sudden coming of the Captains and the Falisci. Which two nations of Hetruria, because they inhabited next, supposing when Vei should be forced and lost, that their turn would be next to be warred upon by the Romans: and the Faliscians besides, upon a special grudge and old quarrel of their own, for that aforetime in the Fidenat war, they had intermeddled and interested themselves, sent their Embassadors to and fro, and by binding themselves by a solemn oath one to the other, came unlooked for with their power to Vei. And by chance they assailed that side and quarter where M. Sergius a Military Tribun had the charge of a sconce. Who gave a great alarm and caused exceeding fright: because the Romans supposed certainly that all Hetruria was raised out of every part, and there present, with all the power they could make. The same imagination animated the Veientians also within the City, to make a sally. So was the Camp of the

A the Romans assailed on both sides. And while they ran together up and down, and turned their ensigns every way, and could hardly keep the Veientians within the strength of their fortress, nor yet repulse the violence from their own fortifications and ramparts, and defend themselves from their forraign enemies behind: their onely hope was to have help from the greater leaguer: that the legions in sundry places might make head, some against the Capenats and the Falisci, others against the sally of the townsmen. But Virginus had the charge of that main camp, one that bare a privat grudge and inward malice against Sergius, and was hated again of him. This man, when word was brought that most of the Fabricks and bulwarks were assaulted, that the ramparts and trenches were won, and that the enemies on both sides charged lustily, kept his souldiers well appointed in arms: saying, that if there were any need of help, his Colleague should send unto him, if he would. And he for his part was not so arrogant and insolent, but the other was as peevish and wilful. Who because he would not seem to seek unto his adversary, nor crave aid at his hand, chose rather to be vanquished of his enemy, than to overcome him by help of a fellow-Citizen. Thus between them for a good while the poor souldiers went to wrack, and were slain. At the last, forsaking their ramparts, a very few of them escaped into the maine camp. But the most part, with Sergius himself, went through to Rome. Where when he had laid all the fault upon his fellow in government, it was thought good that Virginus should be sent for out of the camp: and that in the mean while their Deputie, and Lieutenants should command the forces. Hereupon was the matter debated in the Senat, and the two Tribuns kept a taunting and reviling: and many hard tearms were dealt between them. Few there were that rendered the common good, but took part either with the one or the other, as each of them were fancied and beloved. Howbeit the I.L. of the Senat thought good, howsoever that so shameful chance hapned either through the default, or unlucky fortune of the Captains, not to expect the ordinary full time of the election, but that presently there should be new Tribuns military created, to enter into their office on the * Calends of October. To which opinion when they were all agreed, the other Tribuns military nothing gainsaid it. But Sergius and Virginus (for whose sake it appeared that the Senat was weary of the Magistrates that year) at the first made means & besought them not to disgrace and discredit them so: and afterward assayed to cross the decree: denying that they would give over their place, before the * Ides of December, which was the set and usual day of entering yearly into new offices. Amid this business, the Tribuns of the Commons, who had kept silence even against their wills, so long as men were at unity and the affairs of the City prospered, upon a sudden brake out and threatened sharply the two Tribuns Military, that unless they would submit themselves, and rest in the authority of the Senat, they would commit them to ward. Then C. Servilius Hala, a Military Tribun, stood up and said, "As for you and your threats, O ye Tribuns of the Commons, in good faith, I would gladly see once, that there were no more power and authority in these here, then will and stomach in you. But who seeth not that there is no striving against the authority of the Senat? And therefore hold ye content: and forbear you to seek opportunity and occasion upon our variance to offer wrong. And my brethren for their parts shall either do that which the Senat thinketh good: or else if they shall continue E stubborn still in their contumacy, I will presently nominate a Dictator, to force them to leave their office. This speech was approved with a general accord. And the Senators being glad that without the terrors and affrightments of the Tribuns authority, there was found out another greater power to bridle magistrates: the two military Tribuns aforesaid, were overweighed with the content of all parties, and held a new election of military Tribuns, to begin their government on the * Calends of October: and before that day they resigned up their places. Thus were L. Valerius Potius the fourth time, M. Furius Camillus the second time, M. Emilius Mamercus the third time, Cn. Cornelius Cossus the second time, C. Fabius Ambustus, and L. Julius Tullus, Tribuns military in Consuls authority.

In whose time many worthy Acts were performed both at home and abroad. For not onely they had war in sundry places at one time, namely, at Veii, at Capena, against Falerii, and with the Volsci, to the end that Anxur might be won again and recovered from the enemies: but at Rome also, what about musters and paying the tribute for souldiers pay, there was much trouble. Besides, there was some variance, about taking in certain Tribuns of the Commons to the rest: and the two arraignment of those, who a little before had governed in Consuls authority, caused no small stir. But the principal care of the Tribuns military, was that the muster should go forward. Neither were the younger sort and serviceable men only prest forth, but the elder also compelled to give their names, and to keep watch and ward in the City. But look how much greater was the number of souldiers, so much more money they needed for their payment. And the same was levied by a contribution: but unwillingly of as many as tarried at home. For that besides the levy G they were enjoined to become souldiers also, in defence of the City and to serve in person for the Commonwealth. These things, grievous as they were of themselves, so by the seditious Orations of the Tribuns in their assemblies, they seemed more grievous and heavy. Who argued and discoursed thus, "That wages was appointed for souldiers to this end, only that what by warfare, and what with exactions and impositions, they might undo the Commons, and make an end of them at once for ever. One war (say they) hath now continued three years, and the same, on set purpose, ill managed, that it might be drawn out the longer. Again, in one muster there were armies enrolled for no fewer than four wars, whereunto beardless boyes and old crasse men, were

"were taken up and haled forth. Now there was no difference of winter or summer: so as the "poor Commons at no time can have any rest. Who now at last are taxed also and racked to the "uttermoſt, ſo that after they have brought home with them their bodies overtöyled with travel,
 "weakned with wounds, and laſt of all, waſted and ſpent with age: and finding all things at "home unhuſbandred by reaſon of the long abſence of the maſters and owners, they muſt be fain

The inveſtive ſpeech of C.
Trebonius a-gainſt Sergius and Virginus.

Between the muſters of one ſide, and the levy of ſouldiers pay on the other ſide, and their minds occupied about greater affairs, at the election of Tribuns of Commons, the number could not fully be made up: Whereupon there was great labour made, that into the rooms that were void, I there ſhould be ſome of the Nobility taken in and admitted. When that could not be obtained, yet to impeach and overthrow * the Tribuns law, it was effected or brought to paſs that they ſhould aſſume unto them for Tribuns of the Commons, C. Lacerius, and Marcus Atilius, by the might and praſtiſe no doubt of the Patritii. It hapned, ſo that the ſame year C. Trebonius was a Tribun of the Commons, who would ſeem to undertake the patronage and defence of the Law Trebonia, and diſcharge it as a duty to that name and houſe belonging. He ſpake aloud and ſaid, " That
 " whereas the Tribuns Military had won that, whereof ſome of the Nobles had born the repulſe
 " in their firſt ſuit, and that the Law Trebonia was diſannulled, in that certain Tribuns of the Com" monalty were taken into their fellows, not by ſuffrages and free voices of the people, but by the " rule and commandment of the Nobles: and that the matter was come to that paſs, that either K
 " Noble men, or their favourites and followers were to become Tribunes of the Commons: that " their ſacred laws were taken from them perforce, and the Tribuns authority wreſted from our
 " of their hands by violence: all theſe inconveniencies he complained to have hapned through " the fraudulent praſtiſe of the Nobles: and the miſchievous lewdneſs and treachery of his own
 " companions in office. Thus whiles there grew great heart-burning among them, and that not
 " the Nobles only, but alſo the Tribuns of the Commons, as well they, which were elected, as they
 " that were electors, were hardly thought of by the people: Then three of the Company, P. Cu- riatius, M. Metilius, and Minutius, fearing ſome ſhrewd turn, like to fall upon Sergius and Virgi- nus, (the Tribuns military of the former year) and by ſerving proceſs, giving them a day to anſwer, turned from themſelves the anger and diſpleaſure of the Commons, upon thoſe two perſons: I publiſhing openly, " That whoſoever were grieved for the muſters and the Tribute, whoſoe-
 " ver thought the war long, and the continual ſouldiery tedious, whoſoever ſorrowed for the " damage and diſcomfiture received at Veii, whoſoever for the loſs of their Children, Bre" thren, Kinsfolk, or any of their alliance had heavy and mournful houſes: to them they offered " liberty and power to vent their publick and privat grief, upon theſe two guilty perſons and of" fenders, Sergius and Virginus, the very cauſes of all the miſchiefs and calamities that were hap-
 " ned. For why? the adverſary charged them with no more then was confeſſed by the very par" ties: who finding themſelves both faulty, laid the blame one upon the other: whiles Virginus
 " reproached Sergius with running away, and Sergius laid treaſon to Virginus his charge, in that " he denied his help in time of need. For to ſay they were both of them ſo inconfiderate and M " fooliſh only, were to ſpeak beyond all compaſs of belief. But much more likely it was, that " there was ſome packing rather, and that the matter was contrived, and praſtiſed of ſet pur" poſe, and by an ordinary and common fraudulent plot of the Patritii. By whoſe means both " at the firſt the Veientians gat opportunity to fire their works, thereby to draw out and pro-
 " long the war, and alſo now the army was bought and ſold, and the Roman camp betrayed to " the Falifci. And all this to no other end, but that the youth and flower of the City might wax " old at Veii, and that the Tribuns might not propoſe and conſult with the people about the di-
 " ſtribution of lands, or any other commodities of the poor Commons, or in frequent and full
 " aſſembly of Citizens intend and follow their publick actions, and withſtand the conſpiracy of " the Gentry and Nobles. Moreover there is already (ſay they) a prejudice paſſed againſt theſe N " offenders, both by the Senat and people of Rome, and alſo by their Colleagues. For as they " were diſplaced and depoſed from their office, by an Act of the Senat: ſo when they reſuſed to " give over, they were for fear of a Dictator forced by their own companions to reſign up their " government: and the people of Rome had created other Tribuns military to enter into their " charge, not upon the uſual day which was in the * Ides of December, but forthwith in the Ca-
 " lends of October: as who would ſay, the Common-wealth had not been able to ſtand any lon" ger, if theſe men had remained ſtill in place. And yet for all this, theſe perſons thus convicted " and fore-condemned by ſo many prejudices, come now to be judged of the people: thinking
 " they are ſufficiently quit, and diſcharged, yea, and have ſuffered puniſhment enough, in that " they were two months ſooner then ordinary, made private perſons; and perceive not, that O " thereby was taken from them the power only to do any harm, and no puniſhment inflicted up" on them. For as much as, even their very Colleagues, who had not offended, were likewiſe
 " diſcharged as well as they: Let the Quirites therefore and people of Rome, take that heart to " them again, which they had upon the late overthrow, freſh and bleeding new, when they be" held the army running in fearful flight, ſore wounded and agast, arriving at the gates, bla" ming no fortune, nor any of the gods, but only theſe their two brave leaders. And as for us,
 " we know aſſuredly that there is not one of all them here preſently aſſembled, who that day cur-

* The 13. day of December.

- A sed not in his heart and detested the head, the house, and whole estate of L. Virginii, and M. Sergii. Neither is it convenient, that upon whom, erewhile every man prayed that the anger and vengeance of God would light against them now when they both may and ought, they should not extend their full power with rigour. Since that even the very gods never lay hand themselves upon sinners and offenders: but it sufficeth that they arm the wronged and oppressed persons with means and opportunity of revenge. The Commons upon these speeches moved with indignation, condemned their two offenders in 10800. brazen Asses a piece: notwithstanding that Sergius pleaded for himself, blamed the common fortune of war, and laid all upon fortune: and Virginii besought them (but both in vain) that he might not be more unhappy, and speed worse at home, than abroad in war. Thus the peoples wrath being diverted upon these two, obscured and darkned the remembrance both of the assumption and admitting of the Tribuns aforesaid, and of deluding and disannulling the Law Trebonia. The Tribuns thus having got the upper hand, to the end that the Commonalty might have a present reward for awarding this doom, publish the Law Agraria, and forbid the levying of the Subsidy for souldiers pay: seeing there was need of pay for so many armies: and sped so well they had, in the managing of warfare, as they were like to come to an end, without any warring at all. For at Veii the pety camp which was lost, being recovered again, was fortified with strong bulwarks, and furnished with good guards. The Tribuns Military, M. Emilius and Q. Fabius, had the charge there. And as for M. Furius in the Faliscan, and Cn. Cornelius in the Capenat Country, they could meet with none enemies without their town walls. But they drave away booties, and wasted their marches, by firing their villages and their corn: but as for their towns, they neither assaulted nor besieged them. But in the Volscian country, after their territory was wasted, Anxur also was assaulted (but in vain) for that it was situate on high. Whereupon Valerius Potitus, who had the charge of that province, seeing that force would not prevail, began by trench and rampart to lay siege to it, and invest it round. The affairs of war abroad standing in these terms, there arose domestical strife and sedition at home: and the same was followed more earnestly and with greater ado, than the wars weremanaged without. And when by reason of the Tribuns there could no subsidies and exactions be gathered, nor money for souldiers pay sent to the Generals, and that the souldiers called on them hard, and were hasty for their wages: the camp also had like to have been troubled and infected with the contagion of those civil mutinies. During these heats and angry fits of the Commons against the Nobles, albeit the Tribuns of the people said, That now the time was come of establishing their freedom, and translating the chiefest dignity from the Sergii and Virginii, to the Commoners, such as were men of valour and action: Yet they prevailed no more then thus, that one only of the Commonalty, (as it were) to make entrie and take possession in the right of that dignity to wit, P. Licinius Calvus, should be created Tribun Military with Consular authority: the rest were all of the Nobility, Pub. Manlius, and P. Titinius, P. Melius, L. Furius Medullinus, and L. Popilius Volsens. The very Commons themselves marvelled that they had obtained so great a thing, and not he only who was created, a man that aforetime had never been in place, and born no magistracy, yet an ancient Councillor of State, an elderly person, and well
- E slept in years. Neither as yet is it for certain known, why he first and above all others was counted a meet man to have hance, or make essay of this new dignity and promotion. Some think, that for his brother Cn. Cornelius his sake, who had been the year afore a Tribun Military, and had given to the horsemen triple pay, he was through favour drawn in, and called to so great honour. Others, for that himself had picked out a convenient time, and made a plausible Oration, that both Nobles and Commons liked very wel, concerning the agreement and unity of the States. The Tribuns of the Commons rejoicing highly for this their victory in the Election, remitted and called in the Inhibition of the subsidy or imposition aforesaid, the thing that most of all prejudiced the service of the Common-wealth. By means whereof payment was made in all dutiful obedience, and sent it was unto the army. Then within short time was Anxur (in the Volscians
- F Country) recovered: by occasion that on a festival holy day, the watch and ward of the City was neglected. This was a year notable and famous for the cold and snowy winter, so as the high ways were choaked up, and Tyberis was unnavigable; Howbeit, by reason of provision brought in aforehand, the price of corn arose not. And for because P. Licinius, as he entred his government without any troubles, and with greater joy and contentment of the Commons than indignation of the Nobles: he also ruled and executed it all the year long accordingly: therefore their teeth watered at the next election also, to make Tribuns military of their own body. Only M. Veturius, of all the Nobility that stood in suit for the dignity, had a place among them. But as for the other Tribuns Military in Consular authority, all the Centuries in a manner chose Commoners, to wit, L. Titinius, P. Menenius Raquilus, Cn. Genucius, and L. Attilius.
- G After this hard Winter, either by reason of a distemperature and disposition of the weather, suddenly changed to a contrary, or upon some other hidden and unknown cause, there followed presently a contagious and dangerous summer, by occasion of a pestilence, noisom to all kind of living creatures. Of which incurable malady, when as neither the reason could be found, nor any end thereof seen, the Books of Sibylla, were by a decree of the Senat perused: and Dumvirs appointed for Divine Rites and Ceremonies, by celebrating a Lectistern (then first instituted in the City of Rome) to appease and pacifie Apollo, Latona, and Diana, Hercules, Mercury and Nep-tune: feasted them (as it were) for the space of eight days together, & for that purpose they set out three three beds or banquetting tables, with as magnificent and stately furniture as could be for that time possibly devised. Which solemnity was privately also performed; All the gates and doors through the City stood wide open; all sorts of viands were set out abroad to be used in common: open house kept for all comers, one with another, as well unknown strangers as their acquaintance, with all friendly welcome, and entertainment. Kindly, and courteously would they talk and devise, even with their adversaries: all chiding and brauling was laid aside and put under foot. The prisoners also for that time were enlarged, yea, and conscience made afterwards; that any should be laid or kept in irons, unto whom the gods had vouchsafed that gracious meed.

But all this while much trouble there was, and many alarms before Veii, by reason that three wars were joyned now in one. For when as all at once the Capenats and the Falisci came (in manner as afore, about the fortifications and trenches of the Romans) for to rescue the besieged, they were forced to make head, and hazard a doubtful battel against three armies. But the best help they had, was the remembrance of the late condemning of Sergius and Virginus. Therefore having conducted by a neerer way, their forces from the greater camp (which before lay still and would not come to succour) they set upon the Capenats backs, as they turned against the ramparts of the Romans. The battel there begun, made the Falisci also afraid: in which affright of theirs they suddenly sallied out of the lesser hold, in so good time that they forced the enemies to turn their backs, all quaking for fear. And having got the upper hand, they followed the train of the victory, and in the chase made a very great slaughter and destruction of them. And not long after, the forragers that wasted the land of the Capenats, as they ranged abroad here and there, encountered the residue and remnant of this battel, as if fortune of purpose had presented them to their hands, and swept them up clean. Also many of the Veientians as they fled back into the City, were cut in pieces before their very gates: whilst they within for fear lest the Romans at once should rush in, made the gates fast and so shut out the hindmost of their own men. These were the achievements of this year.

And now approached the Election of the Tribuns military, whereof the nobles had in a manner a great care then of the war: as who saw now that the sovereign rule was not only parted with the Commonalty, but welnear on their own behalf quite lost. Therefore albeit of set purpose they had prepared most noble and excellent men to stand in suit, whom to pass by and let slip, they thought the people would have been ashamed: yet nevertheless they themselves (as if they had been the parties that stood) tried every way, and not only sought the help of men, but also craved it at the hands of the gods: making it great scruple and a matter of conscience: and alledging that the elections for two years past were not according to the wil of God: as appeared by this, say they, that in the former year there was an intollerable winter, and such as portended some heavy judgements from above; how also the year following, there were no prodigious tokens shewed aforehand, but even the very events and effects thereof, were seen and felt: namely, the pestilence both in Country and City, through the very indignation, no doubt, of the gods, for that in the fatal Books of Sibylla it was found out, that they ought to have been pacified, for the diverting away of that pestilent influence. As if in those solemn assemblies which ought in the name of the gods & religiously to be held, the gods thought it an indignation and unseemly thing, that the honourable offices of state should be made common: no distinction of degrees, no difference of houses observed, but all confused and shuffled together. The people therefore being driven into amaze, not only in regard of the Majesty and Dignity of those that were competitors, but also of a very remorse of conscience, chose for Tribuns military in Coff, authority, all of the Nobility: and a good part of them, the most honorable personages of the rest, to wit, L. Valerius Potitus the first time, M. Valerius Maximus, M. Furius Camillus the third time, L. Furius Medullinus the third time, Quintius Servilius Fidenas the second time, Quintus Sulpitius Camerinus the second time. Howbeit in this year no great exploit worthy of record, was performed at Veii under these Tribuns. All the service that was, consisted in forraging and wasting. The two Lord Generals raised huge booties, to wit, Potitus from Falerii, Camillus from Capena: leaving behind them nothing whole and untouched, that might be spoiled by fire or sword. In this mean time, many fearful prodigious tokens were reported, the most part whereof were slenderly credited, for that of each there was but one only author: and because there were no soothsayers, by whom they might make procuration therefore (since that the Tuscans were now professed enemies) they were altogether neglected. But one especially there was, which all men had an eye and regard unto, namely, for that a certain pool within the Alban Forrest, without extraordinary rain from above, or any other occasion which might make the thing seem less miraculous and wonderful, was risen unto an unusual height. Certain Orators therefore were sent to the Oracle of Delphi, to know what the gods foresignified by that prodigious token. But they, as god would, met with an interpreter of the Destinies neerer home, to wit, an ancient Veientian, Who (upon a time, when as the souldiers, both of the Romans and Tuscans, let fly one at the other taunts and scoffs from their stations and guards) thus spake in propheticall wise: That until the water were drained and let out of the Alban poole, the Romans should never be masters of the town of Veii. Which saying of his was at the first contemned as a foolish word, rashly let fall from him: but after, it began to be much talked of, so long, until a certain Roman souldier from out of his ward, enquired of a townsman that warded next unto him (for now by reason of long war they had entercourse of speech one with another) what he was who had cast out such an ambiguous riddle of the Alban Lake?

The Alban lake risen to a wonderful height.

A When he heard that he was a southsayer, being himself also a man not without some sense of religion, he trained that wisard forth to communication, pretending that he would gladly be resolved himself, as touching a particular prodigious object that troubled his mind: & therefore requested him at his good leisure, to take so much pain as to confer with him, and give him counsell about the expiation and diverting the danger thereof. Now when they were both gone a good way from their fellows, unarmed, and without all fear and suspicion one of the other, the Roman being a lusty tall young man, caught the feeble old fellow in the sight of them all, and notwithstanding a great stir that the Tuscans made (but all in vain) had him away perforce to his own company; Who being brought before the General, was sent afterwards to Rome unto the Senat. And being demanded what the meaning of that should be, which he had prognosticated and prelaged concerning the Alban lake, answered thus: "Certainly the gods were offended with the people of Vei; that day on which they put this into his mind to bewray the fatal and inevitable destruction of their State and country: and therefore that, which as then he being stirred by divine inspiration had prophesied, neither might he call back again and unspeak: and besides, happily by concealing those things, which the immortall gods would have to be published, there might be committed as great sin, as by disclosing mysteries to be concealed. Thus therefore (quoth he) is it written in the fatal books of fortunes, and thus in the Tuscans learning, to us is delivered, That when the Alban water overflowed, if then the Romans with due and religious ceremonies let it out, they should have the victory of the Veientians: but before that the gods would not forsake the walls of the Veientians. Then went he on still, and shewed what was the solemn and right manner of deriving the water. But the Nobles, supposing without to be the light of credit, and not of sufficient account in so weighty a matter to beleeved, resolved to expect the Embassadors, and the answer of the Oracle of Apollo. But before these messengers were returned from Delphi, or any expiation found out for this Alban miracle, the new Tribuns Military with Consuls authority, L. Julius Tullus, L. Furius Medullinus the fourth time, L. Sergius Fidenus, A. Posthumius Regillensis, P. Cornelius Maluginensis, A. Manlius, began their government.

of Vei.

In that year there arose new enemies, the Tarquinians, they seeing the Romans busied with many wars at once, with the Volscians at Anxur, who laid siege to the fort there: with the Etruscians at Lanuvium, who assaulted the colony of the Romans: besides, with the Veientians the Faliscians and Capenates: and that within the City there was no greater quietness, by reason of variance between the Nobility and Commons: supposing, I say, that hereby they had good opportunity to do some injury and harm, they sent forth certain bands of souldiers lightly appointed, into the territory of Rome, to forrage and make spoil: thinking that the Romans would either put up that wrong at their hands without revenge, because they would not charge themselves with a new war: or encounter them and make head with a small power and the same but slender and distressed. The Romans was more offended at the indignity of these bravadoes, then they cared much for the spoil done by the Tarquinians. And thereupon they neither made much ado about the matter, nor drove it out any long while, A. Posthumius and L. Julius levied a power without any ordinary muster (for letted they were by the Tribunes of the Commons) even in a manner of voluntary souldiers, whom they had procured with good words and comfortable speeches. And passing throughout the country of the Caeris by crooks & crooked waies, surprized the Tarquinians upon the sudden, as they returned from plundering & laden with great prizes. Many they slew, all they eased of their loading: and thus having recovered the spoils of their lands, they returned to Rome. Two daies were allowed for the owners, every own to own his proper goods: & on the third day, such goods that were unknown (whereof the most part belonged to the enemies) were sold in port-sale: and that money which was made thereof was divided among the souldiers. All other wars, and especially the Veientian, had doubtfull issue. For now the Romans despairing of a I mans help, regarded and expected only the course of destinies and the will of the gods. By which time the Embassadors were returned from Delphi, bringing the answer of the Oracle, agreeable to the former answer made by the wisard, which was taken prisoner: and it ran in this forme: Be ware O Romans that the Alban water be not kept too long in the pool. Bewear thou let it not discharge itself into the sea. Let it forth and wear the fields therewith, by sundry rivulets or streams thou shalt waste it and draw it dry. Then assault valiantly the enemies walls, remembering that one of this City which so many years thou hast besieged, victory is promised to thee assuredly, by those destinies which now are revealed. And after the war ended and conquest achieved, see thou bring unto my temple, an ample and honourable present: and perform the sacred ceremonies of thy country according to the old custome, and renew those a fresh which have of late time been neglected. Here grew this capitaine prophet above said to be greatly accounted of: and the Tribunes military, Cornelius and Posthumius, began to take his counsel and advice, about the procuration of the Alban miracle, and to appeale the gods in due order. And found it was at last where it was that the gods blamed the neglect of ceremonies & for letting the ancient solemnities and sacrifices: and that certainly it was nothing else, but that there was an error committed in creation of the Magistrats: and they so created, had solemnized the Latine holidays wrong and celebrated the sacrifices in the Alban mount amiss. The only purging or expiation wherof was, that the Tribunes military should give over their office, and that they should take new Auspices again by the sight & singing of birds, and so to proceed to an Interreign. All which things were according to a decree of the Senat performed. Whereupon there interregents succeeded one after another. M. Valerius, Q. Servilius Fidenas, M. Furius Camillus. But all this while no end there was, nor intermission of troubles and dissensions. For the Tribunes of the Commons disturbed and staid the assembly for the election to long, untill it was agreed that the greater part of the Tribunes military should be created from the Commons.

During these affaires, the Tuscans held certain Diets and Councils at the Temple of Volumna: where when the Capenats and Falisci required that with one common assent and resolution, all the people of Hebrunia should raise the siege from Vesii, this answer was returned: "That heretofore they had denied the Veientians their help in this regard, that they were not to seek for aid at their hands, from whom in so weighty a matter they had not sought for counsell: but now their own fortune made answer for them. For such was the difficulty of their present estate, That if they would, yet they well could not: considering especially how into that part of Hebrunia there were newly arrived to seat themselves there, the Gauls, a strange nation unto them: with whom they neither had assured peace, nor yet certain war to trust unto. Howbeit for blood-lake, and for the very name, and in regard of the present perils of their kinsmen, they would grant thus much: that if any of their youth would go forth to the war willingly and of themselves, they would be no hindrance. Now was it noised at Rome, that a mighty great number of these enemies were come to raise the siege. Whereby the civill discords of (as it is commonly seen upon a generall fear) began to wax more calm and to slake. For the principall Tribe that had the prerogative to give their first voice, chose P. Licinius Calvus Tribune Military, without his own suit (but not against the will of the Nobles) a man of approved good carriage, and moderation in his former government, but exceeding old. And it appeared evidently, that all the rest for that year, should be chosen anew after him, out of the Colledge of those that had been Tribunes Consular befores: namely, L. Titinius, P. Menenius, Q. Genucius, L. Atilius: who befores they were elected and pronounced, P. Licinius Calvus spake in this manner (by the permission of the Interregent) unto the other Tribes, that were called in their right and orderly course, to their suffrages. "I see well, my masters O ye Citizens of Rome, That in this election, wherein ye have in remembrance our former Magistracy, ye guess and presage happily against the year ensuing, concord and unity: the only thing at this time of all others most profitable: in case I say, you chuse again, those who by experience also are become now more sufficient. But as for me, you see I am not the same man I was: but a bare shadow and name only is all that is left of P. Licinius. The strength of my body crasie, and feeble, the sense of my eyes and ears dim and dull: my memory faileth, the quicknesse of my spirit grown heavy and lumpish. But behold (quoth he, laying hand on his son) this young man, the very image and portraiture of him, whom ye afore time made Tribune Military, the first that ever was out of the commonalty. Him trained and brought up after my own order and discipline, in stead of my self, I bequeath, I give, I dedicate unto the commonweal. And I beseech you O Quirites, that the dignity which of your selves you have offered unto me, without my seeking, you would bestow upon him at his own humble suit, and the rather shew him this favour at my earnest request in his behalf. The father had his desire granted. And so his son P. Licinius, was with them, whom befores we named, declared Tribune Military in Consuls authority. Titinius and Genucius Tribunes Military, made an expedition against the Falisci and Capenats: Who managing the war in greater heat and courage, than with sage advise and counsel, plunged themselves headlong into an ambushment of their enemies. Genucius paid for his rashnesse, and made amends by an honorable death: For he was slain even befores the ensignes, valiantly fighting in the vanguard of the battell with the foremost. But Titinius, having after much fear rallied his soldiers, retired himself unto an high hill, and made head again: Howbeit he durst not encounter the enemy on even and plain ground. The shame of this defeat was greater than the losse otherwise. And yet it had like to have turned into a right great damage and overthrow. So great was the fear, not at Rome only, whither much news came diversly reported: but also in the camp befores Vesii, that hardly could the soldiers be kept from running away. For it was noised all over the camp, that the Capenats and Faliscians had got the victory, slain the Generals and the whole army: and that all the flour and strength of Tuscany was not far off. But at Rome there was much more hurly-bury: For there it was verily beleevved, that the leaguer about Vesii was assauked, and that, part of the enemies already were coming in warlike manner against the City: so as they came running on heaps to man the wals. And even the very matrons and dames of the City, whom publike fear had caused to leave their houses, fell to their beads and supplication in the churches: beseeching the gods to avert and divert destruction from the houses, Temples, and wals of the City of Rome, and to turn away that fear from them upon Vesii if they renewed aright their festivall daies, if they made satisfaction by sacrifice for the prodigious fights, and no otherwise.

Now by this time were the solemn plaies & the Latine holidays renewed, now was the water let out of the Alban lake into the fields, now Vesii drew neer to her final end, hastned by the course of the Destinies. Therefore there was created M. Furius Camillus Dictator, the fatal captain, predestined to destroy that City, and to save his own country: who appointed P. Cornelius Scipio Collo-nell of the horsemen. The change of the General made a change soon of all things else. The hopes of men were other than afore, the minds of men were altered, yea, the fortune of the City seemed not the same. But first of all, he proceeded by martiall law against them, who in that fearfull

A fright at the last alarm, were fled from Veii: and taught his souldiers not to fear their enemies most, but likewise to stand in awe of their own Commander. And after he had published to take musters upon a certain day, himself in the mean while rode post to Veii, there to encourage the hearts of the souldiers. From thence he returned to Rome, for to levy a new army: and there was not one that refused to serve under his standard. For even the youth of the forrainers both Latins and Hernicks, came & offered their service in that war. Unto whom, when as the Dictator had in the Senat house yeelded thanks, and that all things now were in sufficient readinels, by a decree of the Senat he made a vow, that when he had won Veii, he would incontinently celebrat the great games, and reedifie and consecrat anew, the Temple to dame Minerva, which afore time had been dedicated by King Servius Tullius. Thus when he was gone forth from the City, and his army on foot, with greater expectation of the people then hope: first he fought a field with the Faliscians and Capenats in the Country of Nepe, [called at this day Nepe] where he ordered all the exploits with as great discretion and policy as might be: and as it commonly falleth out he sped as well and fortune favoured his designs. He not only defeated his enemies in batell, but also drave them out of the field, and gained a huge booty, whereof the greatest part came to the Treasurer his coffers; and somewhat (though not much) was given to the souldiers. From thence he marched with his armour to Veii, and there he caused more sconces and bastillons to be made, and to stand thicker together. And having made proclamation, that none should fight without speciall commandment, he withdrew the souldiers to the making of trenches and rampiers, from their skirmishes that they made oftentimes, and that rashly, between their camp and the wall of the town. The greatest work of all the rest and most laborious, was the undermining that was begun into the Castle of the enemies. And to the end that this work should not be intermitted, nor yet the continuall labour still under the ground might over-toil them: he divided the pioners into six parts, and each of them wrought six hours round by turns, so that both night and day, they never gave over before they had wrought a way to the Castle. The Dictator seeing now the victory as it were in his hands, and a most rich City ready to be taken, and that there was like to be such saccage, as never had been the like in all the wars put together aforetime: lest that he might incur either any mutiny and anger of the souldiers in pinching and scant parting of the pillage, or displeasure and discontentment of the Rulers and Nobles of Rome, by so prodigall a largesse in sharing all: dispatched his letters to the Senat, to this effect, "That whereas by the goodnesse of the immortal Gods, his own policy and direction, and the travell of his souldiers, the City Veii was now in a manner at his devotion; what they would advise, should be done with the rich spoils thereof. There were two divers opinions that mightily distracted the Senat: the one of the old P. Licinius, whose mind being asked of his son, spake first (by report) and said: that his opinion was, there should a proclamation be published abroad among the people, that whosoever would be partaker of the booty, should go to the Leaguer before Veii. The other of Ap. Claudius, who finding fault with this new, prodigall, unequal, and undiscreeit largesse, in that they thought it unlawful and unfit, that the treasure got of the enemies should come once at leastwise to the common purse of the City, which had been emptied to often by reason of wars: was of advice, "That the souldiers should have their pay out of it, that the Commons thereby might be eased, in the charges of the subsidy levied of them: for so should every mans house equally feel the society and part of that benefit, and the hands of idle persons remaining at home in the town, greedy now of rising, and who would be fingering of Pillage, should not pluck from the hardy warriors their due rewards. For as much as it is usually seen, that as the valiantest man commonly aimeth at the greatest part of travell and perill, so the more coward alwaies reacheth at the biggest portion of the spoil, and hath his hand deepest therein. Contrariwise, Licinius, alleged that such mony laid up would be alwaies suspected and odious, and would mixt matter unto the Commons of criminations & finding one fault or other, whereof seditions and commotions may arise, and would give occasions of new laws to be preferred: and therefore better it were: that by this gift and boon the hearts of the Commons were won and reconciled: who being spent and eaten out by reason of their charges of so many years, herewith might be well relieved. And that they ought to tast the fruit and sweetnesse of the booty out of that war, in which they had spent their years, and were waxen old men. And that it would be more welcome and acceptable, that every man should be his own carver, and with his own hand catch from the enemy what he could, and bring it home with him, than if they should receive much more by a great deal at the discretion and pleasure of another. And the Dictator himselfe (saith he) hath avoided as neer as he could, the displeasure, hatred, and offence that might arise thereof, and therefore posted it off to the Senat: the Senat ought likewise seeing the matter is put to them, to let the Commons alone therewith, and permit every man to have such share as the fortune of war will allot him. This advise which made the Senat gracious with the people, was thought to be the safer and better of the twain. Whereupon proclamation was made, That whosoever would have part of the spoil of Veii, should shew himselfe before the Dictator in the camp. So there went a huge multitude, that they filled the camp againe. Then the Dictator after sacrifice done, and advice taken of the lucky signes of birds, went forth and commanding his souldiers to take armes and weapons in hand, spake these words and said: "By thy conduct and the instinct of thy divine power O Pythius Apollo, I let forward to the winning of the town of Veii, & now to thee I vow the tenth part of the spoils thereof.

Difference in bout the pill-lage of Veii.

“And thee withall (ô Queen Juno) who at this hour dost inhabit within the compasse of these wals, I beseech, that thou wouldst vouchsafe, to follow us after conquest into this city, ours now, and thine within awhile: whereas thou maiest be shrined in a Temple meet for thee, and the grandeur of thy majesty. Having made these prayers, with an exceeding multitude he invested the city, and assaulted it round on all parts: to the end that they within might have lesse perceivance of the peril intended towards them from the undermining. The Veientians little knowing that they were betrayed, partly by their own prophets, and partly by the Oracles abroad, and that some of their gods were invited and bidden to part of the spoil and sacrifice, and other by vowes and prayers trained and called out of their own city; began to look after the temples of their enemies & their new habitations: little weening that this was their last day, & fearing nothing less than that their wals should by undermining be overthrown, and that their Castle was full already of enemies: every man for himself ran armed to the wals, marveling what the matter should be, that whereas for so many daies space no man stirred out of the Romans Leaguer, then of a sudden (as if it were in a wood rage) they ran upon head so rashly to the assault. But hereto belongeth a tale; That when the Veientian King was at sacrifice, this voice of the Southsaier was overheard out of the mine under ground, That he whose hap was to cut forth the Inwards of that sacrifice should obtain victory, and moved the Roman souldiers, to break out of the undermining, and to catch up the entrails and bowels, and carry them to the Dictator. But as in things of so great antiquity, it sufficeth me, that those which carry some likelyhood of truth, be received for true: so for fabulous matters fitter indeed to make a shew in a stage play (where people take delight in such miracles) than to be sadly beleaved, it will not quit for the pains either to avouch them, or disavow them. The mine or cave at the same time (no doubt) full of chosen souldiers, yeelded forth all at once armed men into the Church of Juno, which was in the castle of Veii, and some of them set upon the backs of their enemies that were on the wals: others pluck up the portcullis of the gates: some of them, whiles from the houses the women and servants flung down stones and tiles, cast fire abroad. So that every place was full of cries and voices, partly of them that frightened others, and partly of those that were affrighted, with a confused screeching of women and children. When as now in a moment, the armed souldiers were thrown down from the wals every where, and the gates let open: whiles some entred marching in aray, others scaled the naked wals, the city was filled with enemies: and skirmishes there were in every place. After great massacre and execution committed, the fight began to quail: and the Dictator commanded the Bedles to proclame and give commandment, to spare the unarmed. Thus the bloodshed ended. Whereupon the unarmed people began to yeeld: and by permission of the Dictator the souldiers ran to the spoil. Which being brought in sight of the Dictator, of greater price and value a good deal, than either was hoped or looked for: it is said that he stretched forth his hands towards heaven and prayed, “That if his own fortune and the felicity of the people of Rome were thought by any god or man to be excessive, the envy belonging thereto might be mitigated with as small privat losse of his own in particular, and with as little common calamity of the people of Rome in generall, as might possibly be. And it is recorded, that in this maner praying and worshipping, as he turned himself about, he slipt forward and caught a fall. And as men afterwards guessed by that which fell out, it was supposed that the ominous token presaged the condemnation of Camillus himself, and the ruin of the city of Rome, which hapned within a few years after to be forced and sacked. Thus was that day spent in the slaughter of enemies, and in rifling of that most wealthy city. The morrow after, the Dictator sold in portsale the bodies of as many as were freeborn. That many only came into the common treasury not without some anger and repining of the Commons. And as for that booty and spoil which they brought with them away, they counted themselves beholden therefore, neither to the Generall himself (who to colour and excuse his own nigardise had referred the matter to the Senat: wherein he might have used his own liberty and discretion) nor to the Senat: but unto the house of the Licinis, whereof, the son propounded the matter before the Senat, and the father was the author of so popular an overture.

The City of Veii won by Camillus

When as now worldly and earthly riches, were carried forth and tumbled out of Veii by heaps, then began they to remove and have away the sacred gifts and oblations of the gods with the gods themselves, but after the maner of devout worshippers, rather than of greedy spoilers. For chosen there were out of the whole army, certain youths in the flower of their age, who having their bodies clean washed, and being arrayed in robes, had in charge to carry Queen Juno to Rome, and entred into the Church with great adoration and reverence: and at the first very charily and religiously laid hand upon her, for that (after the Tuscan maner) there used none to handle that Image but the Priest of one certain tribe. After this, when as one of them, whether it were upon a certain divine inspiration, or in some youthfull sport, cast out these words, Wilt thou march to Rome dame Juno? The rest with one voice cried aloud, That she gave a nod, and seemed thereto to give assent: whereupon this also was added to the tale, that she was heard to say, I will. But for certain it is reported, that she was stirred out of her footstall, with the help of a small lever, and that as she willingly was displaced, so she was easily removed & translated, and so safe and sound conveyed into the mountain Aventine, there to abide and remain for ever; which was the place assigned unto her by the vows of the Roman Dictator. And there Camillus according to his vow, dedicated to her afterwards a temple. This was the finall end and fall of Veii, the richest City of all the Tuscans, which

A which even in the last and most calamity shewed her mightiness, and having been besieged round about continually the space of ten summers and winters, & in that time done much more annoyance and hurt then it received, was now at last through the necessity of fatal destiny, gained rather by long siege and secret undermining, then won by forcible assault and violence.

When tidings came to Rome of the winning of Vej, albeit both the prodigious sights that were seen, had been expiated by sacrifice, and that the answers of the Prophets and wisemen, yea, and the Oracles of Apoll were well known: and that so far forth as mens counsel and policy might help, they had chosen for General M. Furius, the most noble captain and warrior of all other: yet considering they had there warred so many years with variable fortune, and received many losses and overthrows, their joy was exceeding great, as if a thing had happened unlooked for. And before that the Senat could make a decree, all the churches were full of the dames of Rome giving thanks to their gods. And the Senat ordained by an act, that supplications should continue for four daies, the like as never had been before time in any way. The Dictator also was met upon the way as he came home by all degrees and estates in great number, and was more welcomed and honoured then any man afore time, to that day. And the triumph far exceeded the usual manner of the solemnity to that day belonging. But most of all was he himself all goodly to be seen, entering into the city in a chariot drawn with white steeds. And that was thought an honour, not only in respect for the quality of a citizen, but hardly befitting the condition of any man whatsoever. For they made it a matter of conscience, that their Dictator should be equal with Jupiter, and the sun, in respect of their barres: for which only cause especially, the triumph was more glorious than gracious, and taken in good part. Then assigned he & let out to Queen Juno a church in Avventine hill, and dedicated another to dame Minerva, and so having achieved and performed those divine and human deeds, he resigned up his Dictatorship.

The temple of Queen Juno, so, the temple of Minerva.

After this began some speech about the Present to Apoll. Unto whom, when as Camillus said that he had vowed the tenth part of the spoil: and the Priests and Prelates thought good that the people should discharge their conscience in that behalf: there could no ready mean be found how to command them to give back again the spoil, that the due portion thereof might be set apart for the holy oblation. At the length they grew to this point, which was thought the easiest course of all, that whosoever would acquit himself and his house in conscience, should, after he had made an estimat to himself of his own share in the spoil, bring the value & price of the tenth part into the common Chest: that thereof might be made a golden oblation, meet for the state of that Temple, befitting the power of that god, and answerable to that dignity of the people of Rome. Yet even this contribution alienated the hearts of the people from Camillus.

A mid these affairs there came Embassadors from the Volscians and Equians, to treat for peace, and peace obtained they, rather because the city, wearied with continual wars, might now take rest and be at quiet, than for any defects of them that sued for it. After Vej was taken, the year following had six Tribunes Military in Consuls authority, two P. Cornelij, namely, Cossus and Scipio, M. Valerius Maximus the second time, C. Fabius Ambustus the second time, L. Furius Medullinus the second time, and Q. Servilius the third time. Unto the Cornelij fell out by lot the Faliscan war, to Valerius and Servilius the Capenats. Who neither assaulted their cities by force, nor wearied them with siege: but foraged the countries, and drove boories away of such things as were in the fields, not a tree that beareth fruit, not any fruitful things besides, escaped their hands. This distresse and calamity subdued the Capenats: who thereupon sued for peace, and had it granted. But amongst the Faliscians the war continued still. In the meantime, at Rome there were sundry seditions. For the appeasing whereof, it was thought good to send a Colony to Vols, and thither three thousand citizens were appointed in checkroll. And Triumvirs were thereto chosen, who divided to every man three acres of ground and a half, and one twelfth part. That began to be despised, because they thought it but a poor comfort offered to stop their mouths withall, and to put them beside a greater hope. For why should the Commons be sent away into the Volscians land, seeing there was Vej within their eye-sight, a most fair city, and the land about more plentiful and large than that of Rome? And as for the city it self, they preferred it, either for the site, or state of privat or publick buildings and other places, before the city of Rome. Moreover a motion also was made (which, after that Rome was won by the French, was more hotly followed) concerning a General transmigration and removing to Vej for ever. Marry, they intended that Vej should be inhabited, partly by the Commons, and partly by the Nobility: saying, That the people of Rome might well enough inhabit two cities joyntly in one state of Commonwealt. Against all this, the LL. of the Senat laboured what they might, and plainly said, they would sooner dye in the sight of the people of Rome, than any of those matters should passe. For why? if there were now in one city so much dissention, what would there be in twain? Would any man be so mad, as to prefer a conquered city, before his own country that had conquered the same? and suffered Vej after it is won to be in better estate then it was afore, even when it was at the best? Finally, well might they be forsaken at home in their own country by their citizens, but to forsake their country and citizens, they would never be brought by any force whatsoever. They would not follow to Vej, T. Sicinius as their founder, for he amongst the Tribunes of the Commons perswaded this Act, and leave their god Romulus the son of a god, the first stockfather and beginner of the city of Rome. While these matters were in handling with foules stir and much debate and variance (for the nobles had won to their opinion some of the Tri-Tribunes) there was nothing else that staid the Commons hands from outrage, but this, that when there was an outcry made to begin the quarrell, and to set them together by the ears, the chief and principal Senators first came forth to the multitude, and offered themselves to be laid at, smitten and slain. In regard of whose age, dignity, and honour, they forbearing to do violence, were likewise for shame stayed in their mood, for any the like attempts besides. Camillus taking vantage hereof, ever and anon in all places, made speeches unto the people, and said: "That it was no marvell truly, that the city was in a rage and madness, which being charged with a vow, made more care of all things else, then to discharge their conscience thereof and see it performed. As for the collation and gathering of a small donative, rather then a tithe, he said nothing of it: seeing that every man privately bound himself thereto, and the body of the people stood freed therefrom. But one thing there was that his conscience would not suffer him to hold his peace, that out of that booty only which was of moveable things, the tenth was appointed to be levied: as for the city and ground that was won, which also was comprised within the vow there were no words at all made. When as the debating of this matter, which to the Senat seemed doubtful and hard, was put over to the Priests and Prelats: their collage calling to them Camillus thought good, that whatsoever the Veientians had before the vow made, and whatsoever after the vow, came into the hands of the people of Rome, the tenth part thereof should be consecrated to Apollo. So both the city and the lands were valued: and money taken forth of the city chamber. And the Tribunes Military Consular joyued therewith to buy gold. Whereof there being not store enough, the dimes of the city, having their assemblies and meetings by themselves for to consult therabout, by a common decree made promise to the Tribunes Military, and brought into the exchequer their own gold, and all the ornaments and jewels they had. This was as acceptable a thing, and as well taken of the Senat, as ever any had been: and for this liberality (men say) they had this honour granted unto them, as to ride to church and to places in hanging of ship-coaches, and as well on working daies as holidays, to be at their wagons. When the gold was of every one received by weight and priced to the worth, that they might again be paid money therefor: it was agreed that a standing cup of gold should be made thereof, and presented as an oblation to Apollo at Delphi. So soon as they had eased and disburdened their minds of this religious vow, the Tribunes of the Commons began sedition anew: So as the multitude was incited and stirred up against all the peers but above all other against Camillus: charging him, that what by consecrating and consecrating the booty of the Veientians, he had brought it to just nothing. Those nobles that were absent they blamed and they cried out against mightily, but of such that were present in place, and offered themselves unto them in their anger, they had some reverence. Now so soon as they saw the matter in question to be deferred and continued past that year, they chose again for the year following, those Tribunes of the Commons, which were the authors of that act and law. The Nobles likewise endeavoured the same for those that should oppose themselves against the law. So the Tribunes of the Commons (a good part of them) were chosen the very same again. But at the Election of the Tribunes Military, the Patriarch after very much ado got at length, that Furius Camillus was created. They made semblance and pretended, that they would be provided of a General for war, but indeed their purpose was to be furnished of an adversary to withstand the acts and proceedings of the Tribunes: Together with Camillus were made Tribunes Military in Consul authority, L. Furius Medullinus the first time, C. Amyllus, L. Valerius Publicola, Sp. Posthumius, P. Cornelianus the second time.

In the beginning of the year, the Tribunes of the Commons stirred not untill M. Furius Camillus was gone against the Falisci, as his charge required for that war. And by delays afterwards the matter was well cooled. As for Camillus, whom of all other they most feared to be their adversary, he waxed great and glorious, by his service against the Falisci. For whereas at the first, the enemies kept themselves within the wals, thinking it the safest way: he by walking their country, and setting fire upon their villages, forced them to come forth of their town, howbeit they feared to be too bold, and to go far forward: and encamped themselves a mile and lesse from the town, reposing their safety and security in nothing else, but in the dangerous and hard passage, the waies all about being rough, ragged, and stony, in some places straight and narrow, in other up hill and steep. Camillus having tak en a prisoner out of the fields, and being guided by his direction, late in the night dislodged his camp, and betimes in the morning at break of the day, shewed himself upon the higher rounds a good deal. The Romans on three sides, fell to fortifie by trenching and casting rampiers, whiles the rest of the army stood ready ranged for the battrell. And whereas the enemies assaid to hinder the work, he discomfited them and put them to flight, whereupon the Falisci were so frightened, that as they fled again in disaray, they passed beyond their own camp, which was neerer: and made as fast as they could to the town. Many were slain and many wounded, before that in this affright they could hit upon the gates. Their camp being taken, the booty thereof came into the Quæstors coffers, with the great grudging and anger of the souldiers. Howbeit yielding to the severity of discipline and good government: the same virtue which they had hated before, they now honoured and held in admiration. After this was the city besieged, and ironces and platform raised about it. Otherwhiles also, as occasion was offered, the townsman would fall forth and assaile the Romans camp, and make light skirmishes. Thus the time passed without any great good hope of either side: for that they within the town besieged, had of their former provision more store of corn & other necessaries than they that

A that lay at Siege without. And it seemeth they would have had as long a piece of worke there, as they had at Ferri, had not fortune yielded to the Romans General both a trial of his approved vertue in war, and also speedy victorie.

It was the manner among the Fallicians, to entrust for the government of their Children one that should teach and instruct them in school, and withall bear their company wheresoever they went, and many children together (as the Scotte continued till even to this day in Grined) were committed to the charge and tuition of one man. As for the Nobles and principall mens sons of this City (as it is usually every where else) a speciall man had the teaching of them, such an one, as was thought most learned and the greatest clerk of all other. This man, having in time of peace

B begun to bring the children forth before the town, to sport and exercise themselves, gave not over his wonted manner now in time of war. And using still to train them abroad one while heere, another while further off from the gate, it fell out so, that one day what with playing, and what with pleasant talk and discourses he drew them further then he accustomed, and feeling his time, went forward as far as the Camillus pavilion, and to forth on, till he had brought them within the compasse of the camp. And even to Camillus his pavilion. Where to his wicked intended act, he added also a more gracefull speech, saying, "That he yielded Falerii into the

C man concluded and established: yet by nature, there is and will be still a kind of smile or love-ety between us and them. There are laws due for war as well as for peace: and those we learned to observe no less justly, than valiantly. We bear yms not again that I say, which usually is said in raising and lacking of rowns, but against armed men, and those who being by us neither harmed nor provoked, have assailed the Romans camp at Ferri. And yet those who mics (as bad as they be, like as thou hast for thy part exceeded them in a new and strange kind of wickednesse: to will I conquer. I doubt not, by feats that the Romans professe: by vertue, by travell, by hardy fight: like as I have done Ferri already. After this he caused him to be stripped naked, and so with his hands bound behind him, he delivered him to the children, for to bring him back to Falerii: and gave them rods withall, wherewith they might whip and drive this traitorous

D perion forward into the city. At which sight the people at the first came running together, and then the Magistrats called a Councell to sit upon this strange occurrent. But see what a change it wrought in their hearts. They who a while before were with hatred and anger so cruelly let as that they wished rather in a manner to be destroyed with the Veientians, then to accept of peace as the Capenates had done, now through out the whole city required to be at accord with the Romans. No talk in the Market place, no speech in the Councell house, but of the faithfulness and truth of the Romans, and of the justice of their General. And with one generall consent of all, Embassadors were sent to Camillus, into the camp. And from thence by permission of Camillus

E to the Senat of Rome they went, to deliver up Falerii: and being admitted into the Senat house, in this wise (by report) they spake: "In that victory (right honourable) which neither God nor man can chide but allow, are we by you and your General overcome and vanquished. And here we render our selves into your hands: supposing this (than which to a conquerour there can be no thing more honourable) that we shall live better under your government, than under our own proper laws and liberties. The event & issue of this war, hath afforded to mankind two worthy examples to follow. Ye for your part have made choice to observe faithfulness in war, rather then to achieve a present conquest: and we again, by this your faithful dealing incited and provoked

F have willingly yielded unto you the victory, confessing our selves now presently to be your liege & lawfull subjects. Send whom you will, to receive our armor, our hostages, our town with open gates. Neither shall you ever repent of our allegiance nor, we think much of your rule & government. Camillus had thanks both of the enemies and of the citizens. The Fallicians were charged with money for that years pay, that the people of Rome might be freed of their subsidy. Thus when peace was granted, the army was brought back again to Rome.

When as Camillus was returned after this conquest of his enemies into the City, with much better commendation, than when as in triumph he rode in a chariot drawn with white horses through the city, as being now famous for his just dealing and faithfulness: secretly the Senat was abashed for very reverence of the man, and could no longer bear, but without farther delay to acquit him of the vow he made. So there were sent L. Valerius, L. Sergius, A. Manlius as Embassadors in one galley unwaited, to present unto Apollo at Delphi by way of obligation, a standing cup of gold.

G Who not far off from the narrow less of Sicily, were encountered & boded by certain Liparenians pirates or men of war, and had to Lipara. Now the manner was of that city, as common rovers (to do) for to divide the prize among them. Happly the chief officer or Magistrat for that year, was one Timasthemus, a man more like to the Romans than his own countrymen. Who having himself some reverent regard of the name of Embassadors, and the present of the god to whom it was sent, and the occasion thereof: possessed the multitude also (which also rightly resembled their governor) with due religion and prick of conscience. This head ruler brought the Embassadors into their lodging, & entertained them courteously at the cities charge, waited them with the convoy of a sufficient fleet: accompanied them in person to Delphi, and from thence conducted them

them home again safe to Rome. Whereupon by an act of the Senat, there was a contract made with him of amity and mutuall entertainment, and gifts bestowed upon him at the cities cost. The same year there was doubtfull war with the Equians, so it was uncertain both in the army and at Rome whether they had won or lost the victory. The Generals for the Romans, were of the Tribunes Military, C. Aemilius, and Sp. Posthumius. At the first they warred both together, but after, when the enemies were in fight discomfited, it was agreed, that Aemilius should keep Ferrago with a garrison, and Posthumius wait the borders. Where, as he marched somewhat negligently with his army out of order, as presently after field won, the Equians set upon him, and having put him in fear chased him to the hills next hand. The fright whereof came from thence to the other garrison also at Ferrago. Posthumius, after that he had retired his men into safety and assembled them together, and there in an Oration greatly blamed and cried out upon their fear and running away; and that they were discomfited by a most dastardly fugitive enemy: the whole host cried out with one voice, that they deserved to be told of it, and confessed that they had committed a foul fault; but they themselves would make amends therefore: and promised that the enemies should carry it neither to heaven nor hell, nor so long therewith. Requiring that he would conduct them presently to the enemies camp (which in light was pight upon a plain) promising to refuse no extremity of punishment, if they were not masters of it before night. He then commended them, and willed them to refresh their bodies, and to be ready at the reliefe of the fourth watch. Now lay the enemies likewise in the passage, to intercept the Romans, as they fled by night from the hill, even in the way which leadeth to Ferrago. And before day they encountered together (but you must think the moon shone all night) and saw how to fight, as well as by day light. The noise being heard to Ferrago, strake so great fear amongst them, shoking the camp of the Romans had been assailed, that for all Aemilius could do to hold them, and to beleech them to the contrary, they fled scattered unto Tusculum. From whence the news came to Rome, That Posthumius was slain, and his army lost. But heiding about the host (after that in the morning betimes the day light shewed them that followed apace on every side, that there was no fear of ambushments and forsayings) charged them with their promises, and set them in such a heat, That the Equians could no longer abide their violence. Then slew they the enemies in the chase every one, and made havock of them as they fled, more like men that do things in a fury and rage then by plain valour. And presently from the Tidings from Tusculum (which put the city in a vain & causeless fright) there came from Posthumius letters, dight with lawrell: importing news, that the Romans had the victory, and the Equians the overthrow.

Because as yet the actions and votes aforesaid of the Tribunes of the Commons could come to no end: but the Commons laboured to continue the Tribuneship in them that were the maintainers of the law preferred, and also the Nobles endeavoured to make those rulers again that had opposed themselves against the same law. But as the Commons in their own Election prevailed and had the better: so the Nobles were revenged of them againe for this grieffe they tooke, by an Act of the Senat, that Consuls (hated Magistrates of the Commons) should be created. Thus after fifteen yeares were Consuls reelected, L. Lucratius Flavius, Servius Sulpitius Camerinus.

In the beginning of this year, when as the Tribunes of the Commons desired themselves stoutly to go through with their law, for that none of their brotherhood was about to deny and nip the same: and whiles the Consuls for that very cause resisted them as earnestly, and the whole city was here-about smuled: the Equians won Fusilia, a Colony of the Romans, seated within their own country. Most part of the Coloners (because the town being by night betrayed and won, yeelding unto them free passage to escape away on the back side) fled safe to Rome. So that service befell unto L. Lucratius the Consul, Who went with a power and vanquished the enemies in fight, and with victory returned to Rome to a greater conflict a good deal. Aulus Virginius, and Quintus Pomponius, two Tribunes of the Commons the two yeares past, were accused: for whose defence it was for the Credit of the Senat, That the Nobles should agree and stick close together. For no man laid to their charge either dishonest behaviour in life, or corrupt carriage of themselves in their office, but only this, that to please and gratifie the Nobles, they had set themselves against the Tribunes law. Howbeit the anger of the Commons went beyond the favour of the Senat, and (that which was a most shamefull precedent) they (guiltlesse men) had fine set on their heads of * ten thousand pound of brasse coin: Whereat the Nobles took great displeasure. Camil- lus openly blamed the Commons for this their wicked part: who now setting themselves against their own patrons, perceived not that by a perverse proceeding in judgement against their Tribunes, they had lost their liberty of opposing themselves with their negative voice: and take that away once, and farewell all authority of the Tribunes for ever. For where as they hoped that the Nobles would endure the unbridled and licentious liberty of that office, they were much deceived: for if these hard courses of the Tribunes might not be restrained by help of the same Tribunes, the Nobility would find some other weapon to fight withall. He rebuked the Consuls also, for that they suffered those Tribunes to faile of their protection and safe conduct, who had done and said nothing but by the authority and warrant of the Senat. Whiles openly he used to make these and such orations to the people, he thrust himself daily more and more into mens anger and displeasure. But to stir up the Senat against the foresaid law, he ceased not still: willing them, that when the day came of proposing the law, they should come into the Common Hall, with no other mind but this, to remember they were to fight for god and country

Camilus rebuketh the Commons.

Camilus his speech in the Senat.

- A try, for the temples of the gods, and the very soile wherein they were born. And as for his own self privately, if it were lawful for him amidst these civil troubles of his native country, to think upon and respect his own proper glory, it were right honourable for him, to have the city which he had won, peopled and resorted unto : and daily to behold and enjoy the memorable monument of his own glory : to see before his eyes the very City, whereof the counterfeit was born in the pomp of triumph : and that all men else should tread in the steps of his noble acts. But he thought it a shamefull and abominable thing, that a City left and forsaken of the immortal gods, should be inhabited : and that the people of Rome should dwell in captive soile, and to make this exchange, to leave a naturall country which hath conquered, for it that hath been conquered.
- B With these perswasions & exhortations were the chief rulers excited, the Nobles old and young, came in multitudes, (when as the law should be propounded) into the Hall. And as they were dispersed and sorted into Tribes, every one taking hold of those of his own tribe, began to beseech them even with tears, not to forsake that Country now, in the quarrell whereof they and their fathers had fought most valiantly and happily : shewing herewith ever and anon the Capitoll, the Temple of Vesta, and other Temples thereabout of the gods : that they should not therefore drive the people of Rome, as exiled and banished out of their native soile from their own home and house gods, into their enemies City, nor bring the matter thus about, that it had been better that Vesta had not been won, rather then Rome should be abandoned. Because their dealing was nothing but by way of praier and perswasion, and in their praiers much mention and naming of the gods, the most part of them were touched in conscience : so as more Tribes nipped that one law forgoing forward, than gave their voices to approve it. Which victory was so joyfull to the Nobles, that the morrow after, by the motion of the Coss. a decree was made, That amongst the Commons should be a division of seven acres for a man out of the Veientian lands : and not for householders only, but that consideration and reckoning should be had also in every houle of all free born persons : to the end, that they should be willing to breed up children to the like proof, and for the hope of like commodity. When the Commons by this bountifull gift and liberality, were well pacified and stilled, there was no stir at all to hinder the election of the Consuls. So there were created Consuls, Lu. Valerius Potitus, and M. Manlius, who afterwards was surnamed Capitolinus.
- C These Consuls set out the great solemn games and plaies, which M. Furius, the Dictator had vowed in the Veientian war. In the same year the Temple of Juno Regina vowed by the same Dictator and in the same war, was dedicated. And it is reported, that the dedication thereof was celebrated with exceeding great resort and forward endeavour of the dames of Rome. War there was (but not greatly to be spoken of) Algidum with the Equians, for that the enemies were in a manner discomfited before that they joyned battell. Valerius because he followed still and killed the enemies in chase, was allowed by decree to triumph at full : and Manlius, that he should enter into the city only Ovans, in petty triumph. The same year arose a new war with the Volscians : against whom by reason of a famine and pestilence that grew about Rome upon exceeding drought and heat, an army could not be led forth. For which cause the Volscinians puffed up with pride, joyning unto them the Salpenates, invaded first the country about Rome. Whereupon war was proclaimed against both nations. C. Julius the Censor departed this life. In whose room M. Cornelius was substituted. Which after bred some scruple of Religion, for that Rome in that five years space was taken. So that never after that is there any Censor chosen into the place of the deceased : And the Consuls also being sick and thereby disabled to govern, it was thought good to take new counsell & advice of auspices or tokens of birds, by an Interregnum. When as therefore by an act of the Senat, the Consuls had resigned their office, M. Furius Camillus was created Interregent. Who named after him P. Cornelius Scipio : and he afterwards Lu. Valerius Potitus to be Interrex. By whom were made six Tribunes Military with Consuls authority : that in case any of them should be sick and crasic, yet the Common-wealth should have governours enough. The first day of July entered they into their office : namely, L. Lucretius, Servius Sulpitius, M. Aemilius, Lu. Furius Medullinus the seventh time, Agrippa Furius, C. Aemilius the second time. Of these L. Lucretius and C. Aemilius had in commission to go against the Volscians : but Agrippa Furius, and Servius Sulpitius against the Salpenates. And first were the Volscians fought withall. A great war in respect of the number of enemies : but for the conflict and battell, nothing fierce and sharp. For their army at the first encounter was put to flight, and eight thousand souldiers were by the Roman horsemen environed, whereupon they threw their weapons away and yeilded. The tidings of this war caused the Salpenates not to adventure upon fight : but they kept themselves armed within the walls, and stood upon their guard. The Romans then all abroad drave booties both out of the Salpenates Country, and the Volscians, and no man withstood their violence : so long untill the Volscians wearied with war, and truce granted unto them for twenty years, upon this condition, to make restitution again to the Romans of their goods, and to pay the souldiers for that year their wages.
- D The same year one M. Caelius a commoner, gave notice to the Tribunes that in the new Causey, where now there standeth a Chappel above the Temple of Vesta, there was in the still time of the night a voice heard, louder than any mans, willing that the governours might have intelligence, that the Gauls were coming. This, by reason of the balenesse of the author (as commonly it is seen) was not credited : besides, they were a nation far remote, and therefore less known and of small account. Thus were not only the advertisements of the gods despised, when as their fatal time of destruction struction was toward : but also the help of man (which rested only in Furius Camillus) they rid out of the City. Who being arrested to appear at a day by L. Apulcius Tribune of the Commons, and to make answer for the sackage of Vesii, and having buried about the same time his son, a to-wardly young Gentleman, sent for home to his house, those of his own tribe, his skinfolk and fol-lowers, wherof a great part were of the Commons. And when he had founded their minds, and re-ceived this answer from them, That they would defray and lay down so much, as he should be condemned in : but as to acquit him, that they could not possibly. Hereupon he departed in ex-ile : praying to the immortall gods, that as he was guiltlesse and wrongfully dealt withall, so they would with all speed, cause that unthankful City to stand in need, and to have a misse of him. In his absence condemned he was in * fifteen thousand pounds of brasse coine. When this citizen was thus expelled, who if he had tarried still, (so far as we may make reckoning of any earthly securi-ty) Rome could never have been won: behold, embassadors came from the Clusines, request-ing aid against the Gauls.

This nation (as it is reported) allured with the sweetnesse of corn and wine especially (dainty chaffer and a new delight in those daies) passed over the Alps, and possessed those countries which had been aforetime by the Tuscans inhabited. The voice goeth, that there was one Arnus a Clusine, who had brought wine into Gaul, to entise that people withall, upon an anger and dis-pleasure that his wife had been deflowered by one Lucumo (whose guardian Arnus himselfe had been) a young gentleman of great might and power, and whom Arnus could not chastise and bridle, without assistance of forein forces : This man was the Gauls guide in passing over the Alps, K and the principal instrument to set them a work for to assault Clusium. I would not for my part deny, but that the French were brought to Clusium by Arnus or some other Clusine : but most certain it is, that they who assaulted Clusium, were not the first that passed the Alps. For the Gauls two hundred years before they assaulted Clusium and won the City of Rome, came over into Italy. Neither fought the Gauls first with this nation of the Tuscans, but long afore, and that oftentimes, with those that dwell between Apenninus and the Alps. For, the Tuscans had all sovereign com-mand, both by land and sea, before the Roman Empire was erected. The names of upper and ne-ther sea, wherewith Italy is compassed about, as it were an Island, may be a sufficient proof, how great and puissant they were : seeing, that the one is by the general name of the Nation, called of Italians, the Tuscan sea: & the other the Adriatick, of a town of colony or the Tuscans called Adria. L The Greeks do call the self same seas that (a) Tyrrhene and the Adriaticke seas. These Tuscans ben-ding to both seas, inhabited those countries, consisting of twelve Cities : having sent before on this side Apennine, toward the nether sea, and afterwards beyond the (b) Apennine, as many Colo-nies in number according to the Princes at the first beginning, and held in possession all those parts beyond the Po unto the Alps, except that Angle only of the Venetians, that are seated about the gulf of the Adriatick sea. And doubtlesse, the Nations about the Alps, especially the Rhetians, had their beginning thus: whom the very country it self made savage, so they as retained nothing of old, but the sound of their language, and the same broken and somewhat corrupted. Now for the coming of the Gauls over into Italy, thus much we have learned. In the daies of Priscus Tarquinius King of Rome, the (c) Celtes which are a third part of the Gauls, were under the rule of the (d) Bitariges who chose a King over the Celtes, named Ambigatus, a great potentat and mighty, both in re-gard of valour and vertue, and also of his own privat wealth and publick weal : for that under his regiment, Gaul was so fertile of corn, and grew so populous, that the exceeding number of the people could not well be governed. This man being of great age, and desirous now to disbur-then his Realm of that pestering multitude, declared that he would send Bellovesus and Sigovesus his sisters sons (two forward young men) to seek adventures, into what lands soever the gods and goddesses should by their token direct them : giving them commission to gather what number of men they would, to the end that no nation might withstand their coming. So it fell to Sigo-vesus lot, for to enter the Forrest and woodland country of Hercinia. Bellovesus his fortune was a good deal better, to take his way (by the gods guidance) unto Italy : and he leivied of the Bitariges, (e) Averni (f) Senones (g) Helvii (h) Ambarrs (i) Caranates and (k) Anseres, those that might be spared out of those Countries : and setting forward with a mighty power of footmen & horsemen, came unto the (l) Tricassides. Now stood the Alps full against them in their way, which I marvel not were thought & insuperable impassable, as having not as yet any way made over them, (so far as any constant record maketh date) unlesse we list to beleieve the tales of Hercules. Now when as the Gauls there, were hemmed in as it were on every side with those high montains, and that they looked every way about them, how they might get over those high hills reaching up to the heavens, and so passe (as one would say) into an other World ; they were staid there and went no further, upon scruple of conscience, for that it was reported, that certain strangers seeking land to inhabite, were by the people of (m) Sallies set upon and assailed. These strangers were the (n) Massilians, who sailed from Phocis. This the Gauls supposing to be a fortunate presage of their suc-cess helped them forward, and took part with them : so as what place first they gat after they were landed, they fortified within the wide or broad Forrests. They themselves passed through the Country of (o) Taurini, and over the straights of the Alps, called (p) Julia : and having vanquished the Tuscans in fight not far from the river (q) Ticinus, hearing that the Country wherin they abode and settled, was called Insubrinum (after the name of a territory and shire of the Heduans) they fol-lowing and imbracing the lucky name of that place, so conformable to the other of their own, builded

A builded a City and called it (r) Mediolanum. Afterwards another power of Germans with their captain Eluvius, following the steps of the former Gauls, by the same streights (with good leave and favour of Belovesus) passed over the Alps, and remained there: and where now (s) Brixia and (t) Verona two towns stand (the u) Liguri than inhabited those parts made their abode. After these, the Saluvii passed over, who expelled all the Ligurians that dwelt on this side the river Tecinus, but only the Levi, an ancient nation. After them the (x) Boii and (y) Lingones passed over the hill (z) Penninus, dispossessed the Tuscans & the Umbrians of their territories, yet so as they kept them within Appenninus. Then the Senones which were the last comers of these strangers, inhabited the country from the river (a) Venus unto (b) Arbois. This nation I find to have come to (c) Clusium, and afterwards from thence to Rome; marry it is not certaine whether this nation alone came, or that they were aided by all the Gauls, that dwelt on this side the Alps.

The Clusines terrified with this new war, advising well both their number and the unaccustomed looks, and visages of the men, which they had not seen afore, and the strange armour withall: & hearing besides that the legion of the Tuscans both on this side the Pe and beyond, had been oftentimes by them discomfited: Albeit in the Romans they had no interest at all in regard of any league or amity, only this, that they had not maintained their kinfolk the Veientes against the Romans, sent their Embassadors to Rome, to crave aid of the Senat. Aid they obtained none. Embassadors there were sent three, the sonnes of M. Fabius Ambustus, who in the name of the Senat and people of Rome should treat with the Gauls and persuade with them, not to let upon the confederats and friends of the people of Rome namely, such as at whole hands they had received no wrong: saying moreover, that if they would put the Romans to it, The Romans were to defend Gauls by war, howbeit they thought it better, if it might be, to have no wars at all: but that the them a new-come nation should grow into knowledge and acquaintance, rather by peace than by war. The embassage was mild and modest enough, but the Embassadors themselves were over fierce & hasty, and more like Gauls than Romans: Who having done their message in the assembly of the Gauls, were thus again answered. "Although the name of the Romans was but of late heard of, yet they, yet they were persuaded that they were hardy men, at whole hands the Clusines in their fear, fought and requested succour. And whereas they choole rather to defend

D their allies by way of embassage, than by open war, they likewise neither did daunt nor reme peace, which they offered: If the Clusines would grant the Gauls (which wanted ground to inhabit) a part of their marches, whereof they held in possession more than they did well people and happy. Otherwise, no peace would be had. And hereof would they have an answer, while the Romans were in place: and if they were denied ground, they would also fight even before the Romans face, that they might make report at home, how much the Gauls went beyond other men in valour & chivalry. And when as the Romans demanded again what right they had to require ground of the owners or to threaten war? For what interest or title had the Gauls in Tuscany? They again stoutly made answer: that they carried their right in their words, point and that valiant men were Lords of all the world. So they were on both sides to let on fire, that they ran to their weapons & skirmish'd with the Tuscans. Then against all law of nations a thing that bafled the destruction of the Roman City the Embassadors took arms. Neither could this be so secret but it was known; For even before the enignes of the Tuscans, there were seen three most noble & valiant knights of the Romans for to fight so far exceeded the valour of those strangers above all the Clusines. Moreover and besides, Quintus Fabius riding out of the battell on horseback charged his lance upon the captain of the Gauls, as he fiercely assailed the enignes and cartel of the Tuscans, ran him through and slue him: and as he rifled and disarmed him, the Gauls took knowledge of him, and throughout the whole host notice was given, that it was an Embassador of the Romans.

E So leaving their quarrell against the Clusines, they founded the retreat and threatened the Romans. There were of them, that thought good presently to advance forward to Rome; but the elder sort prevailed, that there should be sent Embassadors first to complain of the injuries, and to require that for the law of arms broken, the Fabii should be yielded unto them. When as the Gaul Embassadors had declared their message according to their commission, the Senat nothing liked of the Fabians deed, and thought the barbarous Gauls required nothing but just and reason. Howbeit his friends and priyat respects, would not permit to make an act of that in personages of so great mark and nobility, which they deemed meet and requit. Therefore to the end it might not be imputed to them & they blam'd, if peradventure any roil or overthrow should hap unto them by warring with the Gauls: they referred the hearing and discussing of the Gauls demands unto the people. Where might and favour so much prevailed, that even they who were in question to be punished, were created for the year following Tribunes Military in Consul authority. At which the dealing that war was first caused, had the managing of all, and made no more choise, nor mustering of souldiers than usually had been in common wars, making but a light matter of it and of no consequence, & setting little by, and elevating the honour of the war. The Gauls in the mean time (having heard, how on set purpose those breakers of human law were loon advanced to honour, & how their embassage was deluded and dallied with, all on fire, as they are a nation that way impatient and in anger outrageous) pluckt up their standards forthwith and marched with all expedition on their voyage. At whose noise and horribly (as they passed by in such hast) when as the towns thereby were put in fear, and ran to their weapons, and the country peasants fled away: they with open mouth gave out and signified, that they went to Rome. All the way as they journeyed, what with horse and men, both in length and breadth, they took up a mighty room in their march. But what with the same that went before, and the messengers of the Clulines and of other people that followed one at the heels of another, this speedy coming of the enemies brought right great fear and terror to Rome. For notwithstanding, that they went with a power of men in all hast suddenly mustered, hardly met they them at eleven miles end, where as the river Alia running down from the hills of Crustumium, with a very deep channell (not much beneath the highway) discharge it self into the Tiber. And now by this time the whole country before them, and all the coasts about were overspread with the enemies. And as they are a nation naturally given to vain tumults and therein both bred) with an hideous and dissonant kind of singing (like a black Santus) they filled also about with a fearful and horrible noise. There the Tribunes Military without getting shorehand a convenient place to pitch their tents in, without fortifying the same with any trench or rampiers, whereunto they might safely betake themselves, even without any regard of God, whom at least wife they should have been mindfull of, if they had forgotten man, without Auspices and bird-tokens, without reconciliation to God by sacrifice, full unhappily and in an ill hour, ranged their battels divided into wings for fear of being compass'd with multitude of enemies. Yet might nor the vanguard answer the breadth of the enemies, notwithstanding they made their ranks and files so thin, that the middle ward of the battell was weak, & feart joyning close together. On the right hand there was a little higher ground, where they thought to bestow men for supply, which as it gave the first occasion of fear and running away, so was it the only safety of them that fled. For Brennus the Duke or Prince of the Gauls, fearing exceedingly in that small number of the Romans some stratagem, and supposing that the higher ground was for this purpose kept, that when the Gauls should have encountered with the forefront of the legions, then the reserves would charge them both upon their backs and their flanks, displayed and advanced his standards against those in rescue: nothing doubting but if he had once driven them from their hold upon higher ground, on the plain he should loon have the victory, considering that in number he overwent them. See how the Barbarians had not only luck, but policy also on their sides! Contrariwise, the Romans in their camp were nothing like themselves, either for captains or souldiers, their minds were so possessed with fear and thinking of running away, and so forgetfull besides, that the greater part of them chose rather to flee to Rome, (their enemies City) although the Tiber were full in their way, then to take the straight coule to Rome, to their wives and children. For a while, the advantage of the ground defended those that were for rescue: but in the rest of the host, so soon as they that were next, heard the shout from the sides, and those that were furthest off from behind, before any stroke smitten, and before they were once touched, they fled from their unknown enemy, in a manner before they saw him. And so far off they were from trying fight, that they answered them not so much as with a counter shout again, so as there were not any slain in fight. But they were killed behind at their backs, even by occasion of their own selves, who with their hurrying hindered one another in their flight. About the bank of Tiber, whereunto the whole host was fled down, and had flung away their weapons, there was a great slaughter. For many of them that could not swim, and were weak by reason of their weighty corselets and other harness, were drowned and swallowed up of the urging whirlpools. Howbeit, the most part escaped safe to Rome. From whence they came to Rome, not only to succour to guard the City, but not so much as a messenger to bring news of this their overthrow. But from the right wing which kept farther from the river, and he more under the hill, they all went to Rome. And finding not so much as the gates of the City that they all fled into the Castle. The very Gauls themselves allowed it to wonderfull and sudden victory, stood still at the first in a great amaze, as who knew not what had happened, and wist not what to make of it. Afterwards they feared some ambush, and at length fell to gathering the spoils of them that were slain, and to lay all their armor and harness upon heaps, as their manner is. At last, seeing no enemy nor shew of hostility, they put themselves in their journey forward, a little before sunsetting, and marched to the City of Rome. Where, upon word brought by the foreriders, that the gates were not shut, nor any ward kept afore the gates, nor armed men upon the walls, they stood in the like amaze as before, upon so strange and wondrous a thing. But fearing the night and the situation of a City unknown, they let them down, and rested between Rome and Anagnina, having sent their signals and scouts about the walls and gates, to understand what their enemies meant to doe in so desperate a state. The Romans, for that a greater part had taken their way to Rome, then to Rome, and weening that there was none left alive, but those that were fled back to Rome, bewailing and bidding adue, both to those that were dead and those alive, let the whole City almost a weeping and lamenting. But afterwards the publick fear allayed them, and took all sente away of their privat sorrows, when they heard

A once that the enemies were come, And within a while, as these barbarous people coasted and ranged about the walls by troops, they might hear their yelling, their houting, and uncouth, confused hideous cries. So were they held all the time in suspense of mind, untill the second day after: one while thinking, that at their first coming they would have surprised the City, for unless they had so meant, they would have tarried (they thought) at Allia still: again, a little before sun-setting (because the day was well-nigh done) they supposed they would enter upon them before night. But anon they feared that they deferred this enterprise untill night was come, to the end they might strike a greater fear & terror amongst them. And last of all the day light approaching, astonished them clean so as they were in a continual agony, even untill the mischief came indeed which they so long doubted, & that now the bloody banners of their enemies were displayed before their gate. Howbeit neither that night nor the day following, was the City in the like fear, as when they fled so fearfully at Allia. For being past hope, that the City could be defended with so small power as remained, they determined that with their wives & children, all their serviceable youth, such as were meet to bear arms, yea, and the more able men, and strength of the Senat should retire themselves into the Castle & Capitol: and after they had thither brought their armor and corn, from thence as from a defensible place to protect their gods, their men, and the Roman name: to save from fire and sword (so far as they could) the Flamin of Jupiter, the vestal Nuns, and sacred images, and holy reliques of the City: and not to abandon the worship and due solemnity unto them, so long as any were left alive, to do them honour and worship. For thus they conceived, That if the Castle & Capitol, being the seat of their gods, if the Senat, which is the head & chief of their publike counsel, if the hardy and fighting yong men remained after that imminent ruin and fall of the City, the less would be the loss of the aged folk, a number, (God wot) left behind of purpose in the City, no otherwiselike but to perish. And to the end that the multitude of the common sort might bear this more patiently, the elders that had triumphed aforetime, and been Consuls, openly gave out and said, That they would live and die together with them. Neither would they with those bodies of theirs which were unmeet to bear armour, and to defend the City, surcharge and pester the company of able and armed men, in this their penury & want of victuals. These and such like were the consolations and comforts of the ancients amongst themselves, now resolute to end their lives. After which, they turned their exhortations to the companies of the young and lusty men, whom they followed into the Castle and Capitol, recommending unto their manhood and to their youthful courage, all the estate remaining of that City, which for the space of three hundred and threescore years, had in all their wars been victorious, and gotten great conquests. Now when they, in whom rested all hope and help were departed, and had taken their leave of them, that resolved fully not to survive the winning and destruction of their City: as the very thing in it self, and the sight thereof was a lamentable and woful spectacle unto them, so the pitious weeping of women, and their uncertain running up and down, following now after one, and now after another, and asking their husbands and children, to what end, to what fatal destiny they betook them, was as dolorous a pageant, as could happen to any earthly creature. Nevertheless, a great sort of them accompanied their friends into the Castle, and no man either bad or forbade them. For although it was good and commodious for the besieged, namely, to diminish the number, and discharge themselves of the feeble multitude, yet it seemed unto them an inhuman and unkind part. The rest of the common people especially, whom so small an hill was not able to receive, and could not possibly be kept in so great scarcity of corn & victuals, departed by heaps out of the City: and marching as it were in one company together in a row, took their way to Janiculum. From thence they divided themselves sundry waies. Some slipped into the fields and country, some to the next Cities there bordering, without any Captain, without any common consent: every one following his own hope, his own head and wit now that all publike counsel was in despair, and past remedy. In this mean while, the Flamin of Quirinus, and the religious Vestal virgins leaving the regard of their own private affairs, consulted with themselves what sacred Images to carry with them, and (seeing their strength would not serve to rid away and save all) what to leave behind them, and what place was meetest to bestow and lay them up most safely. They agreed at length and thought it best, to put them in small barrells or rundlets, & within the ground to bury them in a little chappell, standing next to the Flamins house: which place for very devotion unto this day, may not for any thing be spit upon. All the rest they parted amongst themselves. And every one carrying her own burden, took the way, which over the wooden bridge leadeth to Janiculum. Upon the ascent or rise of that hill, when L. Albinus (a Commoner of Rome) saw them going, as he among other company (which unmeet for war, departed out of the City) carried his wife & children in a wain: he making even then in that hard calamity, a difference yet between divine and humane things, and thinking it an impious part, and void of all religion, that the publike Priests with the sacred Images of the people of Rome should go on foot, whiles he and his were seen riding at ease in a wagon, caused his wife and children to alight and come forth, and set the Nuns with their holy Images in their room, and brought them to Care, to which place they minded to go. All things now being set at Rome (as in such a time could be) in order sufficiently, for the defence of the Castle; the aged persons abovesaid being returned to their houses, waited for the coming of the enemy, with hearts prepared and resolved to die. Such of them as had borne offices of the chair, to the intent, that they might end their daies in the ornaments & robes of their former estate and honour, honour, and according to their vertue and deserts: in their most stately garments and habiliments, which they wear when they carried their sacred chariots upon festival daies, or wherein they rode in triumph, now sat upon their ivory chairs in the very midst and entry of their houses. There be that write, how they willingly devoted and bequeathed themselves to die for their Country and Citizens of Rome: and that M. Fabius the High Priest read and pronounced unto them a certain hymn and prescript form of prayer to that purpose. The Gauls, both for that now they had rested from fight a whole night, and so their choler was somewhat cooled, and also because they had not in any place fought a bloody and dangerous battell with them, nor even at that time won the City by any assault or force, entered the morrow after into the City, without anger and heat of furious rage, by the gate Collina, standing wide open, and so passed forward to the common place of assemblies, casting their eyes about them towards the Temples of the gods, and to the castle, which only presented some shew of war. And there leaving a sufficient guard, left haply from the Castle and Capitol they should be violently assaulted, after they were once alunder parted, they fell to ransack and rife: and meeting none at all in the void streets, some rush by heaps into the houses next hand, others go to those that were furthest off, supposing them at leastwise to be untouched, full of riches, and fit for to fill their hands. From thence again (as frightened by reason of such desolation, and fearing lest haply any fraud of the enemy might entrap them as they wandred one from another) they returned round in a ring together, into the market place, and the places near thereto. Where, when they saw the Commoners houses fast shut to & locked, and contrariwise the stately palaces of the Noblemen and chief Senators standing wide open, they were at a stand, and doubted more in a manner to enter upon the open places than the shut. And they beheld as it were with capping and crouching after a reverend manner, certain ancient personages sitting in the porches and entries of their houses, who besides their ornaments and apparel, above the ordinary estate of men, for a certain majesty which they carried in their countenance and gravity of visage, resembled the gods. And when as they turned to them, & stood looking upon them, as if they had been Idols and sacred Images, M. Papius, one of them, when a Gaul began to stroke his beard (which then they used all to wear long) with his ivory staffe (as they say) gave him a rap on the pate, and moved his patience. Whereupon he was the first that was murdered and so the rest were all killed as they sat in their chairs of state. After this massacre of these honourable personages of the Nobility, they fell upon all the rest, and spared no creature: they ransacked their houses, and when they were empty, set fire on them. But whether it were that they were not all of them desirous to destroy the City utterly, or that it was the mind of the Leaders and chief of the Gauls, that for a terror there should be seen some scarefires (if haply for the love of their houses, they that were besieged, might be induced to yield themselves:) or that all their houses were not burned at once, to the end that the remainder of the City might be as a pawn and pledge to mollifie their enemies, and make their hearts to relent: howsoever, I say it was, the fire for the first day (as usually in Cities forced and won) spread not all abroad every where, to make a generall havock. The Romans from the Castle, seeing the City full of enemies, and in every street running up and down, and in all places fresh calamities and miseries one in the neck of another, were not able to conceive the same in mind and spirit, no, nor so much as to have the right use of their ears and eyes. For to what place soever the shouts and noise of the enemies, the howling and wailing of women and children, the noise of fire, and the rattling and cracking downfalls of houses turned them aside in exceeding fear, thither they bent their minds, their faces, and eyes, as men by fortune set up aloft, as upon a stage or scaffold, to behold the fall and ruin of their Country: reserved to save nothing of all their wealth and substance, but only their own bodies: by thus much, more miserable and pitifull above all others that ever were besieged, in that being shut out from their native Country and City, they were besieged and beheld it, and all that they had, in the enemies hands. Neither as ill as the day was spent, followed there a better night. Yea & when after this troublesome night the like morrow was come, there was no time but ministered still some heavy object: and one spectacle or other of new and fresh calamities. And albeit they were loaden and overwhelmed with so many miseries, yet they nothing at all let fall or abated their courages, but resolved still, notwithstanding they saw all fired, all ruinate and laid even with the ground, manfully to defend that poor naked little hill which they held, and was their only hope left them to recover their freedom. And now seeing the same desolations daily happen they were so inured to misery, that past all sense and feeling of their own state and private fortune, they regarded nothing but their armour on their backs and swords in their hands, as the only remnants and reliques of their hope. The Gauls likewise for certain daies, had made war with the poor houses only of the City, and all to no purpose: and when they perceived in all this burning and ruins of the City, so conquered, nothing now left but armed enemies, who were not, for all so many calamities, one jot terrified, nor their minds once inclined to yeeld without further force and violence were used; they determine to try the utmost, and to make an assault upon the fortresse. So on the morrow morning very early at sound of trumpet, all the whole multitude of them, arranged themselves in the market place. From whence with an out-cry and shout, under a fence of targets over their heads, they approach the Castle. Against whom the Romans behaved themselves, neither unadvisedly, nor fearfully, strengthning their wards and quarters, with a good Corps de guard against all Advenues: and whereas they saw the banners displayed, that

A that way they opposed their strongest guards: and suffered the enemies to climb up the hill, supposing that the higher they were got up, so much the easier they might be beaten down. And being come up to the midst of the cliff, there they staid: and thence from the higher ground, which of it self in manner bare out against the enemy, with all their force they charged upon the Gauls, overturned them, and sent them down headlong: so as never after that, either any part of them, or all together would attempt that kind of service. Being therefore past hope to get up by force and arms, they make preparation for long siege: whereof untill that time they had no mind: both for that the corn which was within they had consumed in burning of the City, and in the mean space, that which was in the country about, was carried and brought to Veii. Whereupon they divided B their Army, purposing with one part thereof, to forrage and drive booties all about the nations thereby adjoining, and with the other to invest the Castle: to the end, that the forragers abroad might bring in corn to serve them that lay at the siege. Now as those Gauls departed from the City, it was their hap and fortune to come to Ardea (where Camillus abode in exile) there to make triall of the Romans valour. This Camillus being more penfive in the behalf of the publike calamity, than careful of his own: spending his spirits and wasting his body with crying out upon gods and men: thus fretting and chafing with himself, and wondring what was become of those valiant and hardy men, who under his conduct won Veii and Falerii, and who had fought other wars more valiantly alwaies than fortunately: of a sudden he heard that the Army of the Gauls approached, and that the Ardeates in great fear, fell to consultation thereabout what to do: and C even as if he had been inspired from God above, he put himself forward and entred into the midst of the people assembled, who heretofore, had obtained and forborn such publike meetings and consultations. And thus he said: "You my Masters of Ardea, mine old friends sometime, "and now my new neighbours and fellow-Citizens, for so it is fallen out by your kindness & desert, and by mine own fortune and condition: let no man think, that I, forgetfull of mine own estate am come forth hither into this audience. But the present object and publike danger forceth every man to utter and bring forth in so fearfull a time and business as this is, what help he can. And when shall I ever be thankfull unto you for your favours and demerits, if now I stand still and do nothing? Or where shall I ever stand you in stead, if not in war? By my skill herein, "I flourished in my Country, and being in war invincible, was in peace by unthankfull neighbours and unkind Citizens banished. And now have ye good occasion offered, and opportunity (O ye Ardeates) both to make recompence, for those so great pleasures and curtesies in times past received of the people of Rome, as your selves do well remember, (and therefore be it spoken without upbraiding and reproaching of any mindfull persons) and also to win great honour of war, unto this City, by defeating a common enemy unto both. This nation, which thus cometh towards us with a dissolute and disordered army, are those to whom God and nature hath given bodies more big and corpulent than strong and able, hearts more stout and courageous than constant and resolute: whereby they bring with them alwaies into the field more shew of terrour, than true valour and execution. Whereof, the late foil and discomfiture of the Romans may be a sufficient proof and triall. They won the City when the gates stood open unto E them: a small power from the Castle and Capitoll was able to withstand and repell them. And weary already of the tediousness of siege, they are faine to depart. stragling up and down, and wandering along the country. Their manner is when they have filled their bellies with wine and good victuals, (which they devour full greedily and hastily wheresoever they can come by it:) so soon as night cometh on, without any place of defence, without watch or ward to lay themselves along like brut beasts, here and there by the waters sides. And now upon their good success, are they more secure and retchless, than they were wont to be. If ye be disposed to defend your wals, & not all to turn French, gather your selves together, & at the first watch of the night arm, and to your weapons: Follow me to a massacre, and not to a skirmish: for if I do not deliver them unto your hands fast asleep to be hewn in pieces like sheep and oxen, I refuse not to see the F same end of mine estate at Ardea, that I have found already at Rome. There was not one there, howsoever affected he was, friend or foe to Camillus, but was perswaded that the like warrior was not in those daies to be found again. The assembly being broken up, they refresh their bodies, ready to fight so soon as ever the Signall should be propounded. Which being put forth, in the beginning and first watch of the night, they were ready with Camillus at the gates. And gone they were not far from the town, but they found (as it was foretold them) the Gauls camp without Corps de guard, neglected on every side: and it with a mighty cry they assail. There was in no place fight, but killing every where: and their naked bodies (as they lay fast asleep) were hacked and cut in pieces. Howbeit, some of those that were furthest off, being scared out of their couches not knowing what violence or from whence it was, took to their heels and fled: other some stumbled at unawares upon the very enemy. A great part of them being come into the territory of Ardea, were by the townsmen who sallied out upon them as they were dispersed, environed and slain. The like slaughter to this there was of the Tuscans in the Country of Veii: who had so little pity and compassion, to see a City which well near for four hundred years space bordering upon them, was now surpris'd by a strange enemy not heard of afore, that even at that very time they made rodes into the Territory of Rome, and laden with booty from thence, purposed to assail even Veii also and the garrison, being the only place and means of rescue, and the last hope of the Roman name.

The Roman souldiers that lay in garrison there, had espied these Tuscans ranging about the country, and gathered together in a body to drive booties afore them: and withall they descried their Camp pitched not far from Veii. Where, at first they pitted their own estate, but alter, they fell into an indignation and anger that the Tuscans also, from whom they had diverted the Gauls war upon themselves, should in their calamities thus scorn them and have them in derision: so as they could scarcely temper themselves and forbear, but presently set upon them. But being staied perforce by Captain Ceditius, a Centurion whom they themselves had made their Ruler, they put off this exploit untill night: Only their Commander and Leader was not to be compared with Camillus: else all the service was archieved in the same order, and with as good speed and happy success. Over and besides, by the guidance and direction of those prisoners which remained unchain I over-night, they went forward as far as Salina, to another power of the Tuscans, and in the night following, upon a sudden they made a greater havock and slaughter of them, and so in joyous manner with double conquest they return to Veii. At Rome in this mean time, the siege for the most part was but cold and slack, and all quiet on both sides: whiles the Gauls regarded and looked to this only, That none of their enemies should make an escape through their guards. At what time a certain valiant yong Roman behaved himself so, as his own countrimen and enemies too had him in great admiration. There was a set sacrifice or solemnity to be celebrated by the house and linage of Fabii, in the Mount Quirinalis. For the accomplishment whereof, Caius Fabius Dorsuo in his holy robes, after the Gabins fashion, bearing in his hand the holy complements thereto belonging, came down from the Capitol, passed through the midst of the enemies corps de K guard, and nothing moved, whatsoever was done or said to terrifie him, went on forth right to the mount Quirinal. And when he had there performed and dispatched all solemnities, returning the same way with like constant countenance and comly pace, hoping assuredly, that the gods would be mercifull and gracious unto him, whose worship he had not left undone for any fear of death: he retired again to his company into the Capitol: whether it were that the Gauls were astonied at his wondrous boldness, or rather were touched in conscience with a reverent regard of Religion, wherein that nation is very zealous and devout. At Veii in the mean while, they gathered not only heart every day more than other, but strength and forces also; for that not only Romans thither repaired out of the country, such as either in discomfiture of the battell, or for the calamity of the City now taken, had been scattered: but also out of Latium divers of their own accord L had flocked thither, to have their share in the pillage. Now they thought it high time to return to their country again, and to deliver it out of the enemies hands. The body was strong enough, but without an head it was. The very place put them in mind of Camillus, and a great part of the souldiers were such as had atchieved prosperous exploits under his leading and conduct. And Ceditius gave out plainly, that no god or man should make him give over his government, but would himself as mindfull of his own place, call for a General. So by general consent it was agreed, that Camillus should be sent for from Ardea, but with the advice before of the Senat which was at Rome. So modest were they in all their carriage, and so precisely observed they (even in their desperate case) the due respect and regard of every action. Now to pass through the wards of their enemies, was an hard and dangerous adventure. To this exploit therefore, Pontius Comini- M us, a valorous young man, promised his service. Who bearing himself upon a bark or corke under him, hulled along the Tyber down the water to the City; and so the next way from the strand, over a steep cliff (which was negligently or not at all guarded by the enemy) he passeth through the Capitoll, and being brought to the Magistrates, declareth there his message from the Army. When he had received the Senates decree to this effect: Imprimis, That Camillus should be called back again out of exile by a Ward-leet, or the suffrages of the Curia: Item, that by the voices of the people he should be created Dictator out of hand: and that the souldiers might have for their Generall whom they desired: the messenger returned the same way back again to Veii. And Embassadours were sent to Camillus at Ardea, who conducted him to Veii. But I would rather believe that he departed not from Ardea, before he had certain intelligence of the Act of the Senate. N And for that neither without the will of the people, he might change the place whereto he was confined, nor unless he were named Dictator, have the conduct of the Army; there passed an Act of all the Wards, and Dictator was he declared in his absence. Whiles these things were a doing at Veii, the Castle of Rome and the Capitoll was in very great danger. For the Gauls, either having found out a mans footing, that way as the messenger went from Veii, or espied at the cliff of Carmentis, an easie place to climb up: in a clear night sent a man before unarmed to assay the passage, & then gave him up his armour, and where it was steep, one helped, lifted up, and drew up another, as the difficulty of the place required. So as they got up to the top with such silence, that not only the Sentinels were not aware of them, but also the dogs (a watchfull creature at every noise in the night) were not once awakened therewith. But they could not so escape the geese, O which were consecrated unto Juno, and for all the scarcity of viſuals, were spared and not killed up. And this it was that saved them all. For with their gagling and fluttering of their wings, M. Manlius who three years before had been Consul, a right hardy and noble warrior, was awaked. Who taking weapon in hand, speedily went forth and raised the rest withall to take arms. And whiles all else made hast in a great fright, he stroke the Gaul who now stood upon the top, with the boss and pike of his buckler, and turned him down. The fall of whom overturned them that were

A were next. Then slew he others, (whiles they were in fear) who had laid their weapons out of hand, and took hold of the stones whereto they clinged close. By which time, the rest being come together, some flinging darts, others casting down stones, tumbled their enemies back, and the whole power of them lost their sure footing and fell down headlong. This tumult being appeased the rest of the night (so far forth, as men might with troubled minds, seeing that even the danger, past disquieted them) they gave themselves to sleep. When day was come, the souldiers by sound of Trumpet were summoned to assemble before their Tribunes, and considering there was reward due both to well-doing and mis-doing: Manius first for his valour was commended and rewarded, not only by the Tribunes military, but also by consent of all the souldiers. Upon whom,

B they amongst them all, bestowed and brought home to his house (which stood upon the Castle hill) wheat-meal by the half-pints, and wine by the quarts. A matter of small reckoning to be spoken of: but in that scarcity, this might be an argument of their love and affection, when every man beguiled his own belly, pluckt from himself and the necessities of his life, and conferred the same to the honour and recompence of that one man. Then were summoned to appear the sentinels of that place where the enemy climed up undescried. And when as P. Sulpicius a Tribune Military, had pronounced that he would exercise martial law upon them all, the souldiers cried out with open mouth, and laid all the fault on one watchman: and so for fear of a mutiny he spared all the rest: and with their generall consent and approbation, he caused that undoubted guilty person to be thrown down from the rock. Whereupon they were more careful and circumspect

C in their watch, both amongst the Gauls (because it was commonly noised that there passed messengers to and fro between Veii and Rome: and also amongst the Romans, for the remembrance of the late danger by night. But above all other miseries, that follow war and siege, the famine was fore in both the Armies. The Gauls were plagued with pestilence besides: for that they had pitched their tents in a place lying between two hills: exceeding hot by reason of the fires, and full of smoak, carrying both dust and ashes, when any wind was stirring: which be things that of all others, that nation cannot abide, as being used to wet and cold. Thus being smothered with heat, and therewith stifled and choaked again, they died with contagious diseases like rotten sheep. And now for idleness that they would not bury them severally one by one, they laid the dead bodies on heaps one with another, and so burnt them: and made that place famous and notable by the name of Busta Gallica, i.e. Gaulbury. Hereupon, they grew to make some truce with

D the Romans, and emparled together by sufferance of the Generals. In which parlies, when as the Gauls very often alledged the famine, and upon that extremity perswaded them to yeeld: it is said, that the Romans for to put them by that opinion of them, in many places from the Capitol flung out loaves of bread into the very stations and corps de guard of the enemies. But at length neither could their hunger be dissembled, nor sustained any longer. Therefore, whiles the Dictator mustereth a power at Ardea by himself, he commandeth the Generall of horiemen, L. Valerius, to have away the Army from Veii: and maketh so good preparation, and furnisheth himself so, as he might be able to match his enemies, and to charge upon them. In the mean season, the army of the Capitol wearied out with watching and warding, having surmounted all humane miseries besides

E hunger, which only of all others, nature would not suffer to be overcome: looking day by day for succour from the Dictator now, at last when not only their food, but their hope also failed them, and were grown to that weakness, that when they went to keep their guard, they could hardly bear the weight of their armour, they agreed and gave consent either to yeeld or to ransom themselves upon any condition, they cared not what. Whiles the Gauls also gave forth plainly, and said, they might be entreated for a smal consideration to give over siege. Then the Senat went together, and gave Commission to the Tribunes Military, to bargain and go through with them. So by a parley or treaty had between P. Sulpicius Tribune Military, and Brennus the Duke of the Gauls, a conclusion was made, and that people, who within a short time should be Lords of the world, were valued and esteemed at a thousand pound weight of Gold. This in itself was

F a most odious and shameful thing, but there was adjoynd thereunto a foul indignity. For the Gauls brought forth false weights and uneven ballances. And when the Tribune refused them, behold, the insolent and proud Gaul would needs have his sword weighed too for vantage, adding this speech moreover, (which was intolerable for the Romans to hear) Woe worth men conquered, and down with them still. But neither God nor man would abide the Romans to live ransomed. For by good hap, before that shameful sum of money by composition was paid, before (I say) that upon some wrangling that fell between, all the Gold was weighed out, cometh the Dictator in the manner, and commandeth the gold to be had away, and the Gauls to void. And when as they made resistance and pleaded the capitulation and bargain, he again replieth, and saith, That the composition was not good, nor ought to stand, which after he was made

G Dictator, had been by an inferiour Magistrate concluded, without his commandment & warrant: and withall warneth the Gauls to prepare themselves to fight: commanding his own souldiers to cast all their bag and baggage down on a heap, to put on their harness, to make ready their weapons, and by dint of steel, and not by weight of sword to redeem their Country, having in sight before their eyes the Churches of their gods, their wives and children, and the soil whereon the City stood (deformed now with miseries of war) and all things else which they ought by good reason to defend, recover, and be revenged for. Hereupon he marshalled his battell as the ground would give him leave, being the plot only of a City half ruinate and lying along, and with all of it self naturally uneven. Forcassing and providing for all things with special choice and preparation to serve his souldiers turn, as far as martiall skill could possibly reach. The Gauls affrighted at this so strange an occurrent, betook them to their weapons, and in a furious fit of anger, rather than with any considerate discretion, they ran upon the Romans. Now had Fortune turned her wheel: now Gods help and mans policy assisted the Romans. Therefore at the first encounter the Gauls were discomfited with as little difficulty, as they themselves had atchieved the victory at Allia. Afterwards also, in another more set battell in the way of Gabes, about eight miles from Rome (to which place they were fled) they were vanquished by the conduct and leading of the same Camillus. For there were they slain in every place, their Camp taken, and not so much as one left to bring news of their overthrow. The Dictator having thus delivered his Country out of the enemies hand, returneth again with triumph into the City. And in all the sports and pleasant ditties which the souldiers rudely after their manner devised, he was stiled Romulus the father of the Country, the second founder of the City, which were no vain titles of commendation.

Busta Gallica

When he had saved his Country thus in war, he preserved it afterwards again undoubtedly in time of peace, namely, in gain saying their transmigration to Veii: whiles both the Tribunes enforced that matter more earnestly, now after the burning of the City, and the Commons also of themselves were more enclined thereunto, than before. Which was one cause, that after his triumph he resigned not up his Dictatorship: being requested also by the Senat not to leave the City in so doubtful terms of perplexity. And first and formost (as he was evermore a most precise devout man and religious) he proposed those things which concerned the immortal gods: and causeth enact of the Senat to be made. Imprimis, that all the Temples (for that the enemies had held and possessed them) should be repaired, bounded out new, and purged. Item, that the manner of cleansing them should be searched out of the books of *Sybill*a by the Duumvirs. Moreover, that with the inhabitants of Cere, there should be made a league of publike and mutual hospitality, for receiving the sacred Images and Priests of the people of Rome: by the means and favour of which people, the honour and service of the immortal gods was not forelet and discontinued. Item, That there should be set out the Plaies called Capitolini, for that Jupiter Optimus Maximus had stil defended and preserved his own seat, and the Refuge of the people of Rome, in that fearful time of trouble. And that M. Furius should ordain a guild, or fraternity out of those that dwelt in the hill of the Capitol, for the celebration of those plaies. Finally, to the end there should be also some satisfaction and expiation made of that night voice which being the fore-messenger and warning-giver of their destruction before the coming of the Gauls, was heard and yet neglected, a motion was made, that a Temple should be erected in the new cansey to Aius Locutius. The Gold which was recovered by force from the Gauls, as also that which out of other Temples in that fearful hurly-burly, was brought into the chancel or chappel of Jupiter, because they could not call to mind precisely into which Churches they were to carry it again accordingly, was all judged holy and sacred to Jupiter; and order taken, that it should be bestowed and laid up under his shrine. And how devout the City was, appeared before in this, That when there was not gold enough in the common chest, to make up the full sum of the ransom that was agreed upon between them and the Gauls, they took that which the matrons and wives of Rome contributed, and all to spare and save the gold appointed to holy uses. The Marrons were therefore thanked, and this honour besides done unto them, That after their death they as well as their husbands, should be openly praised in a solemn funeral Oration. When those things were once accomplished which appertained to the Gods, and all that belonged to the Senate for to do: then and not afore, upon the stirs that the Tribunes kept with the Commons continually, with their speeches in all their assemblies, soliciting them to leave the ruins of the City, and to remove with all they had to Veii, a town readily furnished to their hand: then (I say) and not before, Camillus accompanied with the whole Senat, came up into the common place of audience, and there before the people spake in this wise. "So grievous to me, O Quirites, is all contention and variance with the Tribunes of the Commons, that while I lived at Ardea I found no other comfort and solace, in that most heavy and woful banishment of mine but this, That I was far enough off from those debates and jars. In regard whereof, I would never have come again, I assure you, but that you called me back, both by act of Senat, and also by approbation of the people. And it is not in me any change of mind, but your calamity and distressed estate, that hath forced me to return again unto you. For this was the very point that you stood upon, namely, that our country might continue still and keep her ancient place: and not I wis, that I should remain and dwell therein again. And even now verily, would I be still, and keep silence willingly, but that this quarrel also is in the behalf of my foresaid country: the which to fail (to long as life doth last) for others O might be a shameful reproach, but for Camillus it were most impious & abominable. For to what end have we returned to it again? To what purpose, when it was besieged have we delivered it out of the enemies hands, if when we have recovered it, we our selves abandon and leave the same? And when as the gods and men of Rome kept still, and inhabited the Capitol and the cafile, notwithstanding the Gauls were Lords, and possessed of the whole City, is it possible that both Castle and Capitol, after the City is regained, should be forsaken and abandoned of the Roman

of M. Furius Camillus to the people of Rome.

- A "Roman victors? And shal our prosperous hand over our enemies bring greater desolation to our City, than adversity hath? Verily, if it were so, that we made no reckoning of that religion and divine solemn service, instituted even with the foundation of our City: & that we counted all vanities that have been delivered unto us by tradition from our ancestors: yet so evident a power of God hath assisted the Romans, that I must needs think, that men can now no longer neglect the worship of God. For confide with me I pray you, either the prosperity or the adversity of these years late past, one after another; ye shall find, that as long as we served God and followed his will so long we prospered & went forward: and all the while that we despised the same, we ever went backward and fell to decay. And first and foremost the Veient war (recount I beseech
- B "you) how many years lasted it? how troublesome and painful was it? And ended it was not, before that by the direction and advertisement of the gods, the water was let out of the Albane pool? What shall I speak of this late & strange calamity of our own City? Began it (and say truth) before that voice which came from heaven was made so light of, concerning the coming of the Gauls? before the law of nations was by our Embassadors broken? and before that through the same neglect of the gods, that fact was by us winked at and put up, which indeed should have been punished and revenged? This was the cause that we were vanquished, made captive, put to our ranfome, and suffered such condign punishment both at Gods hand and at mans, as that we are made an example and amazement to the whole world. Then our adversity and affliction put us in mind of our religion, and the fear of the gods. We fled into the Capitol to the gods, even
- C "to the very seat of Jupiter Optimus Maximus: and when our own privat estate went to havock, the sacred monuments yet and holy Images, some we hid in the earth, some we conveyed away into the neighbour Towns, and removed them out of our enemies sight. And albeit we were forlorn and given over both of God and men, yet gave not we over, nor discontinued the service of the gods. And therefore gave they us our country again, they gave us victory, and the ancient honour of war which we had lost; and upon our enemies heads, who (blinded with covetousness) in the weighing of gold brake both covenant and fidelity, they have turned all fearfulness, all flight & slaughter. Considering then, O Quirites, by these so great and apparent signs, & testimonies in the course of this world, what it is to serve God, & what it is to dishonor him, perceive ye not what wickedness we go about to plunge ourselves into, being scarcely got forth
- D "and escaped out of the shipwrack and perill of our former sin and calamity? A City we have founded and built, by the will of God and due observation of Augury and Auspices, no corner therein, but full of religion, full of divine Majesty: and for solemn sacrifices, there are set daies when they shall be celebrated, there are places also appointed wherein they ought to be performed. And are ye about then, O Quirites, to leave all these gods both publike & privat? how forgetteth this deed of yours with that, which lately during the time of the siege, was seen with no less admiration of our enemies, than our own selves in that Noble young Gentleman C. Fabius? when through the pikes of the Gauls, he departed out of the Cattle, and performed a solemn duty of the house of Fabius, even upon the mount Quirinal? What, can ye allow and like that the sacred ceremonies of privat families, should not so much as in time of war be intermitted:
- E "and suffer now the publike sacrifices and the Roman gods, in time of peace to be neglected, and the City abandoned? That our High Priests and Flamins should be less curious and precise in the publike service of God, than a private Citizen was in the Anniversary feast of his family and kindred? But peradventure some one may say, We will do the same at Vesii, or we will send from thence our Priests hither, for to execute that ministry. Neither of which can be done, saving the due observance of holy ceremonies. For, to say nothing in general of all other holy daies, and of all the gods besides; In that one high feast and solemn dinner of Jupiter, can a Pulvinar be celebrated, or a sacred Table be spread and furnished in any place, but in the Capitol? What should I speak of the eternal fires of Vesta? and of that Image, which as a pawn and security of our imperial state, is kept within the safeguard of that Temple? What should I speak of
- F "those your Ancilia and Scutcheons? O Mars Gradivus, and thou father Quirinus: are ye well contented that all these festivall and sacred solemnities, which are all of equal time with the City, yea, and of more antiquity (some of them) than the foundation of the City, should be forsaken in a profane place: But see what ods there is between us and our ancestors? They left unto us certain solemn feasts and sacrifices to be celebrated in the Alban mountain and in Lavinium. Was it then a matter of conscience and religion, that some festival solemnities were brought unto us from our enemies Cities to Rome? And shall we translate the same from hence to our enemies City Vesii, without a great and hainous offence, that would require expiation? Do but call to mind I pray you, how often our feasts and sacrifices have been renewed and reformed clean, for that some one old accustomed ceremony, either by chance or for want of taking heed, hath
- G "been over-slipt and left out. And even of late, what was it else that (after the strange miracle of the Alban Pool) relieved our Common-weal so distressed with the Veient war, but the reformation of our divine service, and renewing of our Auspices? And more than this, we as it were in remembrance of antient religion and devotion, have both brought unto Rome forrain gods, and also have instituted and devised new. What a notable and festival day was that (in regard of the exceeding zeal and forward affection of the Matrons) upon which Queen Juno late translated from Vesii, was dedicated in Aventine? And to Aius Locutius, for a voice from heaven heard

"heard in the new cause, we caused a Temple to be erected. The Capitoline plaies have we ad- H
 "ded to other solemn feasts; & thereto we have ordained and founded a new guild or fraternity,
 "even by the advice of the Senat. And what need was there, that we should have done any of these "things, if we meant, together with the Gauls, to leave the City of Rome? If we abode not in "the Capitol (so many months while we were besieged) willingly and without constraint? And "if we were for fear of our enemies, held back from going elsewhere? Thus much of our festival
 "daies and temples. But what shall become now, I pray you of our Priests? Never think ye once
 "of it, what a sinfull deed you are about? As for the Vestall Virgines and Nuns, it is certain, this "is their only place, forth of which nothing ever could drive them but the winning of the City.
 "The Flamin of Jupiter may not lie forth of the City one night: and will ye make these Priests I "of Romans to become Veientians? And shall thy virgins indeed, O Vesta, leave thee now? and "shall the Flamin dwelling in a strange place, for every night he is absent, taint with so great impi-"ety, both himself and the Common wealth? As for other matters, which we do with great so"lemnity by the direction of the Augurs (and all well near within the Pomeri or compass of the "City) how can we forget or neglect them? Namely, the Ward-leet or assembly of the Curia for "matters of war: also the other of Centuries, wherein ye chuse your Consuls and Military Tri"bunes, where can they be held (if we respect the will of the gods and regard the Auspices) but in "the places accustomed? Shall we remove all these to Vei? or shall the people repair hither from "thence with so great trouble and inconvenience, to a desolate City, forsaken of God and man, "whensoever they would hold those assemblies? But the present necessity (they will say) forceth us K
 "to leave a town that is wasted with fire, and wholly ruinate, and to go to Vei, where all stands "safe and sound, and not to put the poor Commons to the toile and charge of new building. That "this is a pretence and cause rather devised, than meant in earnest, if I should say nothing, I think
 "appeareth manifestly unto you already, O Quirites, who remember that before the coming of "the French men, whiles your publike buildings and privat houses were whole, and whiles the "City stood upright on foot, this self-same motion was made and debated, as touching the remo"ving to Vei. Consider now ye Tribunes what difference there is between mine opinion and
 "yours: ye are of mind, that if it had not then been meet to be done, yet now verily it were "good and requisite: I contrariwise (I marvel not I pray you before you hear what I will say) am
 "of opinion, that albeit we might then gone, whiles our whole City flourished, yet now we L "were not to leave it thus ruinate & decayed. For at that time we had some cause to remove into "a conquered City, namely, Victory, a glorious thing to ourselves and our posterity: but this re"moving now, were reproachfull and shamefull to our selves, but glorious and honourable to the "Gauls. For we shall not be thought to have left our country as conquerours, but to have lost it as "conquered. And shall it be said, that our running away at Allia, the winning of our City, the be"sieging of the Capitoll, hath imposed this necessity upon us, as to leave our house and home and "to make shifts, to seek our own exile and departure out of that place which we are not able to "defend? And were, indeed, the Gauls able to pull down and rase that City of Rome, which the "Romans shal not be thought able to reedifie and set up again? What remaineth now in case they "should come upon us afresh, with a new power of men, for certain it is that their multitude is M "incredible) & were willing to dwell here in this City by them conquered, & by you abandoned,
 "but that ye gently permit and suffer them? Nay, What and if not the Gauls, but your old enemies
 "the Aequians and the Volscians would remove and come to Rome, would you be willing to have "them become Romans, and your selves Veientians? Would ye not rather, that this desert and "waist ground as it lieth, were yours, than to be a City peopled by your enemies? For I cannot see,
 "I assure you, whether of the twain, were more to be detested. And because (forsooth) ye are loath
 "to set to building, are ye resolved to abide these mischiefs & these shameful reproaches? If through"out the whole City there might not be built a more commodious or stately house, than is that "cottage there, of our founder, were it not better to dwell in cottages like shepherds & peasants, so
 "it be among your sacred monuments and household gods, than all at once generally to go into N
 "exile? Our ancestors and forefathers being a mixture of divers countries, and no other than herd-
 "men, finding in these parts nothing but woods and bogs, in a short time built a new City out of "the ground: and are we loath, having yet our Capitol, our castle safe, the Temples of our gods "standing still, to reedifie it now that it is burnt. That which every one of us would have done, if "our houses had been fired, refuse we altogether to do in the common scarefire of the City? Give "me leave a little. What & if by some villany, or by mischance there should be a scarefire at Vei, &
 "by reason of the wind (as it is often seen) the flame spread & catch, and so consume a great part of "the City, shall we go from thence by and by, and seek to Fidena or Gabii, or some other City "near at hand to remove unto? Is the very native soil of our country, and this ground which we "call our mother, of no power at all to keep us here, but doth the whole love and affection of O
 "our country, rest in the superficial outside, and in the timber and rafters of our houses? Verily, "confess I will unto you (although I take less pleasure to remember the wrongs you did me, than "the calamity which I endured) when I was absent and in exile, so often as I thought of my coun"try, all these things ran in my mind: the hills, the plain, the Tyber, the coasts all about, which was
 "my daily prospect; and this air, under which I was born and brought up. All which, O Quirites, "let them move you rather now with an affection to them for to tarry stil in this your habitation, than

A "than disquiet you hereafter, and torment you for the want and mis- of them, when you have "once left and forgone them. Nor without good cause both God and man chose this place for "the building of this City: most healthy and wholesome hills: a very convenient and commodi"ous river: to bring in corn and other fruits out of the inland parts, to receive provision and o"ther victuals from the sea-coasts: the sea it self near enough for commodities, and not exposed
 "and open by too much nearness to the dangers of forrain navies: the very heart and centre of "all Italy, a place as a man would say, naturally made, and only for that City to grow and encrease
 "in. And that doth the very largeness and greatness of a City so newly founded, plainly prove.
 "It is now three hundred threescore and four years, and not above, since the foundation there"of, O Quirites. Amongst so many Nations of greatest antiquity, thus long ye have made war: B "and all this while (to say nothing of particular Cities) neither the Volsicians together with the "Æquians peopling so many towns, and those so strong, nor all Hetruria so mighty by sea and "land, and containing the whole breadth between the two seas, are in war to you comparable.
 "Which being so, what reason have you (in the devils name) when ye have had sufficient proof
 "already of it, to try again new experiments? considering now, that albeit your valour and vertue
 "may go with you eliewhither, yet surely, the good luck and fortune of this place can never de"part and remove from hence? Here is the Capitoll, where sometimes upon the finding of a
 "mans head, answer was made by diviners and wizards, That in that very place should be the "head of all puissance, and the imperiall seat of the whole world. Here, at what time as the Ca-
 "pitoll, by the direction of the Augurs should be voided and cleared of all other Chappels, Lady C "Juventus, and god Terminus, to the great joy of our forefathers, would not suffer themselves to "be stirred out of their place. Here are the fires of Vesta, here be the Scutcheons come down from "heaven, here are all the gods, favourable & gracious still unto you, so long as here ye make abode
 "and remain, Camillus in all his Oration throughout moved them much: but that part thereof
 "touching religion (by report) was most effectuell. But that which struck it dead, and put all out "of doubt, was a certain word that fell out to be spoken fitly to the purpose. For at what time as "the Senat a while after was gathered together in the Court Hofilia, to debate about these things
 "and certain companies of souldiers that returned from their guards, chanced in the mean time
 "to march through the market place, one Captain hapned to speak in the Comitium, and said, D "Pitch down thy ensign standard bearer, here will be our best abode. Which voice was not so soon
 "heard, but both the Senat being come out of the Council House, cried with one accord, That "they took that omen for good luck, and happy presage: and also the Commons all gathered "thereabout, approved the same. After this, when the foresaid Act of transmigration was once "clean dashed and abolished, the City began to be built confusedly, and without order. Tile was "allowed at the common charges: to dig either stone, or hew timber, every man had liberty
 "where he could, putting in sureties, that within the compass of that year they would finish their "buildings. The haste they made, caused them to have no regard of drawing out the streets di"rectly, whiles every man built in the void places without respect of his own or other mens "ground. Which is the cause that the out-sinks and vaults which first were conveyed through E "the common streets, now run every where under mens houses, and the form of the City seemeth
 "as if it were built at random (as every man could catch a place for himself) rather than distinct"ly ranged, and set out in good order unto them.

The Sixth Book

Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the Foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the Sixth Book.

I T containeth the fortunate wars against the Æquians, the Volsicians, and Tuscans. Four Tribes were added to the former, Stellatina, Sabbatina, Promentina, Arniensis. M. Manlius, who had defended the Capitoll from the Gauls, whiles he discharged the debts of those that were in danger of their creditors, and released such as were then imprisoned, was convicted of aspiring to be King, and thrown down from the cliff Tarpeia. In whose reproach a decree was made by the Senat, that none of the house of Man-G lius should be surnamed Marcus: C. Licinius, and L. Sextius, Tribunes of the Commons, proposed a law, that Consuls also might be chosen out of the Commons, who were created before from among the Nobles only. And albeit the Senators withstood them with earnest endeavour, yet by reason that for five years space the same Tribune continued the only Magistrates of the City, they went through with that law and got it enacted. And L. Sextius was created the first Consul that ever was of Commons.
 A second Law there passed likewise, That no man might possess above five hundred acres of land.

The Recapitulation of the former five Books.

Vhat acts from the building of the City of Rome unto the taking of the same, the Romans have atchieved, first, under the government of Kings, afterwards of Consuls and dictators, Decemvirs, and Tribunes Consular, as well in the wars abroad as seditions at home; I have in five books declared, Matters obscure, both in regard of exceeding antiquity (as things that a far off hardly be discerned:) and also for that in those daies there were very few writings and monuments, the only faithfull safeguard, and true remembrancers of deeds past: and besides, whatsoever was registred in the Commentaries of the Priests, and in other publike or privat records, the same for the most part, when the City was burned, perished withall. But now from henceforward, their civill affairs of policy, and martiall exploits in war, ensuing after a second beginning of the City (as springing again with more fresh shoots and fruitfull sprouts from the root of the old stock) shall be delivered in more plain and certain manner.

Camillus bare the Dictatorship a whole year, which otherwise was limited within six months.

Q. Fabius censored.

Dismal daies.
† 18 of July.

And to begin withall, look by whom the state first was underropped and set upright, upon him (as chief and principall) it still bare and rested, and that was M. Furius: whom the Romans would not suffer to give up his Dictatorship before one year was fully expired. As for those Tribunes (Consular) in time of whose government the City was lost, they liked not that they should call and hold an assembly for Election of Magistrates the year following. So the matter came to an Interreign. Now while the City was busie in continuall work and labour, about reedifying and repairing their buildings, Q. Fabius so soon as he was out of his office, was by C. Martius, a Tribune of the Commons, arrested to make his answer at a day appointed. Who laid to his charge, That he contrary to the Law of Nations, had fought against the Gauls, unto whom he was sent in embassage, and as an Orator only. But he avoided his judicciall trial, by his death: and died so just against the time, that many men thought it was voluntary and wrought by his own hands. Then P. Cornelius Scipio first entred upon the Interreign: and after him M. Furius Camillus the second time. He created Tribunes Military in Consuls authority, A. Valerius Publicola the second time, L. Virginus, P. Cornelius, A. Manlius, L. Aemilius, and L. Posthumus. These men presently after the Interreign, were not so soon entred into office, but before all other things, they consulted with the Senat in matters concerning Religion and conscience. And first of all they commanded, that all the instruments of leagues and confederacies, the ordinances and laws also (& those were the twelve tables, & certain Statutes made by the Kings) should be sought up as many as could be found extant. Whereof some were published abroad, even amongst the Common people: but such as pertained properly to holy Rites, and divine service, were by the Priests and Prelates suppressed; especially, of purpose to hold the minds of the people in a reverent awe of religion and devotion. Then began they to reason and debate about the dismal daies. And the fifteenth day before the * Calends of August, so notorious for a twofold loss and overthrow; upon which day at Cremera the Fabii were all slain, and after at Allia an unfortunate field was fought, even to the utter ruin and desolation of the City, they named of the latter misfortune, Alliensis: and set this unlucky mark upon it, That it should be reputed unmeet and inconvenient for any business, as well publike as private. Some think, because upon the next day following the * Ides of July, Sulpitius the Tribune Military could not by sacrifice find any tokens of happy speed, nor obtain the grace and favour of the gods; whereupon three daies after, the Roman host fell shamefully into the hands of the enemies: therefore, the morrow also after the Ides was interdicted, and men were commanded to forbear and abstain from doing sacrifice: and thereupon likewise, the day next following the Calends and the Nones, were by tradition held as ominous and dismall as the other.

But long they might not quietly sit about the devising of means to reform the Common-weal, and set it upright again after so grievous and dangerous a fall. For of the one side, the Volscians, their old enemies, took arms, intending the finall destruction of the Roman name. On the other side, the Merchants brought news, That the Princes and chief of all the Nations of Hetruria were banded and confederate together in a Diet held at the Temple of Voltumna, to make war upon them. Besides a fresh and new fear came upon them by reason of the rebellion of the Latines and Hernicks, who after the battell at the pool Regillus, for the space almost of an hundred years, had continued fast in loyall league and amity with the people of Rome. Therefore being thus greatly affrighted on every side, that all the world might see apparently that the State of Rome was not only hated of her enemies, but despised also of her allies: it was thought good and resolved upon, that by his direction and rule, the Common-wealth should now be maintained and defended, by whose conduct and guidance it was relieved and recovered: and that M. Furius Camillus should be created Dictator. He being declared Dictator, named Q. Servilius Hala for Generall of the Horsemen. And having proclaimed a law-yeed (or vacation from Courts of Law) he took muster of all the younger sort and serviceable men: but so, as the elder people were not left out, as many as were of strength sufficient for service. Unto whom he likewise ministred the military oath of Alleageance, and enrolled them by hundreds in the muster book. When he had

A had thus levied a power of men, and furnished them with armour, he divided them into three parts. The one he opposed against Hetruria in the Country of Veii: another he commanded to lie encamped before the City. Over these A. Manlius a Tribune military was made Captain: those which were sent against the Tuscans had L. Amylius for their Commander. A third part he himself led against the Volscians: and not far from Lanuvium (the place is called Ad-Metium) he began to assault their Camp. The enemies had put themselves on this their journey, with a kind of scornful contempt, as thinking the whole manhood in a manner of Rome, was by the French clean spent and wasted. But when they heard once, that Camillus was the Lord General, it stroke such a fear and terror among them, that they were glad to defend themselves by the strength of their trench and rampier, yea, and to fence it round about with huge-piled heaps of wood and trees, that their enemies might have no passage to enter in upon their munitions. Which when Camillus perceived, he gave order to set on fire that Barricado which stood in his way. And as good hap was, the wind was big and high, and blew full upon the enemy. So that not only he made way by fire, but also with the flames thereof that went toward the Camp, with the vapour like-wile and smoke, and the crackling noise of the green wood, he so amated & astonied the enemies, that the Romans had less ado to pass the trench and pallisado, into the Camp of the Volscians, than in getting over the mound and enclosure consumed with fire. Having thus defeated and slain his enemies, and won withall the Camp in the same brunt, the Dictator gave the whole spoile unto the souldiers: which to them was so much the more welcome, as they less hoped for it at their General's hand: who was never known to be lavish of gift, and over-liberal in dealing rewards.

C After this he followed them that fled, in chace, wasted and foraged their whole country, and at length (in the seventieth year of the war) he wholly subdued the Volscians, and forced them to yield subjection. After this conquest, he departed from thence against the Equians, who likewise made preparations for war. Their forces he surpris'd and defeated at Bola, and assailed not only their Camp, but also forced the City, and at the first assault won both.

But while fortune smiled thus, what way soever Camillus went, as being the only stay of the Roman state: so on another side the fear of peril greatly encreased. For the Tuscans well near all up in arms, lay before Sutrium, and besieged it being in league with the people of Rome. Whose Embassadors came unto the Senat to entreat for succour in their distrels, and had a decree granted unto them, that the Dictator with all speed should rescue the *Sutrin*s. But being so straightly beleaguered, that they might not abide the delay of this their hope, for that the townsmen, who were but few in number, were over-wearied with working, watching, and bloody fighting, (all which lay still upon the same men without intermission) they were driven by composition to surrender up the City to the enemies: and being disarmed and sent away with a single sute of apparel (after a piteous sort all a-row) departed the town, & left their dwelling places. But see, it fortun'd that Camillus at the same time came in the very manner with the Roman Army and met them. At whose feet the multitude all sorrowfull lay prostrate: their Nobles and chief men in this extremity fell to beseech him to be good unto them: the women and children which went along with them, as partakers and companions of their exile, seconded them with woful tears and lamentations.

E But he willed the *Sutrin*s to forbear their mourning plaints, and give over their dolefull moan: saying that he brought the Tuscans heavy and weeping cheer. Then caus'd he his souldiers to lay down their packs and load, the *Sutrin*s likewise there to abide with a mean guard, and his men to follow him with armour and weapons only. Thus march'd he forward with his Army lightly appointed for ready expedition, and advanced before Sutrium. Where, according to his expectation, he found the enemies all careles and secure (as commonly it falleth out upon a prosperous success.) No warders, no corps de guard quartered before the walls, the gates wide open, the Conquerours here and there saccking, rifling and flinging the goods out of their enemies houses. So was Sutrium in one day twice won. The Tuscans (for all their former victory) were hewn in peeces on every side, by a new-come enemy. They had no time to cast themselves

Sutrium twice won in one day.

F found nor gather together into one place, no, nor to take weapon in hand: while every man for life, made in all haste to the gates, if haply any way they might escape into the fields. But when they came thither, the gates they found fast shut, for so the Dictator had given order afore-hand. Hereupon some betook themselves to their weapons: others (namely, such as hapned to be armed when this sudden tumult surpris'd them) fell to call their fellows together for to begin a skirmish: which no doubt in that desperate case of the enemies had been hotly fought, had not the Criers and Trumpets which were sent into all parts of the City, made proclamation to lay down their weapons, to spare them which were unarmed, and that none should have any harm but those that were found in arms. Upon this, even they who in that extremity and despair were fully bent to fight it out, for hope of life on all hands flung away their weapons: and thus disarm'd as they were (for as the case stood, it was the safer course) presented themselves to the enemy. A great number of them were bestow'd in several places, and were attended upon with good guards. And before night the town was deliver'd again unto the *Sutrin*s, safe and sound without any hurt at all done unto it, as being not won by force, but surrendred upon composition. Camillus then returned with triumph into the City of Rome, victor at one voyage in three sundry wars. The greatest number by far, of prisoners, whom he led before his chariot in triumph, were Tuscans: whom he sold in port-sale at the spear, and rais'd such a sum of money, that when he had had out of it repaid the dames [of Rome] to the worth of their gold, there were of the surpluseage thereof three bouls made of massie gold: which with the title and inscription of Camillus his name, were for certainty, before the Capitol was burnt to be seen in the chappell of Jupiter set up and bestowed at the feet of Juno.

The same year, there were enfranchised and made Citizens of Rome, such Veientians, Capenates and Faliscians, as in the time of those wars were fled to the Romans: and for these new Citizens were certain lands set out. Those also, who for idleness loath to build at Rome, were gone to Vii, there to inhabit the vacant houses, were by an Act of the Senat recalled home from thence. And they at the first grumbled & refused to obey: but after that a day was set them, & they threatened upon pain of death to return again to Rome: as stout as they were, and obstinate all of them together, now for fear every one became obedient. As Rome now increasd in number of inhabitants, and became well peopled: so on all hands in every place they fell to building new edifices: whiles the Common-wealth somewhat eased them of charges, and the Ædiles by vertue of their office called hard upon them, hastning them forward as to a publike workiyea, and every man privately made all speed possible, according as each ones need required, to make an end and finish his own house. So as within the year the City was new built and stood on foot again.

built.

At the years end was the great Election held for Tribunes military in Consuls authority: Wherein were created T. Quintius Cincinnatus, Q. Servilius Fides: as the fifth time, Julius Tullus, L. Aquilius Corvus, L. Lucretius Tricipitinus, Ser. Sulpitius Ruffus. One army they set out and led against the Æquians, not to war with them (for they granted themselves conquered) but upon meer spight and deadly hatred, to waste all their borders utterly, and to leave them no power and strength to enterprife any new rebellion. The other, into the territory of Tarquinius. Where, two towns of the Tuscans, Cortuosa and Contenebra, were by assault won and rased. At Cortuosa was no resistance made. For the Romans surpris'd them on a sudden, and at the first shout and impression they were masters of it: The town was sacked and burned. As for Contenebra, it endured the assault for some few daies: but the continual labour, slacking neither day nor night overcharged them: whereas the Roman Army divided into six parts, fought six hours in their severall turns round one after the other. And the townsmen being but few, and those overtoiled, were fain without any supply, still to maintain fresh skirmishes. Whereupon, at last they retreated back & yielded, giving the Romans leave to enter the City. The Tribunes were of mind and thought good, that the spoil should be confiscat and go to the common treasury: but the commandment and proclamation was more slack than their purpose on that behalf. For whilest they lingred and protracted time, the souldiers already had seised in their prizes: and taken from them again without much offence and hatred, the booty could not be. In the same year, because the City should not flourish in private buildings only, the Capitol was also built of squared ashler stone: A piece of work even in this so glorious estate, and magnificence of the City, to be had in price and esteemed excellent. And now before this time, the Tribunes of the Commons, whiles the City was busied about their buildings, began often to move for the Laws Agraria (about the division of the lands) in all their assemblies and speeches before the people. For to draw them on and to set forward their hope, they presented unto them very often the Pomptine Territory, which then above all others, so presently upon the subduing and subversion of the Volscians by Camillus, was, no doubt, the rightfull possession of the people of Rome. Complaints were made, that those grounds sustained much more detriment and damage by the Nobility, than they had received before from the Volscians. For they, so long only as they were able to bear arms and maintain war, made inrodes thither: but the Noblemen forcibly entred and made havock in the possessions of the common lands: and unless (before they had set sure footing there, and got all into their hands) a division were made, the Commons should never enjoy one foot of ground there. These Remonstrances of the Tribunes little moved the Commons, both because few of them resorted to the common place of assemblies, whiles they plied their building: and also for that money was away, and their purses so emptied in the charges of workmen, that they had little mind of holding those lands, which to store N and stock they were not able.

The City was now given much to their devotions and religions, and the rulers also somewhat superstitious upon their late calamity: Insomuch as they minded to renew the Auspicia [or the solemnity of presages taken by bird-flight] for some errorr supposed therein: and therefore they agreed that the government should return to an Interreign. So there were Interregents one after another M. Manlius Capitolinus, Ser. Sulpitius Camerinus, L. Valerius Potitus, Valerius at length held the assembly for to elect Tribunes Military in Consuls authority, and created L. Papirius, Cn. Sergius, L. Æmylius the second time, L. Licinius, T. Valerius Publicola the third time. These presently after the Interreign, began their government. That year, the Temple of Mars vowed in the Gauls war was dedicated by T. Quintius, a Duumvir deputed for the executing of holy duties. Four Tribes of new Citizens were now adjoynd Stellatina, Pomatina, Sabbatina, Arniensis. and these made up the number of the 25 Tribes. And now L. Sicinius a Tribune of the Commons, was in hand with the people in greater number assembled together, about the Pomptine lands: and more enclined they were and forward to hearken after grounds, than they had been afore. And whereas it was moved in the Senat house, to make war upon the Latines and the Hernicks, that matter was not followed, but put off to a further time: by reason of preparation for a greater war, because

A Hetruria was already up in arms. And all was laid again upon Camillus his shoulders, who was made Tribun Military with Consuls authority, and had five other brethren in office joyned unto him Ser. Cornelius Maluginensis, Q. Servilius Fidenas the sixth time, L. Quintius Cincinnatus, L. Horatius Pulvillus, P. Valerius. In the beginning of the year, the minds of men were turned clean away from the careful regard they had of the Tuscan war, by reason that a number of people that fled out of the Pomptine country, came all of a sudden in great haste to the City, and brought word, that the Antiates were up in arms, that the nations of the Latins had sent their able youth to that war closely underhand, thereby disavowing it to be any action of the State, and standing upon this point, that by the covenant there was no proviso, but that voluntary souldiers might serve in what wars soever they would. Now had the Romans been well taught, and learned, to set light no more by any wars. The Senat therefore thanked the Gods, that Camillus was in place of government, who if he had been a privat person, was no doubt to have been nominated and created Dictator: yea, and his companions in office, confessed frankly that he was the only man to have the sovereign and absolute Regiment of all, in case there were any fearful and dangerous war toward: and were fully resolved, to yeeld up all their interest in government unto him, thinking it no disparagement at all unto them, nor any loss of their own honour and reputation, in conferring the same upon the Majesty of so worthy a person. The Senat highly commended the Tribuns, and Camillus was much abashed in his mind, howbeit he gave them hearty thanks, and spake in this wise. "A weigthy burthen (quoth he) I see is imposed upon me by the people of Rome, in that they have elected and nominated me Dictator now the fourth time: a greater charge is enjoyned me by the Senat: the whole state and body of which order, hath delivered so singular good opinion and judgement of me: but the heaviest load of all is laid upon me by the exceeding kindness and obsequious benignity of these my honourable brethren and colleagues. If any painful travel of mine therefore, and watchful care may be redoubled, I wil earnestly endeavour, I wil strain and strive to answer thereunto: that the opinion which the City with so great consent hath conceived of me, right as it is exceeding great, so it may continue still and be perpetual. As to that war of the Antiats, there are more brags and threats than any danger and peril from thence. But as I would counsel and advise you to be afraid of no war, so I would not have you to be careless and secure of any. The City of Rome is beset on every side: partly envied, and partly hated of her neighbour borderers. Need there is both of more Captains, and also of more armies, to manage the affairs of the Common-weal. I think it good therefore (quoth he) O Valerius, that you assist me in government and counsel, and have the leading together with me of certain legions against the Antiat enemies. That you Q. Servilius, with another army wel appointed, and in readines, lye encamped hard by the City side, having an eye and good regard, lest either Hetruria in the mean while, (as of late dayes) or the Latins and Hernicks (who trouble us now afresh) break out and make some rising. Assured I am, that you wil behave your self, and quire you in this service so worthily, as may answer the famous memory of such a father and grandfire as you have had, may beseech your own honourable person, and those six Tribunships which you have already performed. As for L. Quintius, let him leavy a third power of men, consisting of those that are by reason of sickness or otherwise excused for warfare, and are above the ordinary age for military service, to be in stead of a garrison for defence of the City and the Walls. Let L. Horatius provide harness, weapons, corn, and other necessities for war, at all occasions whatsoever. Finally, O Sergius Cornelius, we your fellow Tribuns, ordain you President of this publick Council, the Custos and keeper of Religion and Church-matters, of general assemblies, of the Laws and all other civil affairs of policy whatsoever. Now when they had all made promise, and that most willingly to do their endeavour in performing their severall charges, Valerius whom he had joyned with himself in commission, added moreover and said, That as he would take M. Furius to be Dictator, so would he be unto him again in stead of his Coronel of Horsemen. And turning to the Lords of the Senat, exhorted them, that what opinion they had of one only Sovereign General, the same hope they would conceive of the whole war. The Senators hereat took great joy and contentment, giving out willingly with one accord, that they hoped exceeding wel of war, of peace, and generally of the State. Neither shall the Common-weal (say they) ever stand in need of Dictator, so long as such Magistrats be in place, so jointly agreeing in one mind together, so indifferent and ready as well to obey as to rule, and rather yeelding their proper praise to the honour of the Common-weal, than dismembriing and plucking from it to their private glory and reputation.

Camillus, to his companions in government

After a Vacation or Law-steen proclaimed, and the Musters taken and past: Furius and Valerius set forward to Saturnum: whither the Antiats had not only sent the flour of all the Volsci, the choice youth out of a fresh fry and new generation; but also had raised a mighty power of Latins and Hernicks, out of those Nations that by long peace were most fresh and lusty. These new enemies and old thus combined together, troubled the minde of the Roman souldier, and made him to startle. Which when the Centurions reported to Camillus, as he was Marthalling and setting his bartels in array: and that in these terms; to wit, that the hearts of his souldiers were disquieted and dismayed, that they took themselves but slowly to their weapons, made staving and idling when they should come forth of their tents, yea, and that there were some of them overheard to say, that, They must fight one to an hundred, and that so great a multitude of

of M. Furius

their enemies (if they were unarmed) might hardly be encountred; much less, being so well armed and appointed: he mounted presently upon Horseback, and rode before the ensigns, and then turning himself afront his army, traversing between the ranks and arrais; "What heaviness is this my souldiers (quoth he) what means this strange and unwonted lagging behind? Why? Know ye not your enemy? Know ye not me? Or, know ye not your own selves? The enemy, what is he else but the perpetual matter and subject of your valour and glory? And ye again are the men, who under my conduct (to say nothing of the winning of Falerii and Veii, and of the slaughter of the Gauls Legions, put to the sword by us, even when our native City was by them taken, and they masters thereof) of late, and but the other day, made a three-fold triumph, upon a triple victory, over the same Volscians, Equians and people of Hetruria. What, do ye not agnize and accept me for your General, because not as Dictator, but as Tribun, I gave you the watchword, and put out the banner of battel? For mine own part, I stand not much upon absolute and sovereign command over you: no more likewise should ye regard ought else in me, but mine own self. For never yet did my Dictatorship make me haughty and set me up aloft, no more than my banishment abated my courage and cast me down. We are the same men still all of us: and since we are come to this war, furnished with the same means that we carried with us unto the former, let us look for the same event of our service, and no worse. So soon as ye shall encounter and joyn battel with them, perform each one that which he hath been taught and wonted to: the journey surely will be ours, and they (no doubt) shall run away. Then after he had sounded the battel, he alighted from his Horse, and caught the ensign-bearer that stood next him, with his hand, haled him forward against the face of the enemy, crying very often aloud, On afore with thy banner, Port-ensign, and advance forward, souldier. When they saw that Camillus in person, a man well steeped in years, and thereby weak to perform the parts of bodily strength, put himself forth against the enemy: all at once they pressed forward, set up an outcry and shouted, every man calling upon his next fellow, to follow their General for shame. Over and besides, some say that by the commandment of Camillus, there was an ensign hung into the very battel among the enemies. Whereupon they of the forefront, bestirred themselves lustily to recover it again. And thereby were the Antiates first discomfited, and the fear nor only came upon them in the vanguard, but entered also and reached as far as the rereward, that stood ready for supply. And as the violent force of the souldiers, provoked by the presence of their Captain, much troubled the enemy: so nothing more daunted the hearts of the Volscians, than the very sight of Camillus himself, when they chanced to espie him. So surely carried he the victory with him, which way soever he went. And that appeared most evidently in this. That when he saw the left wing at the point to give back and run away, he took himself in all haste to his Horse, rode thither with his light footmans buckler, and with his only presence renewed the fight, shewing unto them how the rest of the battel had the better. Now were the enemies put to the worst, and the victory inclined to a side. But their multitude both hindered themselves in their flight: and also a long peece of work the wearied souldiers of the Romans had to put so great a number, all to the sword. But behold, there fell a great tempest of rain all of a sudden, which poured down with so mighty winds and storms, that it rather put them by the execution of assured victory, than parted any battel or stayed the fight. Whereupon the retreat was sounded: and the night ensuing, whiles the Romans were at rest, made an end of the war. For the Latins and Hernicks forsook the Volscians and departed home, with as ill speed, as their enterprise was bad. The Volscians seeing themselves abandoned and left in the lurch by them, (upon whose trust and confidence they had rebelled) quit the camp and field, and put themselves within the walls of Saturnum: whom Camillus at first began to besiege, casting a trench and rampier about them, raising bastillons and plat-forms against the Town. And seeing his munitions and fabricks by no falling forth of the enemies impeached, he supposed there was no such courage in them, that he should need to stand so long about the hope of victory: and thereupon, encouraged his men not to wear themselves out in a tedious and toilsul piece of service, as if they lay at the siege of Veii: assuring them that the victory was in their hands already: and so with exceeding cheerfulness of his souldiers, he set ladders upon every side, scaled the walls, and entered the Town. Then the Volscians flung away their weapons and yielded themselves.

Saturnum won.

But the General his mind was bent upon a greater exploit, and that was the winning of Antium, being the seat Town of the Volscians, and from whence the beginning of the last war arose. Howbeit because so strong a City might not be won without great preparation of artillery, ordinance & engins of battery, leaving his colleague behind him with the army, he went himself to Rome, to perswade with the Senat. for to destroy and rase Antium utterly. And whiles he was emparling with them (such was the will of God I believe, that Antium should stand still & continue longer) there came Embassadors from Nepes and Sutrium, craving aid against the Tuscans, saying: That it was more than high time, that they were succoured and relieved. Upon which occasion it fell out, that Camillus was withdrawn thither from Antium. For seeing that those two Towns stood even against Hetruria, as it were the very keyes and bar-gates from thence: both the enemies laboured to gain them afore-hand, against the time that they went about to make new wars; & the Romans also held it a matter of great consequence, to rescue and defend those frontier Towns. The Senat therefore thought good to be in hand with Camillus, for to leave Antium, and to undertake the war with the Tuscans. The City-legions under General Quintius, were appointed unto him.

And

A And albeit, he rather would have had the leading of that army, which lay now in the Volscian Country, and which he had good tryal of, and were acquainted better with his government, yet refused he nothing: only he required to have Valerius his associar still, and joyned with him in commission. So Quintius and Horatius were sent to succeed Valerius in the Volscian war. Furius and Valerius took their voyage from the City to Sutrium, and found the one side of the Town possessed already by the Tuscans. On the other side, the Townsmen, for that the enemy had stopped all passages between, hardly able to repel the force of the assailants. But the coming of the Roman aids, and the name besides of Camillus, (so highly renowned as well amongst the enemies as Allies) both for the present gave them heart to abide the brunt, and stick to it till that were before at the point to give over: and also gained time and respite, to come in with fresh supplies and succours. Camillus therefore divided his forces, and gave direction to his colleague, for to bring about his power, to that side which the enemies held; and there to make an assault: not so much for any hope he had, by scaling the walls to win the City; as by withdrawing the enemies thither, not only to ease the Townsmen of their toil, and give them a breathing time (who were now wearied with assaults) but also to get himself some opportunity and vantage, to enter the City without skirmish and resistance. Which being put in execution on both hands accordingly, and performed at once: the Tuscans beset with a two-fold fear round about, seeing the walls assailed most fiercely one way: and the enemy got within the Town another way: hung out at one gate, (which as it happened was not beset) and in great haste all together sought to escape away. But as they fled, they were slain by heaps both within the Town and abroad all over the fields. The greater number were killed within the walls by Furius his souldiers. Valerius his men were more ready and nimble in the chase, and gave not over the execution until the night came, that they could not see and discern them.

Sutrium recovered.

When Sutrium was thus recovered and restored again to their allies, they led forward the army to Nepe: which Town the Tuscans held wholly, as surrendered already into their hands. Every man thought it would be a busie peece of work to win that City again: not in this regard only, that it was fully in the enemies possession, but also because some of the *Nepe*nses, by treason had yielded it up. Howbeit, they resolved to send unto the heads and principal citizens, that they should sever themselves from the Tuscans, and perform on their behalf trusty and faithful loyalty, like as they had craved and belought at the Romans hands their friendly help and protection. From whom they received this answer again, That it lay not now in them to do anything at all, for that the Tuscans kept the walls, and warded the gates. Whereupon they first terrified and scared the Townsmen with foraging and spoiling their territory: after that, seeing they made more reckoning of keeping their faithful loyalty to their enemies unto whom they had lately surrendered, than observing the league with their friends, which they had long before concluded: they provided themselves out of the fields of a number of faggots, of brush wood, and such like trowsers, and so approached the City with the army filled up the ditches close to the walls, set ladders to, and at the first shout and assault given, the Town was taken. Then proclamation was made, that all the *Nepe*nses should part with their armour and weapons, and so many as were found unarmed, should be spared. But the Tuscans, as well armed as unarmed were put to the sword every one. As for the chief authors, that perwaded the *Nepe*nses to deliver the Town to the enemies, they were beheaded. The harmless multitude had their goods restored, and so the Town was left with a garrison. Thus the two Tribunes (Consular) having regained out of the enemies hands two confederat Cities, returned in great glory to Rome with their victorious army.

The same year the Latins and Hernicks were required to make amends for harms done, and restitution of goods wrongfully detained: and the cause demanded why of late years, according to a covenant in that behalf provided they had set forth no souldiers to the Romans wars. Answer from both Nations in their solemn Councils was returned: "That neither the fault was generally nor proceeding from counsel of the State, in case some of their youth served under the Volscians: and yet themselves had well payd already for their lewd and rash projects, in that not one of them was come home alive. And as to the not sending forth of souldiers, the cause was, for that they were in continual fear and danger of the Volscians: which noisome plague (as it were) sticking so close unto their sides, unless they could be rid of, notwithstanding so many wars one in the neck of another. When relation hereof was made unto the Lords of the Senat, they thought so well of their answer and excuses, that they deemed they had quarrel and occasion good enough to war upon them, if they might have had while and time as well to follow it."

The excuse of the Latins and Hernicks.

In the year following, when A. Manlius, P. Cornelius, Titus and Lucius Quinctius, both Capitolini, and L. Papirius Cursor the second time, were Tribunes Consular, there arose a grievous war abroad, and a more dangerous sedition brake forth at home. The war, from the Volscians, bandied with the Latins and Hernicks, that were fallen away and revolted. The sedition (wherein was least feared) from a personage of noble lineage descended, of great name and reputation, M. Manlius Capitolinus. Who being a man of too lofty and harty a minde, despised all other of the Nobility, and envied one above the rest, M. Furius, so singular, as well in regard of his honourable dignities, as his worthy parts and commendable vertues. He could not brook and endure, that he only should ever be Lord General in the field: who now was exalted so high above others, that even those who were created with him in equal authority, he accounted not as his peers and fellows, but employed as his Ministers and Servitors. "Whereas (quoth he) if men would weigh aright, and duly consider every thing, M. Furius could never have delivered his Country from the siege of the enemies, had not the Capitol and Castle cliff been saved by me afore. Camillus set upon the Gauls, when they were amused in receiving their gold, when they were upon terms of peace, and their hearts quiet and secure: whereas my self chased them away whiles they were in arms, and at the point to win the Castle Hill. In that exploit of Camillus the souldiers, had each one his share proportionably of the glory, who together with him did their parts: but in the service performed by me, no earthly creature was fellow and partner with me. With these conceits he fed his own humours, and puffed up his proud spirit, being withal by corrupt disposition of nature, hot and hasty, arrogant and insolent. Discontented besides, that of the Nobility, his gifts and qualities were not esteemed of that worth, as in his own judgement they deserved: first, of a Senator he became popular, and began to break his mind, and impart his designs unto the Magistrats of the Commons: finding fault with the Nobility, and complaining of them: soliciting and inveigling the Commons, to cast a liking and favour toward himself: carried away with the vain gale of the peoples opinion: not guided by sage counsel and discretion: and in one word, chusing rather to be of great name, than of good and honest report. And not contenting himself to deal in the Laws Agraria, about the division of Lands, which had alwayes ministered to the Tribunes of the Commons matter enough of murmurings and seditions: he began to intermeddle between the debtors and their creditors, and to overthrow all keeping of credit. And indeed, deep debts are sharp goads, and prick shrewdly: threatening not only poverty and shame, but also terrifying the bodies of free men with hard imprisonments, little ease, and irons. Now there were exceeding many far in debt (a thing most dangerous and hurtful to mens state) even of the richer sort, by reason of their great expenses defrayed in building. The war therefore of the Volscians, which was it self of great importance; but much more, in regard of the Latins and Hernicks Rebellion withal, was in shew pretended, as a cause to seek for to have a more sovereign and absolute power to govern the State: but in truth, these new designments and plots of Manlius, rather than the war, forced the Senat to create a Dictator. And A. Cornelius Cossus being created, nominated for his General of Horse, T. Quintius Capitolinus. The Dictator, albeit he saw a greater contention toward, at home than abroad, yet (were it that the war required some speedy expedition, or because by victory and triumph, he thought to make his Dictatorship more mighty and powerful) he took musters, and set forward into the Pomptine Land, into which parts he had intelligence, that the Volscians had proclaimed their forces, to repair.

of the author.

"I doubt not, but they that read in so many books already, of these continual wars fought with the Volscians, besides their tedious satiety of reading, will muse also at this (which to my self was likewise a wonder, when I perused the writers that lived neer about the times of these acts) how these Volscians and Equians, so often vanquished and defeated, were furnished with supply of souldiers to maintain their wars. But seeing by the ancient Chroniclers it hath been overpassed with silence, what should I alledge, but only mine own opinion and bare conjecture, which every man hath liberty to put in for himself? Likely it is, that either between the times of wars (as now we see in the Roman musters) they used to breed up one supply under another, of the younger sort, to the maintenance and renewing so oftentimes of their war: or that their armies were not alwayes levied out of the same States, albeit the wars go under the name of one and the self same nation: or that those countries yielded in those dayes an infinite number of freemen, which now are well near wast and desert, but for some Roman slaves, which keep those parts yet from being void and disposed, as having but a very small seminary, or none at all, left, of serviceable souldiers.

"Certainly, the Volscians army, as all authors agree, was very great at this time: albeit of late dayes by the leading and conduct of Camillus they were sore weakened, and their strength much abated. Besides, there were with them in field, the Latins and Hernicks, some of the Circeians, and other Colonies from Volturnus. The Roman Dictator having that day pitched his camp, and the next morrow come abroad with happy tokens of good speed from the Birds: having also slain a sacrifice, and procured thereby the favour and grace of the Gods, in joyous manner shewed himself unto his souldiers: who according as they were commanded, were ready early in the morning, by break of day in arms, attending the sound of Trumphet for battel. The day is ours (quoth he) my valorous souldiers, if either the Gods or their Prophets can foretell future events.

The Orati
on of A. Cornelius Cossus Dictator to his soul-diers.

"Therefore as resolute men of assured hope, and such as shall encounter with far meaner than our selves, pitch we our javelins down at our feet, and draw our swords only. Neither would I have you to run out of the main battel, and to give the charge, but to keep your ground, to stand Redoubt, and abide the first Thock of the enemy. And when they have spent their volley of shot in vain, and shall with full force come upon you as you stand, then brandish your swords, and let them glitter in their eyes, and think every man of the Gods, that they will help the Romans. The Gods I say, which in happy hour, by the lucky approbation of their Birds, have sent us into the field to fight. And as for you, O Quintinus, keep your Horsemen close together, marking advisedly the first beginning of the skirmish: and when you see the battels buckle together pell-mell, and come to hand-strokes, whiles they are busied and occupied one way, fight them another way with your Horsemen, ride among their ranks as they fight, and break their arrayes. Thus fought both Horse and Foot according to his direction. And

A as the legions wanted not a worthy Captain, no more missed the Captain of happy speed. The multitude of the enemies trusting upon nothing but their own number; which they measured and compared together only by their eye, interviewing both the one army and the other, rashly gave battle, and as rashly gave over again. In shout only and shout shewing themselves hot and eager at the first encounter: but were not able to abide the sword-fight, the closing together foot to foot, and the fiery countenance of their enemies; which for the very heat of their courage, shined and glistered fully in their eyes. So the forefront being put back, a fear came upon them likewise, that stood behind for supply, and withal, the Horsemen for their parts set to, and fought most terribly. Whereupon the ranks of the enemies in sundry places were broken, and all set out of order, so as their battalions seemed to stote and wave up and down to and fro, in suspense whether to fight or fly. Afterwards, when they saw the foremost smitten down and slain, and every one thought no other but his own turn was next to be killed; they turned their backs and fled. The Romans came forward still and chased them. And so long as they went their way armed and thick huddled together, it was the footmens work to pursue them: but when it was perceived once, that they flung away their weapons on all hands, and that the enemies army fled dispersed all abroad in the fields: then were the troupes of Horsemen set out after them, with this caveat and charge, to make no stay and forlet the time, by killing them one by one, and so to give the main multitude of them in the mean while sufficient respite to escape: but that they should content themselves, only to let flye some shot amongst them, and by scaring them to hinder their running: and when they were ridden beyond, to cross upon them and stay them, until the footmen might overtake them, stay them down right and make an hand of them clean. Thus fled they, and thus were they followed in chase until night. The very same day was the Volscians camp taken and rancked, and the whole pillage, besides the bodies of free men, was given unto the souldiers. The greatest part of the prisoners were Hernicks and Latins: and those not of the common sort, and such as might be thought to have served for pay: but there were found among them certain young Gentlemen of good mark, a plain proof and evidence, that the Volscian enemies had aid from thence by the publick and general warrant of the State. There were known also to be among them some of the Circeians: yea, and certain of the Velitern colony likewise. All of them were sent to Rome. Where being examined before the chief of the Senators, they confessed every one in plain terms, the revolting of their own Nation, like as they had before bewrayed it unto the Dictator. The Dictator still kept his forces together within the standing camp, making no doubt, but that the rulers and Senators of Rome would determine to war upon those countries.

The Volscians defeated.

But even at that time a greater heap of troubles which arose at home, caused him to be sent for to Rome, by occasion of a sedition which grew daily more and more: and by reason of the Author thereof (a man of quality and note) was more feared than any usually had been afore time. For now by this, had M. Manlius not by speeches only, but by plain deeds also, (which in outward shew seemed popular and plausible) shewed evidently upon what troublesome and tumultuous spirit all proceeded: For seeing upon a time a Centurion, of good worth for his service in war, condemned in an action of debt, and upon an execution of judgement carried to prison: he in the mids of the Forum, came running unto him with a rout and crew of his followers and retinue, laid hand on him, and took him perforce from the officers: and after he had given out some words aloud touching the pride of the Senators, the cruelty of the usurers, the calamities of the Commons, the valour and present distress of the party: Marry then (quoth he) have I done a great deed, to no purpose, in saving the Capitol and the Castle with this right hand of mine, if I could abide to see my fellow souldier (as if he were taken prisoner of the Gauls by way of conquest) had away into bondage and captivity, and laid up fast in gyves and fetters. And therewith openly in sight of all the people paid the whole debt downright on the nail, unto the creditor: and so after the usual and solemn ceremony by a brasen peece of coin and the ballance, he set him at liberty out of the creditor his hands, and let him go at large: "Who prayed heartily to God and man, for to requite accordingly M. Manlius his only deliverer, and the very patron and protector of the Commons of Rome. And when he was once got into that unruly and seditious throng, he presently himself set all a madding, shewing the scars of his wounds received in the Veientians and Gauls wars, and in other services one after another: saying, That whiles he thus followed souldiery, and rebuiled his house that was destroyed, he became indebted, and that so deeply (by reason that the interest alwayes overgrew the principal, which he by that means had paid and paid again) that he was not able to creep out of the usurers book, but was plunged therein over head and ears. And now behold (quoth he) by the only goodness of M. Manlius, I have the liberty again to see the light of the Sun, to behold the Common place, to look my neighbours and fellow citizens in the face: at his hands I acknowledge to have received all the benefits that mine own parents could give me: unto him I vow whatsoever in me is left, and in his quarrel to spend that little life and blood which remaineth in my body: and in one word look what priviledge I may enjoy in right of my country, and in the communion of the Gods, publick or private, the same do I impart and communicate with that one man. By these speeches the Commons were set on, and pricked forward mightily, as wholly devoted unto one person: and who but Manlius now in every mans mouth? And presently in the nick he entred into another action that tended more effectually to mar all quite, and to set every thing out of order. His Land in the territory of Veii; which was the chief and capital

Centurion.

Manor of his inheritance, even the fairest flower of his garland, he set upon sale, causing it openly to be cryed: and said withal, I will not O Quirites, so long as I have one foot of ground, or any thing else left, see one of you condemned and upon execution carryed to prison. This let them so a fote, that they were ready, as it seemed, to follow him as the only protector of their liberties, in any action, were it right or wrong, they cared not which way, all was one with them. Besides, at home in his own house, he spared not to cast out slanderous speeches against the Senators, as if he had been at the open Cross, making Orations. Amongst which, without all regard whether he spake true or false, he let fall these words, "That the Senators kept in secret certain hidden treasures of the Gauls gold, and were not now contented to hold in possession the common grounds, but they would also embezzle the treasure publick, which if it came abroad, the Commons might soon be acquit and discharged of their debts. This gap being once laid open, and this light given the people, they thought (ye may be sure) an unworthy indignity, that when there was gold to be levied for redemption of the City out of the Gauls hands, it then should be gathered by a general contribution of all: and the same gold, now recovered from the enemies, should be as a prey in the clutches of a few. Therefore they followed instantly upon him and were very earnest to know, where so great a masse of money and stoll good was hidden. But when he posted them off, and said he would in due time disclose all: they were not content, but setting all other matters apart, their whole care was employed about this business, and nothing else. So as it plainly appeared that neither he should reap a mean thank if he reported a truth, nor incur a small offence and displeasure, in case he told a false tale.

Things hanging thus in these doubtful terms, the Dictator who was sent for, returned from the army into the City. The next day he assembled the Senat: and after he had thoroughly sounded and felt the minds of them, that were there mer, he commanded the Senators not to depart from him: and assisted as he was with that company, he caused the Ivory chair of estate to be set in the Comitium or common Hall, and sent a serjeant for M. Manlius. Who being thus peremptorily summoned by the Dictators expresse commandment, gave warning by a token to his complices and favourites, that there was a broil and fray toward: and with a mighty retinue of his followers, he presented himself before the Tribunal. On the one side, stood the Senators, on the other the Commons: either part beholding their Captain, as it were in a pight field ready to joyn battell.

A. Cornelius Cossus Dictator to M. Man- lius.

Then after silence made, "Would to God (quoth the Dictator unto Manlius) I and the Sena"tors of Rome, might in all other things sort as well with the Commons, as I am assured, we shall "agree all together about thee, and the matter which I shall ask and demand of thee. I see thou "hast put the City in some good hope, that by the Gauls treasure which the principal and chief "of the Senators detain with them secretly hidden, all men may keep their credit, and fully pay and "discharge their debts. Which I for my part, so God me help, am so far from hindring, that con"trary-wise I would exhort thee, O M. Manlius, to ease the Commons of Rome of the usurers "book: to discover these fellows and make them known, that gape so greedily after the common "treasure, and to disappoint them, and turn them out of this their privy booty. Which if thou
"do not effect, either for that thy self wouldst have a fleece with them, or else because it is but "a forged tale that thou hast made of thine own fingers ends, I will not fail, but commit thee
"to ward, and suffer no longer the multitude upon a vain and deceitful hope, thus by thee to be "abused and disquieted. To this, Manlius made answer and said, "I was nothing deceived but "wist well enough, that a Dictator was created not against the Volscians, who are enemies (for"sooth) so oft as our great Masters think it for their purpose: nor against the Latins and Hernicks,
"whom they drive and provoke to rebellion by false and forged surmises: but against my self and
"the Commons of Rome. For now I see well, that the Dictator professeth to maintain and bear "out the Usurers against the Commons: and that against my self, for the favour that the multi"tude beareth unto me, there is matter devised to charge me withal, and to procure my utter "ruin and overthrow. Doth it offend and grieve you indeed, O A. Cornelius, and you my Lords "of the Senat, that the people thus stand about me on every side? Why do not ye every man for "his part, by your good deserts divide asunder this company, and draw them away with you from "me? Namely, by your mediation and intercession, by giving your word for them, by ridding "out of gyves and prison your fellow citizens, by saving them that are condemned, from being "awarded to the thraldom of their creditors, and out of the overplus and superfluity of your own
"living and goods by relieving their present need, and supplying their necessities? But what mean
"I to perswade you to forgo anything of your own, and bestow it upon them? Take another "course with them, and make them another offer. Do but deduct out of the principal debt, that "which hath been payd, for consideration of the loan: you shall soon see that my retinue will "make no greater shew, than any othermans else. But why am I the only man so careful of the "citizens and people? Certainly, I can make no better answer hereunto, than if one should ask me, "wherefore I alone saved the Capitol and the Cliff? As I then yielded my helping hand to all in "general, so will I now to my power relieve each one in particular. For as touching the treasure "of the Gauls: the thing in it self being easy, this demand of yours maketh hard and difficult.
"For what need you ask me that which you know already your selves? Why lay you not that "open which is in your secret bosom, rather than to have it sifted and bolted out? but that there "is some privy juggling, some cunning practise and packing therein? The more ye would seem to "have your leiger demain to be sought into and detected: so much the more, I fear me, ye will "hide

Manlius to the Dictator.

A "hide it even from the eyes of those that are watchful and quicksighted. And therefore am not
 "I to be forced to reveal and shew where your stolen goods are: but you would be made, if you "were well served, to bring them abroad into the view of the World. At those words, the Di-
 "stator commanded him to leave off these foolish vapourings and trifling haits; urging him either
 "to go through with his challenge and prove it true: or if he could not justify it, to confess that "he had falsely slandered and wrongfully charged the Senat, and sought to bring upon them the ill
 "will and hatred of men, for a vain surmise and insinuation of Thevery. But as he stoutly inferred
 "and replied again, that he would not speak at the pleasure of his enemies, nor owed them any "such service: he commanded him to be had away to prison and kept in bonds. And as he was B apprehended by the Officer, "O Jupiter (quoth he) Optimum Meritum. O Jove Queen of heaven, M. Manlius
 "O Minerva, with other gods and goddesses, that inhabit the Capitol and the Castle: Suffer ye "your Knight and Defender, to be thus sugged, misused, and evil entreated by his adversaries?
 "And shall this right hand wherewith I deigned the Gauls, and drove them from your Chap-"pels and shrines, be now pinnioned and manacled? There was no one man there, that saw and "heard him, who could indure this indignity. But this City, as most patient of all other Cities to "abide any just, righteous and lawful commandment of the Magistrate, contained her self and was "content in some cases to be overruled: so far forth, that against the authority and absolute power "of the Dictator, neither the Tribuns of the Commons, nor the Commons themselves, durst "either cast up their eyes to look awry, or once open their mouths. But after Manlius was com-
 C mitted, it was for certain known, that a great sort of the Commons, changed their weed
 "and put on their worst apparel and mourning array: many a man let his head and beard grow
 "long; yea, and a number of them with sad and heavy cheer, kept commonly about the Goal-
 "dore.

Now when the Dictator triumphed over the Volscians, his triumph bred him more hatred
 "and displeasure than honor and glory: for it is commonly spoken, that he got it at home and not "abroad, and triumphed over a citizen not over an enemy: and this only wanted, (say they) to "make up his pride to the full, that Manlius was not led before his chariot. Whereupon there was "like to grow much scandal and very sedition. For the appealing and mitigation whereof, the Se-
 "nat upon a sudden, without any motion made, of themselves became bountiful and assigned 2000

D citizens of Rome to be sent to Satricum to inhabit as a Colony. And to every man was let out
 "two acres and an half of Land apiece. Which the Commons construed to be a matter of no"thing, a small boon bestowed upon a few, the very hire and reward for betraying Manlius. So "that this proved a mischief for a remedy: and by this salve, the sore rather festered and rankled,
 "than healed up, and the sedition thereby fretted more and more. For now the crew of Manlius
 "his followers made shew of greater mourning and heaviness, in their vile clothes and sad coun"tenance, after the guise of persons acculed during the time of their troubles. And when the fear "and terrour was once overblown, by reason that the Dictator after his triumph, reigned up his "authority, then folks hearts were set at liberty, and their tongues walked at will. Some were "heard in open audience to upbraid the multitude and cast in their teeth, "That it was their fa-

E "thions alwayes to lift up and advance their Protectors and Defenders into high places, and "afterwards, in the very pitch of danger and point of downfal, to forsake and leave them defi"nite. Thus was Sp. Cassius served, that solicited the Commons to the division of Lands: thus "was Sp. Melius overthrown, that put his hand to his purse, and at his own proper charges kept
 "extream famine from the hungry jawes of the poor citizens. Semblably, M. Manlius endea"vouring to deliver a great part of the City (drowned as it were and overwhelmed in debt) and "to enlarge them and set them abroad at liberty, now for his pains is betrayed unto his deadly
 "enemies: so that the Commons do feed and frunk up, even for the shambles and butchers knife
 "the factors and maintainers of their weal and liberty. And ought indeed (say they) a Noble
 "man, that sometimes had been Consul, thus to be misused, if he answered not to the good liking

F "and pleasure of the Dictator? Suppose, he had over-reached and made a lie afore, and so had "not a present and ready answer at the time: was there ever any servant and slave, for leasing cast
 "in prison and laid up in Irons? And how could they forget that night, which was like to have "been the last night that ever the Romans should have seen: that fatal night of their final destru-
 "tion for ever? Or how could they chuse, but have still in their eye the army of the Gauls, clim"bing up the Cliff Tarpeia? and how M. Manlius in person, so bravely beseen in his armour,
 "all sweating, all bleeding, rescued and saved Jupiter himself in a manner out of the enemies hands?
 "What? Did they think that with half-poued measures of wheat meal, they had sufficiently re"compensed the Saviour of their Country? And whom they had well near canonized amongst "the holy hallows of Heaven, or at least-wise by his new addition of "surname made equal to G "Jupiter Capitolinus, was it well done to suffer him imprisoned in chains, lying in a dark dungeon,

 "to draw his lively breath at the pleasure of the Hangman? Was he alone able to succour you all,
 "and are ye all not able to help him alone? Thus ceased not the multitude to exclaim and make "their plaints, and would not depart from that place, no, not all the night long, but threatened to "break the prison by force: until such time as they got that remitted, which otherwise they would "have wrested, and Manlius by an act of the Senat was released out of prison and enlarged.
 "Whereby the murmur was never the more ended, but rather a Captain given them to maintain the "Sedition.

About

About the same time the Latins and Hernicks, the inhabitants also of the Colony Circeia, and they of Velitres, who came to excuse themselves for the Volscian war, wherein they were charged to have had their hands, and required to have the captives delivered, for to proceed against them, according to their own Laws, had a heavy answer. But the Coloners received the sharper check and rebuke, because they being Roman citizens, were entred into that wicked plot and abominable action, to combine against their native Country. And they were not only denied their prisoners, but also (wherein the Romans dealt more favourably with the rest that were their Allies) were warned and commanded in the name of the Senat, to avoid and that with speed out of the City, from the sight and presence of the people of Rome; for fear lest the privileged of Embassage, provided for the security and safe conduct of forrainers and not of citizens, should not serve to protect them. Now when the Sedition of Manlius was set on foot again, somewhat before the end of the year, the great assembly was holden for the Election of Magistrats: wherein there were created Tribuns in Consuls authority Serg. Cornelius Maluginensis the second time, P. Valerius Potitus the second time, M. Furius Camillus the fifth time, Ser. Sulpitius Ruffus the second time, C. Papirius Crassus, T. Quintius Cincinnatus the second time, all of Senators calling.

In the beginning of this year, peace they had with forrain nations; a matter very commodious both for the Senat and the Commons. For the Com, in this regard, that being not called away by any musters, they had some good hope (especially having so mighty a champion) to be rid at once for ever of usury. For the Senators again, because their minds being not distracted by any fear from abroad, might attend about curing and healing the intestine maladies at home. When both parts therefore were now more sharp set, and eagerly bent, they thought out of hand to trie what would be done, and to make either a shaft or a bolt of it. Manlius calling the Com. to his house, devised with the principal heads of them both day and night, to bring in a change and alteration of the State: and fuller of stomach, anger and gall he was now a good deal than aforetime. Nettled he was, the rather by his late disgrace and shame, who never before had been touched in credit, nor tasted of any reproach and contumely. Heart he took unto him, for that the Dict. durst not execute that rigor against him, which Cincinnatus Quintius had extended upon Sy. Melius: and it seemed unto him, that not only the Dict. sought to wind himself out, and in resigning up his room, to avoid the offence given by his imprisonment; but also that the very Senat was not able to endure the manner of proceeding. With these imaginations being puffed up and galled too, he failed not withal to prick forward and exasperate the minds of the Commons, who of themselves already, were kindled and set on fire. And with these and such like speeches he entertained them. "How long (quoth he) I pray you, will ye be ignorant, and not know what ye may do, and what power ye have? A thing that nature it self would not have so much as the very dumb beasts, but to understand. Do but count how many you are in number your selves, and how few adversaries ye have against you. If ye were but one to one, yet (I would think) you should more eagerly strive for to maintain your liberty, than they, to set up their Lordship. For, look how many favourites ye have been, following and courting one patron, so many shall ye now be opposed to one enemy. Make but shew only of war, ye shall have peace. Let them see you once ready to make head and offer violence, soon will they yeeld and part with their right: Either ye must adventure, all joyntly together to do somewhat, or else make account each one, to abide and suffer all. How long will ye stand looking from every side upon me? I for my part, surely, will not fail any one of you. Look ye then to it, that fortune fail not me. I, even I, that was your redeemer and deliverer, was all at once (when it pleased mine enemies) taken down and made no body. And ye, all of you saw him led to prison, who saved every one of you from prison. If happily those mine enemies should attempt to do me more spight, Where am I then? and what were I best to trust unto? Should I look for that end that Cassius and Melius came unto? Ye do well to signify how you dread the presage, and with the contrary. And the Gods forbid that it should so come to pass. But look not that ever they should come down from Heaven to protect me. That mind they must give you, to preserve me from so hard a hap, like as they gave me a resolute heart, both in mine armour to save you from barbarous enemies, and in my gown to defend you from proud citizens. Is there so little courage in you (so mighty a people otherwise) as to think it sufficient, and to stand contented, if you may be backed only, and meet with some help against your enemies; and to know no other scuffling with your adversaries (the Senators) but wherein you suffer your selves to be commanded in the end? This baseness cometh not to you by kind. By use and custome only, you are become their vassals and subjects. For what is the cause ye are so courageous against your enemies abroad, that ye think it meet and reason to rule and govern them? No other in truth but this, because with them you have been ever wont to strive for sovereignty, whereas against these ye have been used rather, to make some slight proof and tryal what you may do by your liberty, than to do your best, and to put your selves forth for to maintain it and extend it to the most. And yet what manner of captains soever ye have met withal to lead you, and howsoever affected ye have been your selves, obtained ye have hitherto all things that ye shot at, were they never so great: Such was your might, or such was your felicity. Wherefore now it is high time to give the adventure of greater matters also. Make but tryal only of your own good fortune, and of my self, whom I hope ye have had happy experience

Oracion of
M. Manlius to
of Rome.

A "experience of already with Iulius shall ye be provided of one to over-rule and command the Senators, than ye have been hitherto of those, that were to resist only their imperious government: Down we must with these Dictatorships and Consulships both, and lay them level with the ground: that the commonalty of Rome may once be aloft, and bear up the head. Behir your selves therefore, and play the men. Hinder protests and course of law for actions of debt. I profess myself a Patron of the Commons, which name my care over you; my faithfulness to you; hath induced me with. And if you please to entitle your leader and Captain, with a more glorious stile of honour and Majesty, ye shall find it more potent and available to effect that which you long for and desire. And so from that time forward, began some practice to set up the Government of a King: But neither who were the agents in this action, nor to what terms these plots proceeded, is it plainly enough recorded. But on the other side, the Senators sat in Council, and debated about the Secession and secret meeting of the Commons in the private house of M. Manlius and that house, which stood (as it fell out) upon the Castle Hills likewise of that imminent engine and fabrick, devised for the overthrow of the present liberty. Many were of opinion, and spake it aloud, That there was need of a Servilius Huly, who not by commanding a publick enemy of the State to prison, would provoke him and make him more eager; but by dispatching of one wicked member out of the way, and cutting him off, might end this intestine and civil war. But they came down at length, and grew to a resolution, in words milder, yet indeed and effect all one; That the Adversaries should have a careful eye, that by these mischievous plots and practices of M. Manlius, the Commons were incited to damages and hurt. Then the Tribunes in Consul authority, and the other Tribunes of the Commons (for even they also seeing, that in the loss of the publick liberty of all, their power likewise should come to an end, had yielded to be advised and ruled by the Senate) laid all their heads together, and consulted what course was best to be taken. When as no man could be think of any way, but plain violence and bloodshed (a piece of work in all appearance, of great adventure and doubtful hazard) then M. Menenius, and Q. Publilius, two Tribunes of the Commons stepped forth and said, "What means we to make that, a quarrel between the Senators and Commons, which the whole body united of the City indeed should undertake against so dangerous and pestilent a member? Why trouble we our selves to set upon him and the Commons with him, whom by the means of the very Commons themselves, it were the safer course, and lesse offensive to assail? that being surcharged and overweighed with his own power whereupon he presumeth, he may fall down and take his overthrow. We are fully minded to arrest him, to convert him judicially, and call him to his answer. Nothing is lesse popular, and more odious to the people, than to hear of Kings government again. The multitude shall not so soon see and perceive, that our quarrel is not with them, but that they shall become his competent Judges, and pass upon him, who now are his Advocates: also, that his accusers from out of the Commons, shall behold one of the Nobility to hold up his hand at the bar, and the indictment framed, upon the crime of usurping the Kingdom: but (be ye sure of it) they will tender and favour the fair looks and person of no man, before the cause of their own free estate. When all the house liked well, and allowed of this advice and overture, they made no more add, but served Manlius with process to answer at a day appointed. Which was not so soon done, but the Commons at the very first, began to storm and be enraged, especially when they saw the accused man, during his trouble so rudely arraigned, accompanied with none of the Senators, nor so much as one of his kindred and affinity, no, nor his very brethren M. and T. Manlius. A thing before that day never seen nor known, but that in so great a danger as this was, the nearest kinsfolk in blood, did change their weed. For even when Sp. Claudius his adversary, yet, and the whole lineage and name of the Claudivi, were mournfully clad, and poorly apparelled. Now intirely (say they) it is a very compact amongst them all, that this popular man, so gracious and wellbeloved, should be confounded and overthrown, because he was the first that ever fell away from the Senators to the Commons. When the day was come of his arraignment, I can find no anchor, what was objected against the prisoner by his accusers, directly tending to prove the crime of aspiring to a Kingdom; but only the conventicles of the multitude, certain seditious words, his overmuch larges, and his forged formis and false information of the gold: I doubt not but there was matter of great importance, urged and enforced against him, seeing that the Commons delay in proceeding to his condemnation, was not long of his cause, but occasioned by the place only. This one thing seemeth worthy to be noted, and for all mens learning, the how notable and how great soever his honors, worship, and commendable parts were: the foul and cursed desire of tyrannical rule, made not only unpleasant and without grace, but also odious and detestable in the eyes of the people. He brought forth, as it is reported, welnear four hundred mess, whom he had laid out money for proci, and without any interest or consideration: those whole goods he saved from port-sale, and kept from the bondage of their creditors, after they were condemned. Over and besides, he not only reckoned up, but shewed also in open sight, the honorable testimonies of his service in the wars: as the spoils of his enemies by him slain and disarmed, to the number of 30. gifts bestowed upon him by Generals in way of reward 40. amongst which were two goodly mural garlands for scaling and entering upon the walls first: eight civick coroners for saving the lives of citizens in danger. Moreover, he presented there in place, the parties themselves in person, whom he had rescued out of the enemies hands: and amongst them he nominated C. Servilius at that instant General of the Horsemen, and now absent.

abient. And when he had rehearsed his noble feats of arms, and amplified them according to the height of their worth in a most glorious and eloquent Oration, as one whose words were suitable and answerable to his deeds: at the last he stripped his breast bare, and shewed the scars there remaining of wounds received in the wars: and ever and anon looking to the Capitol, very often he called aloud upon Jupiter and the other Gods, to help him now in this extremity and peril of his state: and prayed that the same mind which they had given him to defend the Capitol cliff, and even to the safeguard of the people of Rome, they would vouchsafe the same people; in this distress of his woful calamity: beseeching them both all and some, to look up to the cliff, and to the Capitol, to turn themselves toward the Gods there, and so to proceed to judgement of him. All the whiles the people were cited and called by their Centuries, and the prisoner stretched forth his hands, and converted his prayers from men to the Gods: the Tribuns evidently saw that unless they freed the eyes of the people from beholding the memorial of so great a deiert, it would never be that so long as their minds were thus forestalled and possessed with that benefit of his, they would find the enditement, were it never so true. So the matter being put off and deferred to another day, the people were summoned to assemble in the grove Petelinus, without the gate Flumentana, from whence they might not have a sight of the Capitol. There the accusation prevailed more than compassion, and the matter went against him: and so with hard and obdurate hearts, they pronounced a heavy and dolorous sentence, and which the very judges themselves had in horror. Some there be that say there were Dumviri ordained for the purpose, to make inquisition and sit upon this treason against the State. Thus being condemned the Tribuns caused him to be thrown headlong down the rock Tarpeia. Which place was the self same that yielded to that one man, a monument and memorial both of singular glory, and also of extreme punishment and ignominious death. After his death there remained two infamous marks behind him of shame: the one publick, occasioned by his dwelling house. For whereas it was situate, where now the chappel and work-house, or mint-house of Menes standeth, an Act was proposed unto the people, That none of the Senators lineage should dwell on the cliff or Capitol Mount. The other proceeding more properly from his own line and kindred: For that by a general decree of the house of Manlius it was provided, That none of that family and race should ever after bear the name of M. Manlius. This was the end of him, who, but that he was born in a free City, had been a right worthy and renowned man.

But the people being now past all danger from him, calling to mind and considering without all affection, his virtues as they were, found a misse of him shortly after. Yea, and for the pestilence also which ensued soon upon, for that there could be no causes known of so great mortality, was imagined of many a man, to have grown upon the execution of Manlius: arguing thus, That the Capitol was polluted with the blood of the Saviour thereof: and the Gods took no delight and pleasure to have (as it were) presented unto their eyes, the punishment of that man, by whose means their Temples had been delivered out of the hands of the enemies. Upon this plague and scarcity of corn withal, and the common brute that spread abroad both of the one and the other, there ensued the year following many wars, when as L. Valerius the fourth time, A. Manlius the third time, Ser. Sulpicius the third time, L. Laetorius, L. Aemilius the third time, and M. Trebonius were Tribuns Military in Consuls authority. For besides the Volscians, who by destinie were appointed for ever in a manner to busy and keep occupied the Roman souldiers: besides the Colonies Circeia and Velitris, which a long time were about to rebel: besides Lavinium, that stood in doubtful terms, and was suspected, the Lanuvines also, who had been a most fast and loyal City, all of a sudden rose and became new enemies. The LL. of the Senat supposing all this grew upon contempt, for that the revolting of the Velltrians, who were their natural citizens, had so long time escaped punishment, decreed with all speed to move the people to denounce and proclaim open war against them. And to the end that the Commons might be more forward in this Military service, they created certain Quinquerviri for the division of the Pomptine Lands: and Triumviri for the planting of a colony at Nepes. Then they propounded unto the people, that they would appoint and determine of the war to be made. And notwithstanding the Tribuns of the Com. laboured earnestly, but all in vain, to dissuade, yet the tribes throughout generally granted it, and gave their voyces for war. All that year passed in preparations only, but no army set forth by reason of the plague: which proroging of time and long delay, gave the inhabitants of the Colonies respite to sue unto the Senat for peace. Many of them were inclined and stood thus affected, to send a solemn embassage with humble supplication to Rome: but that (as commonly it falleth out) the publick peril was entangled and interested with the jeopardy of some private persons: and the authors of the backsliding and revolt from the Romans, fearing lest they alone should bear all the blame and be delivered up as a sacrifice to satisfy the wrath of the Romans, turned away clean and alienated the Colonies from all consultation of seeking for peace. And not only in their Council-House was this Embassage then crossed, but many of the Commons also: they excited to invade the territories of Rome, to drive booties, and make spoil. This new wrong by them offered, clean put them by all hope of peace. In that year was the first rumour raised, concerning the Rebellion also of the Preneestines. And when the Tusculans, Gabines, and Lavinians, into whose marches they had made inrodes, complained unto the Senat, and laid much matter against them, they received at their hands so calm and cold an answer, that it seemed they gave less credit to their complaints, because these were not willing they should prove true.

Five officers called Quinquerviri created.

The

A The year following, Sp. and E. Papirius, new Tribuns Military with Consuls authority, led the legions to Velitrae, whose four Collegues, Sen. Cornelius Maluginensis the fourth time, Q. Servilius, C. Sulpicius, D. Amylius the fourth time, were left Tribuns behind for defence of the City; and for fear lest they should hear some intelligence of new and fresh stirr out of Hetruria, where they suspected all would be naught. At Velitrae they had the better hand of their enemies: there they found more Preneftins well met, that came to succour, than the very Coloners themselves. For the City was so near at hand, that it both gave the enemies occasion to flye the sooner and yielded them the only place of safe refuge, after they were fled. The Tribuns forbore to assault the Town, as well in regard of the dangerous enterprise, as also for that they thought it not good to hold fight to the utter destruction of that Colony. Letters were dispatched to Rome with tidings of victory, implying more sharp informations against the Preneftins than the Veliterns. So by an Act of the Senat and assent of the people there was proclaimed war against the Preneftins: who in the year following joyned with the Volscians, and by force wan Saturnum a Colony of the people of Rome, notwithstanding it was manfully and valiantly defended by the Townsmen even to the last: where most bravely and cruelly they exercised their victory upon those that they took prisoners, and put them to the sword. The Romans took this in a very ill part: and elected M. Furius Camillus Tribun Military the seventh time: who had for his companions in office, A. and Lucius Postumius Rebellens, L. Furius and L. Lucretius, and M. Fabius Ambustus.

The cruelty of the Preneftins.

C The Volscian war was appointed to Camillus extraordinarily: and to assist him therein, it fell to B. Furius his lot, one of the State-Tribuns, not so much for the good of the Common weal, as to minister unto his fellow all matter of honour and renown: as well in publick, (for that he set all upright again, which by the rashness of Lucius was fall down) as also in private, for that out of his error and misdoing Marcus Furius, rather fought for thanks and love at his hands, than aimed at any vain glory to himself. Camillus was now far grown and kept in years and very aged, and when in the assembly for Election, he was about to take the usual form of oath, for to excuse his feeble and crazy body, the people with one consent would not permit him. Howbeit for all his age, he carried a lively spirit and lusty courage with him still: his senses were all fresh and sound: and the late civil affairs had stirred him up and gave him an edge, who now had no great mind to manage martial exploits. So he gathered a power of four legions, consisting of 4000. apiece, and made proclamation that all his forces should be ready the next day, at the gate Esquilina, and then he put himself in his journey to Saturnum. The enemy who had won the Colony, nothing dismayd therat, and trusting in the number of his followers, wherein he had the better by odds, expected and stayd his coming there. And so soon as he understood that the Romans approached, forthwith came into the field, minding without delay to put it to an hazard and try it out: presuming, that the skill of the Romans General, were he never so singular (in whom their enemies only trusted) would little or naught avail in regard they were so few in number. The Roman army was as hot as they, and one of their Generals as forward every way. And presently without any stay, had they tried the fortune of a battel, but for the policy and rule of one man: who by holding off, and protracting time of fight, fought so to help himself through good order and skill. But so much the more the enemy urged still, and was more sharp set: To as now he not only ranged his men before his own camp in battel array, but also set forward into the mids of the field: and advancing himself with ensigns displayed, neer unto the trench and rampier of his enemies, made a proud bravado and shew of his strength, wereupon he bare himself so confidently. This could the Roman souldiers hardly endure: and L. Furius one of the Tribuns Military, had more ado by far to digest and put up that at the enemies hand. And a venturesome Knight he was, both by reason of his youthful years and natural disposition: and also puffed up with hope of the multitude, which commonly taketh heart, and presumeth upon smallest grounds, and buildeth upon greatest uncertainties. And the souldiers being of themselves already not enough, he inflamed and set them more on fire, by elevating and making light of his fellows reputation, in regard of his old age, the only thing that he could alledge: giving out ever and anon, "That wars were for young-men, that mens hearts flourish and faded as their bodies did: which was seen in Camillus, who of a most valorous and forward warrior, was now become a draw-back and a temporiser, and one that would take his leisure: and he that was wont, so soon as he came to a place, with the first assault to win Forts and strong Towns, now within his mures and rampier sat still and crised out the time. And what hopes had he? Dreameth he, that either his own power should encrease, or his enemies strength decrease? What occasion, what opportunity of time, what place of vantage for ambush laid he for? Tush, these policies and inventions of the good old man, are cold and dull, God wor. In faith,

L. Furius to his souldiers.

G "Camillus, as he hath lived long enough, so hath he gained glory enough. To what purpose then (quoth he) should we suffer the whole puissance of a City, which ought indeed to be immortal, for to age and wax old with the body of one man, whom all men see to be but mortal. With these and such like words he had drawn away the whole camp after him: and when from all parts thereof, they called hard and cryed for battel: "We are not able (quoth he) M. Furius to keep in and repress any longer the violence of our souldiers: and as for the pride of the enemy, whose courage by our delays we have encreased and who insulteth over us, it is intolerable. "Give place then, you that are but one man, and yeeld unto us all. Suffer your self to be overcome

"come with reason and counsel, that you may sooner overcome by force and arms. Hereunt o
 "Camillus made answer again: What wars soever (quoth he) unto this present day have by mine
 "own entire conduct, and sole direction been managed, neither can you nor the people of Rome "deny, but that in them you never repented, either of my policy or happy success. Now I know "full well, that I have a companion, joynt with me, in government & rule of equal commission;
 "for the prime and lustiness of youth, much above me, and my better. And as to the army, I have "indeed been used ever to command, and not to be commanded: but yet my fellows authori"ty, I cannot be against. Let him do in Gods Name, what he thinketh good for the Common"weal, and God speed his hand. Only in regard of mine old age I crave this favour, that I may "not be set in the forefront: but for other labours, look what an old man may or ought to do
 "in war, therein surely I shall not fail. And this one thing would I crave at the hands of the im"mortal Gods, that some notable mishap befall not, to make my former counsel good and praise"worthy. But neither would men be ruled by his advice so profitable and wholesome, nor the "Gods vouchsafe to hear his prayers so holy and devout. Then Lucius Furium, the author and prin"cipal perwader of battel, setteth the vanguard in array. Camillus he fortifieth the Regiments and "Squadrons for supply in the rereward: but above all, he placeth a strong guard before the camp.
 "Himself took up his standing on a higher place, to behold and mark the issue of another mans
 "counsel. So soon as at the first brunt and encounter, they rustled and made a noise with their ar"mour, the enemies on purpose (of policy, and not for fear) gave footing and lost ground. Now,
 "there was behind them on their back a pretty rising of an Hill between their camp and the battel:
 "and by reason that they were well stored of men, they had left behind them in the camp certain
 "strong companies armed and well appointed: with this instruction that whiles both armies were "hard in fight, and when their enemies should come near their trench and rampier, they might fall "out on a sudden upon them. The Romans following out of measure upon the enemies as they re-
 "treated, were drawn upon the disadvantage of the ground, and gave occasion and fit opportunity "unto the enemy to issue out of the camp upon them. So the terror returned upon the supposed vic"tors, by reason both of the new supplies of the enemies, and also of the fall and descent of the "Hill: and forced the battel of the Romans to give back. The Volscians that charged them from "out of the camp, and were fresh and lusty, pressed hard upon them: they also that made as though "they fled, began now to fight again. The Romans souldiers forgetting now both their late lusti-
 "ness, and their ancient honour, retired not easily and softly in good order, but plain turned their "backs on all sides, fled amain by heaps, and ran away toward their own camp. Whereat Camillus
 "being by them that attended about his person, mounted upon a good Courser, and with all the "speed he could make, opposing the Squadrons of the rereward against the enemy: "Is this (quoth
 "he) the fight, you souldiers, that ye so called for? what God, what man can ye lay the weight
 "on now? It was your rashness and fool-hardiness afore: and it is your dastardly cowardise
 "now, and nothing else, that is the cause of all this. Followed ye have already one General.
 "Follow Camillus now a while: and as ye have been always wont by my leading, once more "win the victory. What look you toward the hold and the camp? there is no coming thither,
 "there is no being there for any of you without victory. At the first they were ashamed, and "stayed themselves from farther flight: but after that they saw once the ensigns wheel about, and
 "the Squadrons turn again, they made head, and charged the enemy amain. And the General
 "himself, a man renowned for so many triumphs, and besides, for his venerable age so revered, even "amongst the foremost ensigns, amid the greatest perils, and most distresses, advanced forth in per"son. Hereupon every one for his part, set the better leg forward, provoked his fellow withal, and "encouraged one another, so as with a cheerful and lively shout, the whole field rang again. Nei"ther was the other Tribun behind hand for his part: but being sent by his Colleague unto the "Horsemen (whiles he in the meantime marshalled again the Footmen in order) not by way of "chiding (for what might he avail thereby, so long as he was himself in fault as well as the rest?)
 "but laying aside all Lordly command, fell wholly to entreating, and besought them both all and
 "some to quit themselves like men, and acquit him of the guilt and blame of that unlucky dayes
 "work. "Indeed (quoth he) when my brother Camillus would not agree thereto, but expressly
 "forbad, yet I chose rather to be partaker of the folly and rashnes of all, than the wisdom and "sage advice of one. Camillus (come what will of it, speed you well, or speed you ill) seeth the "glory will be his: but I, unless the battel be revived, shall take such part as you all, (a most mi"serable and pitious case) but the shame will redound and light upon my head and none else.
 "Well, at length they agreed, and thought it best to abandon their Horses to bestow them among "the waving and disordered companies, and on foot to make head upon the enemies. Thus they go "both together, as bravely minded with resolution, as they were richly and gorgeously armed. And "in what part soever they saw the footmen most distressed, there wanted neither in the Generals
 "nor in the souldiers, courage in the highest degree to fight it out lustily. Well was it seen by the "happy event, that valorous endeavours speed ever well. For the Volscians the same way that
 "erewhile they made semblance of giving ground upon a counterfeit fear, now fled in good sadness
 "as hard as they could. A great number both in the conflict, and after in the chase were slain. As "for the rest that remained in the camp, which presently at one brunt was won, more of them "were taken prisoners than killed. In the view & account taken of the captives, there were some of "them known to be Tusculans, who were severed apart from the rest, and brought before the "State-

A State-Tribuns, And upon examination, confessed fully, that they served by the publick warrant of the City. Camillus herewith disquieted, for fear of war from so near neighbors, said he would forthwith have those prisoners with him to Rome, that the Lords of the Senat might not be ignorant how the Tusculans were revolted from their society. In the mean while, his brother Tribun might, if he so pleased, have the regiment of the legges and the host. That days work had taught him now, not to prefer his own ways before the better counsel of another. And yet neither he himself, nor any man else in the army, thought that Camillus would quietly digest this fault of his, whereby the State of the Commonwealth was driven upon so dangerous a point of downfall. And as well in the host, as also at Rome, it was ripe and currant in every mans mouth. B that whereas the fight with the Volscians was variable, and the service doubtful: for the ill speed, the discomfite, and the running away, L. Furius was all in fault: but for the good success, Camillus only had all the honour.

When the captives were brought into the Council House, and the Lords of the Senat were of opinion and determined war against the Tusculans, and had laid the charge thereof upon Camillus, he requested to have an assistant joined with him in Commission: and being left to his own choiceto take whom he would of all his Companions in office, contrary to all mens expectation, he chose L. Furius. By which moderation of his affections, and good carriage of himself, he both delayed the infancy of this Colleague, and won himself great glory and commendation. Yet for all this, proceeded not they to any war with the Tusculans. For they by their constant observation

C of peace, kept off the violence of the Romans, which by force of arms they had not been able. When the Romans entered and invaded their territory, they went not so much as out of those places that lay near the high way, whereas the enemy marched: they forsook not the tilling of their grounds, but kept the gates of their City wide open, came forth solemnly in their long gowns to meet with the LL. Generals in the way, and brought victuals right courteously to serve the army, as well out of the City as Country. Camillus having pitched down his tents before the gates, and desirous to know, whether there were the same appearance of peace within the wals, as bare shew abroad in the Country, entered the City: and seeing the doors standing open, the shop-windows up, all kind of wares set out to sale upon the bulks: the Craftsmen and Artisans busily every one occupied at his work: the Grammar schools ringing again with a chime of scholars, learning and

D saying their lessons; the streets full of women and children amongst the other common people going to and fro about their business: he could perceive no where about him any thing that carried a resemblance of fearful men, no, nor so much as of those that made any wonder at their coming in that warlike order. Thus cast he his eyes into every corner, seeking where this war should be. For there was not so much as any token to be seen, either of ought removed out of the way, or brought in place, upon this present occasion; but all in so settled quierness and peace, as if they had scarcely heard any inkling or rumor of hostility. Being therefore overcome with this patience and sufferance of the enemies, he caused their Senat to assemble, unto whom he spake in this wise: "Ye alone to this day of all that I know, O Tusculans, have found the only armor of

E "proof, and the forcible sense indeed, to save your selves and all ye have from the Romans ire. "Go your ways to Rome unto the Senat there. The Lords of the Council wil weigh and consider, "whether ye deserved more punishment Before, then pardon now. I wil not forestal and pick my self a private thank for a publick benefit. At my hands ye shal have this favour and liberty, to "speak for your selves and plead your own cause: as the Senat shal think good, so shal you speed "of your suit. After that the Tusculans were come to Rome, and their Senat (who but a while afore had been faithful Allies and kept their allegiance) seen to stand waiting with heavy cheer, and giving their attendance at the entry of the Court and Council Chamber: the Lords of the Roman Senat, were presently moved thereat, and caused them forthwith to be called in, and received by way of hospitality, more like then hostility. Then the Dictator of Tusculum made this speech and said: "Right honorable Senators, we against whom ye have proclaimed and made war,

F "came forth to encounter your Generals and Legions, armed and appointed as ye see us at this "present standing in the porch of your Council House. This was our array, this was the habit of "our Commons, and always shal be, unless at any time we shal put on arms for you and in your "quarrel. Thanks we yeeld to your Captains and to your Armies, that they have beleevd rather "their eyes than their ears: and where they saw no hostility at all, there they offered none themselves. That peace which we have shewed and observed, the same crave we humbly still at the "hands of your clemency. Turn we beseech you from us your forces thither, where war is to be "found. And if we must needs make trial (by suffering ought) of your puissance and power bent against us, we will try it surely without armor. This is our full resolution. God grant it prove "as fortunate, as it is well meant and proceeding from a single heart. As for the trespasses where-

G "upon ye were moved to denounce war against us: although it be bootless and to no purpose to "disprove that by words, which by deed is already proved: yet surely were they never so true, "we think verily, that without prejudice to our selves, we may safely confess the same, since that "we have so evidently repented thereof. And for you, so long as you be worthy to have so full "satisfaction made, it skilleth not what default or transgression be committed against you. Thus much in effect spake the Tusculans. At the very instant they obtained peace: and not long after, the right of free burgeoisie, to be made Citizens of Rome. So the Legions were withdrawn back again from Tusculum. Thus Camillus having won great honor by his policy and valour both, in the Volscian war : by his happy success in the journey of Tusculum : by his singular patience and carriage of himself, toward his companion in government, as well in the one place as the other, went out of his Magistracy: there being created Tribuns Military for the next year, L. Valerius the fifth time, and Pub. Valerius the third time, C. Servilius the third time, Licinius Menenius the second time, P. Papirius, Serg. Cornelius Maluginensis.

There was this year need of Censors also, by reason especially of the doubtful rumors that ran concerning debts : whiles of the one side the Tribuns of the Commons did aggravate the greatness thereof, and made it seem an odious matter : and they again of the other side, did elevate and made little of the same for whom it was good and beneficial, that the lent money should be thought abroad, in danger of being lost: for that (say they) the debtors cautelously rather would not, than for ability could not, keep their credit and make payment. So there were created Censors, C. Sulpicius Camerinus, Sp. Posthumius Regillensis. And this matter now already commenced, was broken off by the death of Posthumius, because it would have bred a scruple to chuse another Censor in the room of him deceased. When Sulpicius therefore had resigned up his place, it fell out so that other new Censors upon some error committed in their creation, exercised not their office: and to chuse a third time they made a scruple, so tender conscienced were they, as if the gods were not well pleased with that office for that year. But the Tribuns would not endure this deluding of the Commons, but gave it forth that it was intollerable: saying, "That the Senat sought to avoid the exhibiting of publick records and books, which gave testimony of the valuation of every mans substance to the worth: because they would not have the sums of debts to be seen and known: which might bewray and plainly shew, that one part of the City was even eaten up and devoured of the other: and in the mean time the poor Commons so deeply engaged, were packed away, and sent forth against these enemies and those: and now without all regard and discretion, they sought occasions to quarrel and make war in every place. From Antium to Satricum, from Satricum to Velitre, from thence to Tusculum have your Legions been posted. And now, forsooth, there is war intended against the Latins, Hernicks and Prenestins: for hatred rather of the Citizens here at home, then of the enemies abroad: and all to wear out the Commons with continual wars, and to afford them no breathing while within the City: that in time of rest, they might remember and think upon their freedom, keep their rooms in common assembly, where they might at the length hear their Tribuns voice pleading for the easement of usury, and for a final end of all injuries. But and if the Commons had the heart, and carried that mind with them, as to call to remembrance their ancestors liberty, they would suffer neither any Citizen of Rome to be awarded to bondage for debt, nor any musters for to be taken, until a view were made and just account had, of every man his debts, and some course taken for abating the same: that each man might know, what he had of other mens goods, what remained of his own: whether his body were left free, or at the mercy of his creditor, to lie in cold iron and baleful prison. This hire and salary of sedition, this reward once propounded aforehand, stirred up (you may be sure) a mutiny soon after. For whereas there were many adjudged to be bound unto their Creditors, and the Senators had decreed new Legions to be believed, for the bruit and rumor that went of the Prenestin wars: both matters began to be hindred for taking any effect, as well by the Tribuns help as the Commons accord. For neither would the Tribuns suffer those that were condemned to be led to prison: nor yet the younger sort of the Commons, enter their names in the Muster-master his book. And the Senators for the present, less minded the execution of judgement for the Creditors behoof, then the mustering. For why? News came already, that the enemies had put themselves in their journey from Preneste, and were encamped in the Sabins country: And all this while, the very tidings hereof rather quickned and provoked the Tribuns of the Commons to the broil that was begun, than frightened them any jot from it. Neither would any thing serve to quench the sedition in the City, until the war was come in manner to the very walls. For the Prenestins had intelligence given them, that in Rome there was no army gathered, no General certainly known: the Senators and Commons at jar and together by the ears. Their Captains hereupon, taking this advantage and opportunity, with a running camp invaded, spoiled and wasted the fields all afore them as they went, and came with banners displayed before the gate Cullina. Great fear was in the City, every man cried Alarm, ran up to the walls to man them, and to the gates to ward them. And at the last they left their mutinies, turned to the wars, and created T. Quintius Cincinnatus Dictator. He appointed for his General of horsemen, A. Sempronius Atratinus. This was not so soon voiced abroad, (so great a terror went always with that magistrate) but the enemies withal dislodged and departed from the walls: and the younger sort of the Romans, without any trifling and drawing back, upon the proclamation, gathered together. Whiles forces were thus arising at Rome, the enemies pitched their camp not far from the River Allia: and as they foraged the Country all about, they bragged and vaunted among themselves, that they had got that very plot of ground, which was ever fatal to the destruction of the City of Rome. "Here wil be (say they) the like fight, from hence wil they fly, no doubt, as sometimes they did before in the Gauls war. For if the Romans feared that dismal and unlucky day, noted with the infamous name of this place: how much more wil they dread the river Allia it self, in memorial of their so great overthrow, than the only bare day Alliensis? Certainly, when they are come hither, they will think they see again the grim looks, and hear the hideous voices of those savage Gauls. Thus rolling & tossing with

The Tribuns of the Commons against the Senat.

The Prenestins invade the territory of Rome.

A with themselves these toyish conceits, rising of as vain and foolish presumptions, they rested wholly and reposed their full hope in the lucky persuasion only of the place. The Romans contrariwise knew full well, that their enemies the Latins, were (wheresoever they were) the very same men still, and no other, whom for the space of one hundred years they held peaceably and quietly as their devoted vassals in subjection. And as for the place noted indeed, for the memorial of that late defeat and loss sustained, it might rather stir them up and set an edge upon them to abolish and cancel the remembrance of that shameful disgrace, then put them in fear, that any ground should be so unfortunate, as to be a bar unto their victory. Nay, if the very Gauls themselves came now in their way, they would so fight with them even in that ground, as they did at Rome, in the recovery of their country: as they did the morrow after at Gabii: when they bare themselves so valiantly, that no one enemy that entered within the walls of Rome, went ever home again to tell news how they sped, well or ill. Thus on both sides being resolute, and courageously bent, they met at Allia. The Roman Dictator discovering the enemies arranged in battle array, within sight. "See you not (quoth he) O A. Sempronius, how they have stayed at Allia, presuming upon the luckiness of the place? No sure confidence, no greater help may they have; I pray God. But you, with trusty armor, keen weapons, and doughty courage set spurs to horse, gallop amongst the thickest of their main battel with your horsemen, I, with the legions on foot, will advance mine Ensigns, and display them, in their faces, and charge them hotly when they are disbanded once, and put in fear. Assist us now, and aid us, O ye gods (the witnesses of our league) and punish them duly for their deserts, both in dishonouring your divine Majesty, and deceiving us in your name, whom they called solemnly to witness. Neither horsemen nor footmen could the Preneftins abide, but at the very first shout and shock were the ranks broken. And seeing their Battailions in no place whole and kept together, they fled: and amazed as they were in that confused fear, and carryed away beyond their own camp, they stayed not running for life, until by good footmanship they were come within the sight of Prenefte. There, all such as had been scattered in the flight, met together, and chose a plot of ground, to fortifie in that haste as well as they could: lest peradventure, if they had put themselves within the town, forthwith their villages should have been fired, and after all consumed and spoiled, the town also might fortune to be besieged. But when the Roman Conqueror after the rising of their camp at Allia, was once come toward them and discovered, they abandoned that Fort also, and gat within the town Prenefte, thinking themselves scarce safe enough within the walls thereof. Eight towns besides there were under the seignory of the Preneftins, against which the Dictator warred round: and having won them all, one after another without much ado, he brought his army against Velutre, and got that town also by assault. Then came he to the principal head and very seat town of the war, Prenefte, which was not by force won, but by surrender, yielded up into his hands. And T. Quintius thus having obtained one victory in a pight field, won two camps and holds of the enemies, conquered by force nine towns, and regained Prenefte surrendered unto him, returned home again to Rome. In his triumph he carried aloft the Image of Jupiter, surnamed Emperor, which he brought from Prenefte, and set it up in the Capitol, where it was placed and dedicated between the shrines of Jupiter and Minerva; and in a table of brasse fixed under it, was the monument of this noble exploit recorded and engraven in these or such like words: [T. Quintius Dictator, by the gracious help of Jupiter, and all the rest of the gods, won nine Towns.] So on the 20. day after his creation, he resigned up his Dictatorship.

Then was the assembly holden for electing of Tribuns Military with Coſt. authority, who were equally chosen from out of the Nobility and the Com. Of Nobles were created, P and C. Manlius, with L. Julius. The Commons yielded C. Sextilius, M. Albinus, and L. Anstius. Upon the two Manlius, for that in blood and degree they were above the Commoners, and for far our more gracious then Julius, the province of the Volscians was bestowed extraordinarily, without casting lots or parting together by agreement of the Collegues amongst themselves. Which both they themselves rued, and the Senators also (that would have it so) repented afterwards. For without any espials, sent out aforehand to icour the coasts, they had set forth certain cohorts or companies (of footmen) a foraging, and when upon a false alarm that those were beset & intrapped, they marched themselves apace after, to their rescue & convoy, & kept not with them till the reporter of these tidings (who being indeed a Latin and an enemy, but disguised in the habit of a Roman souldier, had deceived them) they fell headlong into a train and ambushment laid of purpose for them. And whiles they made resistance with main force only in a ground of great disadvantage (giving & taking the like measure) they were killed & slain on either side. But in the mean time their enemies from another quarter, entered the camp of the Romans lying open in the plain. Thus in both places, things went but badly and untowardly, & all through the rashness and unskillfulness of the leaders.

G And what remained unfoiled for the fortune of the people of Rome, that was preserved by the hardy and resolute valor of the Roman souldiers only, without the help of general and commander. Upon which news reported at Rome, at the first it was thought good to chuse a Dictator: but afterwards, when tidings came, that all was whole & the Volscians quiet, and that it was well seen they knew not how to use a victory when they had it, nor to take the opportunity of the time, whiles it offered it self: both the Generals & the army were sent for home from thence & so for the Volscians they were at rest afterwards. Only in the very end of the year, ther arose some new stir & sudden tumult, by reason that the Preneftins having solicited the people of the Latins, entered into rebellion.

rebellion again. In the same year the men of Setia made moan of themselves for want of people, and thither new Coloners were assigned to inhabit there.

Albeit the Romans sped but badly in wars, yet the quietness at home was some comfort: which the Tribuns Military chosen from out of the Commons had procured, by reason that they were so gracious and revered among those of their own coat and faction. All the beginning of the year following, was at the first on a light fire with horrid discord and mutiny, when Sp. Furius, Quintius Servilius the second time, Licinius Menenius the third time, P. Clatius, M. Horatius and L. Geganus were Tribuns Military with Consuls authority. The matter and cause of which seditious broils, were the debts above specified. For the due inquisition wherof, and to know to what sums they amounted, Sp. Servilius Priscus and Clatius Sienus were made Censors, but stopped they were for doing anything, by occasion of wars. For first, fearful messengers in all haste brought word, and after, the flight of the Country people confirmed it, that the legions of the Volscians were entred into the confines, and fell to spoiling every where the territory about Rome. Notwithstanding which fear and forraign terror, so little were the civil discords appeased, that contrariwise the Tribuns of the Commons extended their power with more violence to hinder the levy of souldiers, until they had indented and capitulated with the Senators, that so long as the wars lasted, no man should either contribute and be charged with any impost, or be sued in any action of debt. When the Com. took hold once of this easement and liberty, the musters were delayed no longer. And after they had levied and enrolled two new legions, it was thought convenient that the legions should be divided, and two armies sent forth into the Volscians Country. So Furius and M. Horatius, went on the right hand along the sea coast to Antrum. Q. Servilius and L. Geganus on the left hand, by the way of the mountains to Ecetra. But on neither side met they with the enemy. Whereupon they fell to foraging the Country, not here and there in scattering wise, as the Volscians had done, after the manner of robbers, at starts upon advantage taken of their enemies discord, and by stealth for fear of their valour: but being a full power and army of men, and justly provoked to anger, the longer they continued there, the fouler work they made. For the Volscians standing in fear, left in the mean while they should be encountered with a power from Rome, had made roads only into the utmost frontiers: But contrariwise, the Romans made stay in the enemies land, the rather to train them forth and draw them to a field-fight. Having therefore burned up, in a manner, all the uplandish houses and granges, and some villages also, and left behind them no fruitful tree standing, nor the sown corn for hope of grain, and driven away whole booties of men, women, and cattel, which they could light on without the walls: they reduced their armies of both sides home again to Rome. In this mean while the debtors had some little respite to breath themselves in: But so soon as all was quiet from enemies abroad, they began a fresh to be sued and troubled by their creditors at home. And so small hope they had to be released of their old usury, that they fell into a new, by reason of a contribution collected toward a wall, which the Censors had let out to be made of square Ashler stone. To yeeld unto this imposition and burden, the Commons were driven, because there was no muster for the Tribuns of the Commons to hinder. Forced they were likewise through the might and power of the great men, to admit for Tribuns military, all of the Nobility, to wit, L. Emilius, P. Valerius the fourth time, C. Veturius, Servius Sulpitius, L. and C. Quintii Cincinnatus.

By the same strong hand also they prevailed so much, that without impeachment of any man, all the younger sort took the military oath, so that they levied three armies against the Latins and Volscians: who joining their legions together, had encamped themselves at Satricum. One army was gathered for the defence of the City: another to be set out against all sudden wars, if haply elsewhere some tumult should arise: & a third, of all other the strongest, was under the conduct of P. Valerius, and L. Emilius, led to Satricum. Where, finding the enemies embattelled in good array upon a plain & even ground, they charged upon them presently. But ere that they had got the victory evidently in fight, and were but only in some good hope of having a fair day of their enemies, the rain so poured down with huge storms and tempests, that it parted both hosts asunder. The morrow after began a fresh conflict. And for a good while, the legions of the Latins especially, which by long alliance with the Romans had learned their manner of warfare, stood to it as valiantly, and sped as fortunately as the Romans. At length, the Roman horsemen that rood in amongst them, brake their ranks: and when they were once disarrayed, the footmen displayed their ensigns, and advanced upon them: and look how much the Romans battel set forward, so much the enemies gave backward. But when they began once to faint in their fight, than the violence of the Romans was intollerable. Thus the enemies were discomfited and scattered: and flying not toward their camp, but to Satricum, which was two miles off, they were by the horsemen especially beaten down, trod under foot and slain. Their tents were taken and rifled. From Satricum they dislodged, the next night after the battel was fought and marched in great haste (as if they fled) to Antrum. And albeit the Roman army followed them by the tracks hard at heels, yet their footmanship served them better in their fear, than it did the Romans for all their anger. So the enemies put themselves within the town walls, before the Romans could overtake them, and either cut off the tail of their rearward, or force them to stay. After this, some days were spent in wasting the Country. For neither were the Romans sufficiently provided with warlike engines of battery and artillery to assail their walls, nor they well appointed to abide battel in plain field. Then arose some discord within the town, between the Latins and the Antiats. The

A Antiats, of one side wearied with calamities that follow long wars, wherewith all their life time they had been exercised even to their old age, were of mind to yield. The Latins by reason of their late revolt and rebellion (whiles after so long peace, their courages continued yet fresh) were more forward and earnest to maintain wars still. But when they saw on both sides that they might do as they purposed, and follow their own deligments, without being hindered one of another, their strife was soon ended. So the Latins leaving their fellowship & society of peace, so unhonest & dishonourable (as they thought it) departed from them, and stood out still to revenge their own quarrels. But the Antiats being well rid of these Counsellors of their, so cross up to all wholesome courtes, tending to their good and safety, yielded up their town and country to the Romans. But B the anger and furious rage of the Latins, for that they could neither annoy the Romans by wars, nor keep the Volscians still in arms, brake out thus far, that they fired the City Satricum, which had been the first place of refuge, after their defeat and unhappy fight. Neither left they any house in that City standing, but set fire upon all indifferently, as well profane as holy edifices: only the Church of Dame Maia they spared. From which, it was neither any religion and conscience of their own, nor fear of the gods that kept them, but (as men report) a fearful voice heard out of the Temple with heavy threats, inlesst they held their hands, and kept them far enough from burning the sacred habitations so impiously. In this rage and mad fit of theirs, to Tusculum they go: for very spite that they forsaking the general council of the Latins, had not only yielded themselves to be in league with the Romans, but also became incorporate Citizens C with them. And coming upon them on a sudden, while their gates were open, at the first shour the whole Town, all but the Castle, was surprized. The Townsmen with their Wives and Children were thither fled: and sent messengers to Rome with certifiat to the Senat of this sudden and unlooked for accident. And with all speed (as appertained to the fidelity of the people of Rome) an army was led to Tusculum: whereof L. Quintus and Servius Sulpitius, had the conduct. At Tusculum they found the gates fast shut against them, and the Latins, as men both besieging and besieged. And whiles of the one side they intended the defence of the walls, on the other side assaulted the Castle: at one time they were afraid themselves, and put others in fear likewise. But the coming of the Romans wrought a great change and alteration in the hearts of both parties. For it caused the Tusculans of fearful men to become exceeding cheerful: and the D Latins who made full reckoning to win the fortress out of hand, as being masters already of the town, had but small hope now to help and save themselves. The Tusculans they set up a great shout from the Castle: and answered it was again with a greater from the Roman army. The Latins were put to it hard on both sides: For neither were they able to abide the violence of the Tusculans running down the hill upon them, nor to put by and keep off the Romans, coming hard under the walls, and assaying to break the bars of the gates. First, they scaled the walls and and gat upon them: after, they brake the port-cullis down. Thus the Latins environed with enemies both before and behind, that pressed sore upon them, having neither strength enough left to fight, nor room of ground to make an escape, were slain in the midst between the enemies, every mothers son. So when Tusculum was recovered out of the enemies hands, the army was E brought back again to Rome.

But the more quietness there was that year without the City by reason of prosperous wars, the more increased the violence and hard dealing of the Senators within: and the calamities of the Commons grew every day more than other. For they wanted means and were not able to pay for the interest that needs must be paid. When nothing therefore was to be had, to make payment out of their goods, they were adjudged and awarded to satisfy their creditors in their body and name: and so their punishment served in stead of keeping their credit and discharging the consideration. Whereupon, not only the meanest of the Commons, but also the very chief, began now to let fall their hearts and stoop so low, that there was not a witty and humble headed man and of experience amongst them, that would put himself forth to stand to be a Tribun Military, in F concurrence with the Nobles, (which they had so earnestly shot at and laboured for) no, nor so much as to bear and sue for any offices of the Commons. So as the Senators now, seemed to have recovered again for ever to themselves, the possession of that dignity, which the Commons of late, for some few years, had usurped and occupied over their heads. But that this order side might not joy too much herat, a small occurrent hapned between which (as it falleth out most commonly) gave the occasion and first footing to an enterprize of much importance.

M. Fabius Ambustus a great and mighty man, as well amongst those of his own calling, as also with the Commons (whom he was reputed never to despise, as other did of his condition and estate) had two daughters married forth: the elder unto Servius Sulpitius: the younger unto C. Licinius Stolo, a man verily of good worth and reckoning, but yet a Commoner. And Fabius dis- G daining not this alliance and affinity, was himself much loved and favoured among the Commons. Now it fell out so, that these sisters were upon a time together in the house of Servius Sulpitius, then Trib. Military: and as they passed the time away (as the manner is) in much good talk, discoursing one with another of many matters, it chanced that a Sergeant or Verger of Sulpitius, at what time as he was coming home from the Forum or common hall, rapped as the order was, with his rod at the door. When the younger Fabius not acquainted with those fashions was therat somewhat amazed, her sister making a wonder at her ignorance, laught her to scorn. But that laughter (as womens minds got wor, are soon kindled with a little) set her a work & hammered in her head,

Licinius and Sextius.

* I forbid. It was the negative voice of

Besides, the train of many that came about her, waiting and giving attendance ready to know her pleasure and what she would, mended the matter much. I suppose she thought her sister happily wedded, and repented her own marriage: upon a ill and sinister judgment, whereby every man repineth that his neighbor and nearest of kin especially, should go beyond him and do better then he. Upon this discontentment and self heart-burning of hers, her father haply seeing her dismayed, asked her whether all was well at home? But when she would have turned the cause of her grief another way, (for that it stood neither with her love and kindness towards her sister, to envy her estate; nor yet with the reverent honor that she was to yeeld unto her husband, to find fault with her own) he with mild questioning came about her so, that he drew from her the truth: so, as she confessed her grief to arise upon this, that she was disparaged; and namely, married not according to her quality, but into an house uncapable both of worship and favour. Then Ambustus, comforting his daughter, willed her to be of good cheer, and said: That ere it were long, she should see the same state, the same advancement and dignity at home, which she had seen already in her sisters house. Hereupon began he to plot with his son in law, joyning also unto them, L. Sextius, a stout young man, and one that was like enough to come to preferment, but that he was not of noble race. Good occasion and opportunity they seemed to have of compassing some alteration in the State, by reason of the excessive debts that men were grown into: for the redressing and easing of which malady, the Com. had no other hope, but in advancing some of themselves into the sovereign room of government. They thought it needful therefore, presently to address themselves to the execution of these designments, considering that by endeavor and industry, the Commoners were climbed to that degree already, from whence if they would enforce and put themselves forward, they had but one step more unto the highest, and might be equal with the Nobles, as well in honour as in vertue and prowesse. And for the present, it was thought good to make them, two Trib. of the Com. in which office they might open a way unto themselves, for other dignities. So C. Licinius and L. Sextus proposed laws, all tending to abate the power and might of the Nobles, and wholly for the good and benefit of the Com. One, as touching taking order for debts: That when so much was defaultted and deducted out of the principal, as had been paid for the use and interest, the residue should be discharged by even portions in 3 years. A second, concerning a proportion and quantity of lands, That no man might hold in possession above 500. acres. The third, That from thenceforth there should be no election of Trib. Military, but of Coss. provided always, that one of them be chosen out of the Com. Matters all of right great weight and consequence, and such as with out exceeding strife and contention, could not possibly be carried and obtained. Thus when all those things at once lay a bleeding, and were in hazzard to be lost, which the whole world unmeasurably coveteth and longeth after, to wit, land, money, and promotion: the Senators were put in a bodily fear, and began to fattle. And laying their heads together both in publick consultation and privat conference, they could devise no other remedy, but that which in many commotions already they had tried, namely, the stepping between and negative voice of some of the Tribuns. And so, to cross those bills aforesaid put up by these two Tribuns, they had wrought and made to their purpose certain of their own brotherhood. Who so soon as they saw the wards and tribes called forth by Licinius and Sextius, to give their suffrages, being well backed and guarded with the assistance of the Senators, would suffer neither those laws to be read, nor any other besides (as yearly they used) to pass by the voices of the Commons. Thus the two Tribuns aforesaid, having oftentimes (but ever in vain) assembled the people together, and seeing their laws still nipped, as it were, in the head for ever going forward: "It is very well" (quoth Sextius) and since ye like so well that these inhibitions may prevail so much: "we will likewise defend the Commons with the same weapon and no other. Go to now my Masters of the Nobility, proclaime an election for the creation of Trib. Military: I will make it row, that this word [* Veto] shall do your selves no good at all: howsoever now ye take so great pleasure to hear our brethren keep that note still, and evermore sing that sweet concert of musick. And surely, those threats proved indeed to good earnest and took effect. For there was no election at all but of Ediles and Tribuns, and those both of the Commons. For Licinius and Sextius being chosen Tribuns again, suffered no Magistrates of the Chair, or of State, to be created. Which defect and desolation of sovereign Magistracy continued in the City for the space of five years: whiles the Commons for their part chose the same two Tribuns still, and they again ever laid a bar and put in a caveat against the election of Tribuns Military.

All other wars, as good hap was, were asleep for the time. The Coloners only of Velure, upon so long rest and quietness began to be lusty and wax wanton: and for that there was no army of the Romans stirring abroad, they not only made inrodes sundry times into the territory of Rome, but also assailed the town Tusculum. And when the Tusculans, the ancient Allies and new enfranchised Citizens of Rome craved help, the Senators and Commons both, were moved especially for very shame to succour them. And the Tribuns of the Commons yeelded at length, and permitted an assembly for election, to be holden by an Inter-regent: and Trib. Military there were created, L. Furius, A. Manlius, Ser. Sulpitius, Ser. Cornelius, A. and C. Valerius: Who found not the Commons so tractable in the mustering, as they were pliable in giving their voices at the Election. Yet after much ado & great contention they levied an army, and set forward on their journey: drave the enemies not from Tusculum only, but forced them within their own walls: besieged Velure more straightly a great deal, and in more forcible manner, than Tusculum had been by them.

Howbeit

A Howbeit, they that began the siege were not able to win the town. For before that time, were new Tribuns Military chosen, Q. Servilius, C. Volumnius, A. and M. Cornelius, Q. Quinctius, M. Fabius. Neither performed these Tribuns any notable exploit at Vesivie. But the State at home stood in more dangerous terms than before. For besides that Sextius and Licinius, the publishers of those laws aforesaid, were now the eighth time made Trib. of the Commons again, Fabius also a Tribun Military, Scio his wives father, was seen openly in the action, to see forward and persuade for the same laws, which in every deed himself had devised. And whereas at the first, eight of the Colledge or Company of the Tribuns of the Commons, had crossed the proceeding of them, now there were but five left that shewed themselves, and those (as commonly they use to do that disband from their own faction) like men bereaved of their wits and amazed, being indeed the tongues and trunks that others spake by, pretended and made allegations in their prohibition, only as they were schooled and taught their lessons at home: (to wit) That a great sort of the Commons were in the army at Vesivie and absent, and that the solemn Session or Assembly for enacting laws, ought to be adjourned until the return home of the soldiers: to the end that all the Commons generally, might give their voices concerning their own commodity and benefit. Sextius and Licinius with part of their brethren Tribuns, and M. Fabius one of the Tribuns Military, being their own traffickers, knew well enough by so many years experience, how to manage and handle the minds of the Commons: and piled the chief of the Senators (produced forth before the people) so hard with interrogatories of every particular that was proposed, that they wearied and tired them out: Demanding, how they could require to be allowed themselves to possess more than 500. acres a man; whereas the Commons had but two a piece divided amongst them? Whether that every one of them might in equity hold the lands well near, of 100. Citizens: and a Commoner to have hardly ground enough for to build him a necessary house upon, and to serve for a place to bury his dead? Also, whether their will and pleasure was, that the Commons oppressed with usury, should yield their bodies to bear irons and suffer torment, unless they paid the interest before the principal? And that daily by whol companies they should be had away from the bar, condemned to chuldomy, and Noble mens houses to become goals, filled and pestered with prisoners? And whereas ever a Plebeian dwelt there should be a private prison: These indignities and piteous matters to be heard, when they had with a load, were charged upon them, even before those that were afraid of the like measure themselves; with more indignation and disdain of all that heard them, than they themselves shewed in the uttering and delivery: But these Senators say they (and that they redoubled) will never make an end either of getting more land still into their hands, or spoiling and undoing the Commons with usury, until the Commons make once out of their body one Consul, for to be the maintainer and protector of their liberty. As for the Tribuns of the Commons, they were now just nothing let by: as who by their privilege of Inhibitions and negative voices, spoiled themselves and overthrew their own power. And never will there be any indifferent and equal course taken, so long as the Nobles keep the sovereign place of command, and the sword to strike whiles the poor Commons have only the buckler hand to ward all venues. For unless the government be parted between both alike, the Commons shall never have their due and equal portion in the Common-weal. Neither is it reason that any man should stand contented with this only, that in the Election of Consuls, the Commons are eligible and capable of the dignity: for in case, it be not concluded absolutely, that one Consul at the least should be of necessity a Commoner, there will never be any at all. Have ye forgotten already (say they) that notwithstanding an Act made, that there should be Tribuns Military created rather then Consuls, for this intent that Commoners might aspire and reach unto the chief place of honor; yet for all that in 44. years space, there was not so much as one of the Commoners chosen Tribun Military? And will any man believe that they will of their own accord confer upon the Commons (when otherwise they may chuse) that dignity in the disposing only of two places, who were ever wont in the making of Tribun Military, to take up eight rooms all wholly to themselves? And will they allow them a way into the Consulship, who thus long have held the (Consular) Tribunship so guarded, as no man might have access thither but themselves? Nay, it must be got by a positive law, which in their Assemblies for Election, by favour and grace might not be obtained. One of the Consuls rooms must be set aside, past all peradventure and question, and that for a Commoner, to enter into: For as much as if it stand still upon a choice, the mightier man will ever go away with the gaffe clear. And whereas heretofore they have been wont to alledge and say, That the Commons afforded not sufficient and able men to bear the offices of the chair and of state: that, now cannot be truly objected. For was the Common-weal, I pray you more slackly and negligently governed upon the (Consular) Tribunship of P. Licinius Calpurnius (who was the first Commoner that ever was made Tribun Military) than it was ruled for those years space, in which there was not a Tribun Military but of the Nobility? Nay, on the contrary side it will be justified that some of the Nobles were condemned after they were out of their Tribunship; and not one of the Commoners. And whereas for many years past, we began to make Questors or Treasurers out of the Commons, like as we did Tribuns Military, the people of Rome repented never of the choice of any one of them. It remaineth now, that the Commoners bear the office of Consuls too: That were a fortress of their liberty, that were a strength and sure hold to trust unto. If they were once come and kept to that degree, then may the people of Rome think assuredly and be persuaded

Sextius and Licinius against the Senators for the commons people.

"swaded, that the KK. are banished indeed our of the City, and their freedom fully establish"ed for ever to endure. For, from that day forward shall the Commons be partakers of all those "things, wherein the Nobles now surpass them: namely, sovereign rule and authority, martial
 "renown, parentage and Nobility: great ornaments doubtless, unto themselves to enjoy here in "this life: but far greater to leave behind them unto their Children and Posterity. These and such like Orations when they saw to be plausible, and willingly accepted, they preferred a new Statute, That in stead of the two Duumvirs for holy Ceremonies and matters of the Church, there might be chosen ten Decemvirs: Provided always, that one part of them should be created forth of the Commons, and another from among the Nobles. The Session for enacting of all those Laws, they deferred until the army was returned, which lay then at the siege before I Vellure.

But the year was come about and fully expired, before the legions were reduced home from thence: and by that means the whole business about these new Laws, hung still in suspense, and was put off unto the entrance of the new Tribuns Military. As for the Tribuns of the Commons, the Commonalty chose the same again, even those again who had been the proposers of those Laws. And the Tribuns Military were these, T. Quinctius, Ser. Cornelius, Ser. Sulpicius, Sp.
Servilius, L. Papirius, L. Venerius. Presently in the beginning of the year, they put unto the jump and final trial what should become of those Laws. And when as the Tribes were called, and none of the Tribuns Collegues stepped between to stop the proceeding of the Law-givers:
 the Nobles were afraid, and ran unto their two last helps, to wit, the highest and absolute office, and the greatest man among them. They thought it good therefore to create a Dictator.
 And M. Furius Camillus was nominated, who elected unto him L. Emilius for General of the horse. The Law-makers likewise for their part, against so great preparation of their adversaries, armed at all parts the cause of the Commons, with stout stomach and courageous heart. And having assembled in Hall of the Commons, they called forth the wards to give their voices. At what time the Dictator accompanied with a great train of Nobles, full of wrath and menacing frowns, took his place and set him down. And after the matter was canvassed first, by the ordinary conflict of the Tribuns among themselves, whiles some propounded, and others gain-said the Law with their negatives voices: and that by how much in right the prohibition was the stronger, so much it was overweighed in favour and affection both of the Laws, and Lawgivers: and when the first Tribes had given their voice (* Uirgana) affirmatively: then Camil- lus. For as much as (quoth he) O Quirites, ye are ruled now by the will and pleasure, and not by the authority of the Tribuns, and as in times past ye obtained the privilege of a negative voice and * Intercession by your departure and Secession, so now ye make it void and nothing worth, even by the same force that ye got it by: I, chosen Dictator as well for your sake as for the whole Common-wealth, will assult your privilege of Intercession, and by mine absolute authority maintain this your help and succour, now reversed and overthrown. If therefore C. Acutius and L.
Sextius, give place unto the negative voice and interceding of their fellows in Office: I will not in a meeting and assembly of the Commons, once intermeddle, nor bring in the authority, of a Magistrate of the Nobles: but if they shall go forward still (notwithstanding all prohibition) to impose and give Laws unto the City, as if it were won by conquest of the enemy, I will not suffer the Tribuns power by their own selves to be defaced and come to nothing. But (all these big words notwithstanding) when the Tribuns of the Commons made but a tush thereto, and went never the less forward with their enterprize, then Camillus throughly angered indeed, sent his Licitors and Sergeants to command the Commons to avoid the place and depart: Threatning withal, that if they proceeded thus, he would take a Military oath of all the younger people, and lead an army presently forth of the City. This put the Commons in a very great fright, but it set their Captains and Ring-leaders, rather in a greater heat of contention, than abated their courages one jot. And when he saw no relenting on either side, he gave up his office: Whether it were that there was some error in his creation (as some have written) or because the Tribuns of the Commons had put up a bill to the Commons, and they granted it: that if M. Furius (as Dictator) had proceeded to any action, he should have a round fine set on his head of 500000 * Asses, I know not certainly. But I beleeve that he was terrified upon some unlucky signs of the birds, rather then with any such strange Act never heard of before, and without precedent. And here-unto am I induced, both in regard of the disposition of the man, so well given and of so good conscience, and also for that P. Manlius was immediatly named Dictator in his stead. For to what end should Manlius have been created Dictator for that broil and stir, wherein M. Furius had raken the foil before? Again, seeing the same M. Furius was Dictator the next year following, doubte-less, he would never for shame have resumed that office: wherein the year before he had received the foil and disgrace, to be so overruled. Over and besides, at the same time when as this bill was supposed to have been preferred, concerning his fine, either he might have withstood it too, (whereby he saw himself to be bridled) or else he had not been able to have hindred so much as those, for which this also was proposed. Finally, it was never seen to this day wherein we live, so long as the Tribuns and Consuls with their factions and parts-taking have been at variance and debate with all their might and main, but evermore the authority of the Dictator controlled them all, and put them down.

Between the former Dictatorship of Camillus now resigned up, and the new by Manlius accep-

* 1250. (sterl).

A red and begun, there was an assembly of the Commons summoned by the Tribuns, in time as it were of a vacancy or Interreign: wherein the overture was made and evidently it was seen, which of the laws proposed the Commons liked better, and which the Law-givers. For those that concerned usury and land, they granted to pass; but that other of a Commoner to be Consul, they denied and dashed quite. And surely both matters had been dispatched fully and established at once, but that the Tribuns said directly, that they required the Commons, to give their voices and speak to all three directly together. After this, P. Manlius the Dictator favoured somewhat, and helped the cause of the Commons, by nominating out of the Commons for his General of horsemen, C. Licinius, who had been a Tribun Military before time. The Senators B stormed hereat, as I find in records. And the Dictator was wont to excuse the matter unto them, alledging for himself the near affinity and kindred that was between him and Licinius: saying also, that the dignity of the General of horsemen was no greater then of a Tribun Consular.
 Now when the election day was published for the Tribuns of the Commons, Licinius and Sextius so demeaned themselves, that by pretending that they would not any longer now continue in the office, they set the Commons on to be most earnest and hotly bent for that, which they under colour of refusal, desired and sought for. They seemed, forsooth, to alledge and say,
 "That for these nine years they had stood, as it were, in battel array, and affronted the States
 "and Nobles of the City, to the right great peril of themselves in privat, and to no good effect
 "at all in publick: and now together with them, both the laws proposed, and the whole strength C "of the Tribuns authority, were waxed old and decayed. At the first their Laws were crossed "by the interceding of their brethren Tribuns: afterwards by packing away the youth of the Ci"ty to the Velitern war: and last of all, the Dictators lightning flashed in their faces, and their
 "thunderbolts shot against them. "Now (say they) neither their fellow Tribuns withstood
 "them, nor forraign wars hindered them, nor yet the Dictator himself, as who for his part hath "given a good fore-tokening and presage of a Consul Commoner, in electing his General of "horsemen out of the Commons. The very Commons and none else, are they that hurt them"selves, and delay their owngoods. Who might presently if they would, have their City, their "common Hall, and place of assemblies freed from these Creditors: yea, and their grounds re"covered again from the unjust Land-lord: Which benefits and liberties, when are they like D "to weigh and esteem with thankful minds accordingly, if in the very time that they are to ac"cept the Laws devised for their own wealth and good, they cut off all hope of promotion and "honour, from the publishers and proposers thereof? For it standeth not with the modesty of "the people of Rome, to require to be eased themselves of Usury, and to be set in possession again
 "of the land, wrongfully withheld from them by the mighty men: and then to leave those old
 "Trib. by whose means they have come by those good commodities, to shift for themselves, not "only without honor, but also without all hope of honor. Let them first therefore set down with "themselves, and resolve, what they are minded to do: and afterwards in the election of Trib. de"clare the same openly. If they would be willing to speak affirmatively to those Laws, all jointly
 "as they were propounded, then there were some reason to chuse the same Trib. again: and then E "would they enact & establish finally that which they had published. But in case their wil was to "accept of that and no more than which served each privat mans turn then there was smal need
 "or none at all to have them stil in office, with the envy and grudging of so many. And to be short,
 "neither would they accept of the Tribunship any longer, neither should the Commons have "those Laws ratified, which were already granted. When as all the rest of the Senators were "struck into their dumps and blank, for the very indignity to see things thus go: At the last, one Appius Claudius Crassus (the nephew or son son of that notorious Appius the Decemvir) upon a malicious mind and fell stomach, as it is reported, rather then for any hope he had to dissuade the matter, stood up, and to this effect answered that so stout and peremptory speech of the Tribuns, in this manner. "It can be no strange matter to me, nor unlooked for, O Quirites, if that F "which hath been the only thing at all times objected by seditious Tribuns against our house, I
 "also should hear at this present: to wit, that the whole name and lineage of Claudius, have ever
 "from the first beginning, regarded nothing more in the Common-weal, than the Majesty and "honor of the Senators and the Nobles, and always set and opposed themselves against the good "and well-fare of the Commons. Of which two challenges, the one I neither can, nor will deny
 "and disavow: namely, that we, since the first time that we were enfranchised Citizens, and ther-
 "with at once taken into the number of Senators, have endeavoured and strained our selves, that "it might be said, and that truly, that the honor and dignity of that state and degree, into which "it was your good pleasure we should be incorporate, and graced with, was by us augmented,
 "rather then impaired. And as for the other challenge, this I dare be bold, in mine own behalf, G "and in the name of my ancestors and progenitors, to aver, O Quirites, that (unless a man would "think whatsoever is done for the Weal-publick generally, is directly against the Commons, as "if they were meer aliens of another City) we to our knowledge have practised nothing, witting
 "and willing, either while we lived privat, or during the time we bare office, prejudiciall to "commonalty: and that neither in deed nor word we can be justly charged to have wrought and "contrived any thing contrary to your good: although peradventure somewhat hath fallen out
 "cross against your will and mind. But were I not a Claudius, and of that family, nor descended
 "of noble blood, but some one of the Burgeses or Citizens: and knew my self to be but free born, born, both by father and mother, and to live in a free City: could I (think ye) hold my tongue? but frankly speak and say, that these perpetual Tribuns (God save all) L. Sextius, and C. Licinius—

I mean, have for nine years (for so long they have played Rex) taken so much upon them, and been so bold as to say they will not permit you to have free voices, neither in solemn assemblies for elections, nor in Sessions and Parliaments for allowing and ordaining Laws? Upon condition (quoth one of them) you shall make us Tribuns again the tenth time. What is this else but to say? That, which other sue for, we so scorn and disdain, that accept of it we will not, without good hire and recompence. And what reward and consideration is this, good Sirs, for which we may have your Worships, our ever Tribuns? Marry (quoth he) that ye will accept jointly together and at once, all our laws, whether they like you or dislike you: whether they be good or whole, or bad and noisome. Now I beseech you good Tarquins (Tribuns of the Commons I would have said) imagin I were one of the ordinary Citizens, and should from out of the multitude assembled, speak out and say: Pleaseth it your good grace, Sir, that out of these laws propounded, we may chuse those that we think good and whole for us, and refuse and disanul the rest. [O (quoth he) that may not be. Thou mayst allow, belike, and ordain, concerning usury, concerning lands, which tend to the commodity of you all. But now beware of bugs. This monstrous and portentous wonder must in no case be permitted in Rome, that thou shouldst see L. Sextius, and this perillous fellow C. Licinius to be Consuls, which thy heart riseth at, and which goeth against thy stomack. Nay, nay, either accept of all, or I will propound none at all.] This is all one, as if a man should give him that is hunger-bitten, and ready to starve, poyson and meat together: and bid him either forbear the whole food to preserve his life, or else to take the deadly bane to hasten his death. But if this were a free State indeed, would not many a one have cried out and said, Avant you and your Tribunships, out upon you with your laws. What Sir? How if your Mastership will not put up and prefer that which is commodious and profitable for the people to accept: is there none, think you besides that will propound it? If any Nobleman, or if any Claudius (which they take to be more odious) should thus say, Either take all, or I will propose none at all. Which of you, Quirites, would endure it? why? will ye never regard the substance more then the person; the matter rather then the man? But all is well taken and heard quickly, which that magistrate shall say. And wil ye always hear with the wrong or deaf ear, whatsoever any of us shall hap to speak? Well, the words are paught, and the speech (without question) very uncivil and rude. Now let us see what manner of law it is, that they storm so at, because by you it is rejected. In good faith, O Quirites, much like unto their language. This I require (quoth he) that it might not be lawful for you to make Coss, whom ye wil. For what else demandeth he, who would have it enacted by expresse terms, that one at least of the Coss, must be a Commoner of Necessity, and leaveth it not unto your choice to make two Noblemen Coss. If we had wars at this day, such as sometime the Tuscan war was, when Porfena was master of the Janicle and kept that piece against us; or such as the Gauls war of late days was, when the enemies were LL and possessed of all the City here, but the Capitol and fortress only, let case, that L. Sextius should be prickt and propounded either with this M. Furius here in place, or with any one other of the Nobles, and stand to be Coss, would ye abide that Sextius should be undoubtedly Coss, and Camillus at devotion and in hazard to take repulse? Is this indeed to bestow your dignities indifferently with even and equal hand? That two of the Commons, forsooth, may be elected Consuls, and not two likewise of the Nobles? And that one of them must needs perforce be created out of the Com. and in the election of both, the Nobles may be overslipped? What society is this, what community and participation? Wil not this serve thy turn and content thee, that wherein thou hadst no title nor interest afore, thou shouldst now have thy part: unless in seeking to have a portion, thou pluck all unto thy self? I fear me (quoth he) if both Consuls might be made of the Nobility, ye would chuse none at all of the Commonalty. What is this else but to say? Because willingly of your selves, ye would not chuse unworthy persons and unmeet, I wil bind you therefore of necessity, to elect those whom otherwise ye would pass by. And what followeth hereupon but this, that the Commoner who standeth with two Patriti, may plainly say, and that truly, he is not by voices chosen, but by vertue of a law, and so acknowledg no benefit received of the people, nor be beholden at all to them, for their grace and favour? Thus seek they, means to wring your dignities from you, and not the way to sue for them: and would so obtain the greatest, as that they might not be obliged & bound unto you for the least: and had rather get honours and offices by advantage taking and cunning sleights, then by their own vertue, desert, and worthiness. But there is some one that scorneth to be pried and looked into, and to be considered as he deserveth: who thinks it meet, that he alone among the other Competitors, that contest and stand in suit, should be sure of offices and promotions, and will not submit himself to your censure: who would have your suffrages, of voluntary to be constrained: of free, to be thrall and servil, I speak not of Licinius and Sextius: whose years of their continual government ye reckon upon, and mark up in the Capitol, as they used sometime, to count the years of the Kings reign. But what is he this day in the City, of so base, so abject and low condition, that by the advantage and benefit of this law, hath not easier access to a Consulship than we and our children have? As for us truly, ye may sometime mis of husing us, would you never so fain: but for them ye must needs, yea, though full against your mind. And thus much concerning the indignity and

A "and unworthiness of the thing: For, dignity and worthiness, I take, to be matters properly to men pertaining. What shall I speak now of Religions, and of the solemnity of the Auspices, which imply a meer contempt and injury done to the immortal gods? Who knoweth not, that by the approbation of the gods, testified by flight of birds, this City was first founded? that by the same Auspices, all hath been ordered and directed, as well in war abroad, as in peace at home? And who be they that have to do with these tokens and prelages, by ancient custom and tradition from our forefathers? Forsooth even the Nobles and none else. As for the Magistrates of the Commons, none are chosen with regard of flight, sight, and feeding of the birds. But to us, they do so properly belong, that not only those Magistrates of the Nobles, which B the people create, they do not otherwise elect but by observation of the birds; but we also our selves, without the assent and voice of the people, do nominate an Interrex by means of the birds: yea, and in the private actions of our life, we are guided by them at home, which these Commons use not in their very offices. What then meaneth he else, but to take these Auspicia out of the City, who by creating Commoners to be Consuls, depriveth the Nobles thereof, who only may have and use them? Now let them mock on and scoff at our religions. Let them deride our Ceremonies. What makes matter (say they) if those pullets peck or eat not? What if they come somewhat late out of their coop or cage? What if a bird sing ank or crow crofs and contrary? How then? A great piece of matter surely. Small things, I confess they be: but as small as they are, our ancestors by not contemning them, have brought this C. W. to a flourishing state. And we now adays, as if we stood not in need of the grace and favour of God, C pollure all holy rites and ceremonies. And therefore let our prelats and high Priests, our Augurs, and King at sacrifices be created (it skilleth not how) even out of the common multitude: Let us set upon any mans head (it matters not whose, so he come in likeness of a man) the Mitre of Jupiter his Flamin, Let us commit the keeping of the Anciles or heavenly shields, and the secret sanctuaries: let us commit the gods themselves and the charge of their holy service to those, unto whom we may not lawfully nor without impiety. Let no lawes be published nor Magistrates created solemnly, with regard of birds at all, and of the wil of the gods. Nor in the Centuriate assemblies holden by degrees, and Curiat-meetings by the wards and parishes; let not the Senators be Presidents and have their authority and royal assent. Let Sextius and Licinus, like Romulus and Tatius reign together, as fellow KK, in the City of Rome, because they D give away so freely, the monies, lands and territories from others. So sweet and favori it is to prey upon other mens goods. Never consider they, nor look so far into the matter, that by one of these goodly laws, our fields will be desart and waste, by ejecting and dispossessing the right-ful land-lords: and by the other, all credit in borrowing and lending, in taking and putting forth of money shal be abolished. And then farewell all humane society, commerce and intercourse whatsoever. In these respects therefore, thus I conclude, and would counsel you, in any wise to stop, frustrate and disanul the overture and proceeding of these laws: and in so doing, I pray God blefs and speed you wel. This Oration of Appius thus far only prevailed, that the time of publication of these Acts, was cut off and deferred. But the same Tribuns Sextius and Licinus, being chosen again the tenth time, propounded this law and had it enacted, That of the E Decemvirs for divine service and Church matters, some should be created of the Commons: So, five of them were of the Nobles, and five of the Commoners: whereby they seemed to have gained already one good step onward unto the Consulship.

The Decemvirs created.

The Commons contenting themselves with this victory, yielded unto the Senators, that for the present without any mentioning of Consuls, there should be elected Tribuns Military. So there were created A. and M. Cornelius the second time, M. Geganus, P. Manlius, L. Veturius and P. Valerius the sixth time. At what time, when as (but for the siege of Velitæ, which was like to be for service a long piece of work, rather then for issue, doubtful in the end) the Romans were at rest for any forraign troubles, the sudden and unlooked-for news of the Gauls war, drave the City to chuse M. Furius Dictator the fifth time: who took unto him for his General of the horse- F men, T. Quintius Pennus. Claudius writeth, that this year the Gauls were fought with, about the river Anio: and that there was that noble combat upon the bridge, in which, T. Manlius in the fight of both armies slew in single fight a Gaul that had challenged him and given defiance, and despoiled him of his collar of gold. But there be more writers that induce me to beleieve, that this exploit was performed ten years after: and that in this year the Gauls had a battel given them by M. Furius Dictator, in the Albans land: where the Romans had neither doubtful nor dangerous victory, although the French made them afraid at first in remembrance of their former overthrow. Many thousands of this barbarous nation were slain in field, many also fell upon the sword in their camp after it was won. Some were scattered and fled, and those most (who took the way to G Apulia) saved themselves from the enemy, both by flying so far, and also for that upon fear they were so distracted and parted one from another. The Senators and Commons agreed and made a decree, that the Dictator should triumph. Who scarcely had made an end of that war, but he was welcomed home with a more hotter and more dangerous Sedition within the City. For after many sharp bickerings and contentions, the Dictator and Senat both, were overmatched and overcome, yea, and forced to accept the Tribuns laws aforesaid. And also in despite of the Nobility and do what they could, there was an assembly held for election of Consuls: in which L. Sextius was created Consul, the first Commoner that ever sat in Consuls chair. But the broils

L. Sextius, the first Commoner that was chosen Consul, said staid not there. For, by reason that the Nobles denied to approve & give assent thereto, the matter was like to grow unto a Secession and general departure of the Commons; yea, and to other fearful terms and perilous threats of civil wars and intestine troubles. Howbeit, by means of the Dictator, the flames were quenched and the discords appeased, upon these capitulations. Imprimis, that the Nobility should accord unto the Commons, to have one Consul from among themselves. Item, that the common people should be content that the Nobles might out of the Patres create a Pretor or Lord-chief Justice for oyer and determiner in causes within the City. Thus when after long anger the two states of the City were grown to unity and concord, the Senat thinking it a worthy matter (& good cause they had verily as ever any time before) willingly determined, for the honour of the immortal gods, to set out those most stately [Roman] playes. And whereas before they had continued but three daies, to add one more, and to celebrate them full four. And when the Ediles of the Commons refused that charge & excused themselves, the younger Gentlemen of the Nobility cried all with one voice, That they would most gladly do that service and honor to the immortal gods, so as they might be made Ediles for that purpose. Thanked they were generally of all hands; and the Senat made a decree, That the Dictator should propose unto the people, that two men of the Nobility might be Ediles, and that in all the Assemblies and Elections for that year, whatsoever passed, should be ratified by the soveraign assent of the Senators.

The Seventh Book

Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the Seventh Book.

TWO new officers of State, to wit, the Pretorship and Edileship of the Chambers were adjoined to the rest. The City was sore visited with the pestilence: which was more noted by reason of Furius Camillus who died therein. The remedy and end whereof, whiles they sought to procure by bringing in new and strange Religions, at length they devised stage-playes, which then first were set forth. M. Pomponius a Tribun of the Commons, arrested L. Manlius for his exceeding rigour in taking muster of souldiers: and for confining and hardly intreating his own son, T. Manlius, for no crime or hainous offence. And the young man himself, whose confining and misusage was laid unto his fathers charge, entred the bed-chamber of the said Tribun, drew his Skean and forced him to swear unto him, that he would let fall his suit and proceed no further. Then all mischiefs intended, were laid apart and had an end. Curtius armed at all pieces, mounted upon a Courser, rode headlong into the wide gaping chink or gulf within the City of Rome, and so it presently filled up again. The same young Manlius, who had freed his father from the troubles of the Tribun, entred into combat with a French-man, that challenged any one of the Roman Souldiers to single fight, slew him, took from him his collar of Gold, which he ware about his neck afterwards himselfe, and thereof was called Torquatus. Two Tribes more were added, Pontina and Publicia. Licinius Stolo was condemned by a law of his own making, because he held in possession more then five hundred Acres of ground. M. Valerius a Colonel of one thousand foot, killed a Gaul, who challenged him to fight: and that, by the means and help of a Raven that settled upon his Morion, and with talions and bill annoyed his enemy, and thereupon was he named Corvinus. For which vertue and valorous Act, he was the year next following created Consul, being not full three and twenty years old. Amity was concluded with the Cartaginians. The Campaignes being warred upon by the Samnites, craved aid of the Senat against them: and when they could not speed, yielded their City and Territory to the people of Rome. Whereupon it was thought good, seeing both they and theirs, were now become proprietary to the people of Rome, that they should be defended by force of arms against the Samnites. When A. Cornelius the Consul, had led his host into a place of disadvantage and was in great peril, he was by the industrious service of P. Decius a Colonel saved: who having gained the hill top, which commanded the ridge, whereon the Samnites lay encamped, gave the Consul opportunity to escape and pass into a plain ground: and himself, notwithstanding he was environed by the enemy, brake through them, and gat away. The Roman souldiers left in garrison at Capua, having conspired to keep the City to their own beboof, were detected and their plot disclosed: and for fear of punishment, revolted from the people of Rome contrary to their allegiance: but by the policy and wisdom of M. Corvinus, they were reclaimed from their outrage, and restored again to their countrey. Moreover, this book containeth the fortunate wars against the Hernicks, Gauls, Tyburts, Priveratis, Tarquiniensians, Samnites, and Volsicians.

The seventh Book of T. Livius.

Here ensueth a year of especial note and mark, for the Consulship of a man newly risen: also for two new offices, the Pretorship and Aedileship of the Chair. Both which dignities, they of the Nobility purchased to themselves in lieu of granting to the Commons one place of the two Consuls. The Commons bestowed the Consulship upon L. Sextius for his good service, in propounding the law; whereby that promotion was first obtained. The Nobles conferred the Pretorship upon Sp. Furius Camillus the son of Marcus: and the Aedileship upon Cn. Quintus Capitolinus, and P. Cornelius Scipio, personages of their own order and degree: So grations were they with the people in Marshall. L. Sextius had companion with him in government, L. Aemilius Mamercus one of the Senators. In the beginning of the year, much debate there was and hard hold, both as well about the Gauls, who at the first ranged abroad over all Apulia, and were now (as the report went) gathered together: as also concerning the Rebellion of the Hernicks. But all matters being put off on purpose, until a further time, because nothing should be done by this new Consul a Commoner, all things were still and quiet, as if it had been vacation or Non-term: this only excepted, that the Tribuns muttered and could not endure with patience, that for one Consul of the Commons, the Nobility had got to themselves three Magistrats, all of the Patritii, sitting like Consuls, with their purpled and purpled long Robes in Ivory chairs of estate. And as for the Pretor besides, as L. chief Justice to hear and decide causes, he was fellow with the Consuls, and with the same Auspices and authority created. Hereupon the Senat was abashed to be instant and to enforce that Aediles of the chair should be chosen out of the Nobility. And first it was agreed amongst them, that every second year they should be elected forth of the Commons: Afterwards, indifferently one with another in common, without that regard. Now when L. Genucius and Q. Servilius were Coss. and all at good rest for any home-sedition or forrain war: behold, lest they should at any time be void of care and danger, there began a great plague: In which died, as men say, one Censor, one Aedile Curule, three Tribuns of the Commons: besides, many a dead corps from among the multitude, was carried forth, proportionable to the rest. But above all, the bitter death of Camillus and much lamented (notwithstanding the long and goodly time he had in this life) caused this pestilence to be much spoken of and remembered. For he was (in truth) the only person in all fortune both of prosperity and adversity, as well in peace as war: a rare and singular man before his banishment, and during the same more famous and renowned: either in regard that the City had a miss of him, and being taken by the enemy in his absence sought unto him for his help; or in respect of his happiness, in that together with his own restitution home, he therewith restored his natural country. And after this, for 25 years space (for so long he lived afterwards) he bare himself answerable to the title of so great glory: accounted worthy to be surnamed and reputed a second founder after Romulus, of the City of Rome. All this year long and the next which followed, when T. Sulpitius Peticus, and C. Licinius Stolo were Consuls, the sickness continued. By reason whereof, nothing was done worth remembrance, but that for to obtain the mercy and grace of the Gods, there was a Lædister solemnized, which was the third since the City was first founded. But when by no device, of man, nor help of the Gods, the violence of the sickness asswaged; their minds and consciences were so possessed with superstition, that among other pacifications and appeasings of the heavenly ire, the stage-plays (a strange and new device for a warlike and martial people, who afore time used only to behold the solemn games and feats of strength and activity, in the great Lists or Race called Circus) were (as men say) first begun and ordained. But (as all beginnings lightly are) a small thing (God wot) it was at first: without song and metre, without gesture and action futable unto song and verse, and the same also meer outlandish. For the players, who were sent for out of Hetruria, as they danced the measures to the minstrel and sound of flute, gestured not undecently withal, after the Tuscan fashion. But in process of time the youth began to imitate and counterfeit them, jesting pleasantly besides one with another, and singing in rude rimes and disordered metre: and their gesture was sorting with their jests and ditties. Thus was this thing first taken up, and thus with much use and often exercise, practised. And hereupon our own Country Actors and artificers professors of this feat, were called Histriones, of Hister a Tuscan word, which signifieth a player or dancer. But these uttered not (as they used afore time) in their turns one after another, disordered, confused, and rude verses, like to the loose and bawdy Fescenine rimes: but went through and rehearsed out, whole Satyrs, full of musical measures, with a set concert of song also, to the instrument of the minstrel, and with gesture agreeable thereunto. Certain years after, Livius, who was the first that after the use of Satyrs, ventured to set forth an Enterlude, of some one argument and uniform matter, is reported to have been himself (as they were all no doubt in those dayes) the Author and Actor both, of his own verses and songs: But being so often called on by the people to play, that he became hoarse again, and lost his voyce, he gat leave to set a boy to sing before the minstrels. And so being silent himself, he acted the song with more agility and nimbleness of motion a good deal: for, not employing his voyce, he had no hindrance of liberty in gesture. Then began the players to have others to sing, and they themselves used their voyces only in acting their parts in Comedies dialogue-

wife. After that, by this order taken and Law of Playes, they came from laughter and pleasant conceited Mirth, and that this pastime and sport turned by litle and litle to a methodical Art and profession: Then the youth leaving to Comedians, the acting of parts in Enterludes, began after the old manner to let flye, one at another, merry scoffs and jells, interlaced within their time and meeter, which thereupon were afterwards called Exodia, and were inserted commonly in the Atellan Comedies. Which kind of sport, the youth learned first of the Osci: and having once taken it up, they held it still, and would not suffer it to be distayned and dishonested by common players. And hereof cometh it, that the Actors in the Atellane Interludes were neither displaced out of their own tribe, nor made Ætarii, but served in the wars, and have the Cities pay, as if they were not base Comedians, and Professors of infamous players craft. Thus have I thought good, among the small beginnings of other things, to set down the Original of Stage-players also: that it may appear, that the thing arising from a considerate entrance, is grown now to this foolery and excessive sumptuousness, as hardly can be defrayed by most rich and wealthy Kingdoms. And yet these players at first, employed about a religious business, neither rid mens minds of scruple and superstition, nor eased their bodies one jot of sickness. But rather, when by occasion of an overflow and inundation of the Tyber, the Circus or Theatre was drowned, and their plays in the very midst hindred and interrupted, this occurrent mightily troubled and affrighted them, as if the Gods had turned away their face and countenance, and rejected all their endeavours in these appeasings of their wrath and indignation. Therefore in the time that Cn. Genucius, and Emilius Mamercus were Consuls the second time, when mens minds were busied and troubled more in seeking means to pacify the wrath of the Gods, than their bodies vexed with diseases; the elder sort and grand signiors called to mind that in old time there was a plague asswaged and gave over, by the driving and fastning of a spike or great nail by the Dictator. The Senat upon a religious devotion perswaded herewith, caused a Dictator to be created, for to fasten the nail aforesaid. And there being chosen L. Manlius Imperiosus, he nominated for his General of Horsemen, L. Pinarius. There is an old law written with ancient letters, and in antique words, That the chief Pretor for the time being, should in the Ides of September drive a spike or nail. Well, a nail was driven, and stuck fast on the right side of the Temple of Jupiter Optimus Maximus, on that hand where as Minerva Chappel standeth. That nail, because in those dayes there was but little writing shewed, as they say, the number of the years. And thereupon that Law was set up in Minervaes Church, for that Minerva was the inventress of numbring. And Cintius a diligent writer of such monuments, and a studious Antiquary, affirmeth, That at Volturni there stuck such spikes to be seen in the Temple of Nortia, a goddess among the Tuscans, to quote and represent the number of the years. Now, as concerning the Temple of Jupiter Optimus Maximus, M. Horatius the Consul (by an act in that behalf provided) dedicated it, the year next ensuing the expulsion of the Kings. Afterwards, the solemn manner and custome of fastning a nail, was transferred from the Consuls to the Dictators, as to the greater and more absolute Magistracy. And in process of time, this custome being discontinued, it was thought a thing in it self worthy, for which a Dictator should be created.

L. Manlius being elected [as is above said] for this cause, as if he had been called to that dignity for some war, and not to free the people from their scruple of conscience: and intending himself war against the Hermicks, plagued the youth with a grievous muster: until at length all the Tribuns of the Commons taking against him, opposed themselves: and were it by force, or for very shame, he relented, and resigned up his room. Nevertheless, in the entrance of the year next following, when Q. Servilius Hala, and L. Genucius the second time were Consuls, M. Pomponius a Tribun of the Commons arrested Manlius. His cruelty in taking of the musters was odious, not only for the loss and damage that the citizens sustained thereby, but also for tearing and mangling their bodies, partly by scourging them with rods, who answered not to their name, and partly clapping irons upon them in prison. But above all, his own cruel disposition by nature was hateful, and the surname (Imperiosus) offensive, especially to a free City. This name he got by plain shew of his cruelty, exercised no less upon his neere friends and kinsfolk, yea, and his very own blood, than upon strangers. For amongst other matters, the Tribun laid sore to his charge, that having a young man to his son, detected of no lewdness and dishonest life, him he had banished (as it were) out of the City, from his house and home, debarred from the common Hall and open sight of men, from the company of his mates and companions, set him to drudgery and servil work, and betaken him as it were, into a prison and house of correction: where, a Dictator his son a young Gentleman highly defended, by this daily misery of his, was taught to know, that he had indeed a Lordly and imperious Sir, to his father. "And for what great offence, I pray you? Because he was not so fair spoken, nor all the readiest with his tongue. Which infirmity and defect of nature, ought not a father to have born withal and cloaked (if there had been any goodness, any common humanity in him) rather than to punish it, and by rough handling, and sharp usage, to make it more known and notorious? Why? even the very brute beasts, if it chance that any of their breed or young ones prove but untowardly, feed and cherish them still nevertheless. But as for this L. Manlius, he augmenteth one inconvenience and default in his son, with another: whom being but soft and slow of nature, he keepeth down the more: and that litle life and small metal that is in him, he goeth about to quench and dull at once by this peasants life and rustical usage, and conversing amongst the cattel and beasts. L. Manlius Imperiosus.

A These bitter complaints and accusations moved the patience, and stirred the stomachs of every man else, sooner than the young man himself. Whose contrary wife was grieved in his mind, that he should be a cause of his fathers troubles, thus to incur the ill will and obloquy of the people. And that all the World, both Heaven and Earth might know, that he desired rather to succour and help his father, than to assist his adversaries and seek, he smothered into a course becoming and bewraying (I must needs say) a rude and rusticall mind. Which, although it sayd nothing of Civility, yet for his kindness and dutifull piety to his father, deserveth commendation. One morning betimes he gets him up, and unknown to every one of the house, with a good skein stole by his side, to the City he goes; and from the gate straight wayes directly to M. Pomponius the Tribun his house. Here he knockes the Porter, that he must needs speak with his Master out of hand, willing him to let him understand, that T. Manlius the son of Lucius was there. And being immediately let in, (for the Tribun hoped, that the son was throughly acquainted with his father, and brought new complaints, and one matter or other against him, or some devise and overture, how to proceed in the commenced Action) and T. Manlius passed to and fro between the Tribun and him, he said, that he was to talk with him upon one of Almens tidings. So the room being voided, and all commanded to depart far enough out of the way, he draweth out his skein, and leaping aloft upon the bed, stood there, and held it full bent against him, and threatned presently to give him the stab, unless he would swear the oath he should tender unto him, namely never to call an Assembly or Hall of the Commons together about his fathers indictment, or impanel a Jury against him.

C The Tribun affrighted (seeing the naked weapon glittering before his face, himself all alone and unarmed, the other a tall and lusty young fellow, and, that which was as much to be feared as the rest, fool-hardy, and presuming upon his strength) took the oath in that form as he put it unto him. And afterwards he gave it out plainly and confessed (for his excuse) that by this means he was forced in spite of his heart, to cease his suit, and give over his enterprise. But the Com-mops were not so much offended at the sons, forgiving such an adventure in his fathers quarrel: but they could have been more contented and better pleased, that it had been in their power to have passed their voyces, for the condemnation of so cruel and proud a prisoner, as they had under their hands. And the more praise worthy was this design of the son, because so great rigor of the father, wrought no alienation at all in his heart, from the affectionate duty that he owed unto him. So not only the father escaped his arraignment, but this action of the young man turned to his own honour and preferment. For whereas, this year it was first ordained, that the Tribuns or Colonels should be chosen by voyces of the legionary souldiers (for aforesaid, as at this day, the Generals themselves made them, whom they call Præfatus) in six places (for so many were elected) he obtained the second room: and that, in regard of no desert otherwise, either at home or abroad, which might win him this favour, as who had spent his youth in the country altogether, far from the civil society of men.

The kindness of T. Manlius to his father.

* A Tribun in a Legion, called Chiliarchus, i. a Colonel or leader of a 1000 [foot-men]

The same year, by earth-quake or some other forcible violence, the common place called Forum, clave and opened wide, welnear in the mids, and sink down to an exceeding depth: neither could that chink or pit be filled up, by casting in of earth (notwithstanding every man laboured and brought what he could) before that they began to enquire, according as they were admonished by the divine Oracles, what it might be, wherein the most puissance and greatness of the people of Rome consisted. (For the wisards prophesied, That if they would have the state of Rome to remain sure for ever, they should dedicate and offer it, whatsoever it was, unto that place.) And when they were in doubt what this should be, it is reported, that M. Curtius, a right hardy knight and martial young Gentleman, rebuked them therefore, because they doubted whether the Romans had any earthly thing better than armour and valor. Morewith, after silence made, he lift up his eyes, and beheld the Temples of the immortal Gods, situate neere to the Forum, and the Capitol likewise; and stretching forth his hands, one while toward Heaven, another while to the gaping chinks and gulf in the earth, toward the infernal spirits beneath, he offered and devoted himself to assured death. And mounting upon a brave courser, as richly trapped and set out, as possibly he could devise, armed as he was at all pieces, he leapt Horse and man and all into the hole. The people, both men and women, threw in after him sundry gifts and oblations, and fruits of the earth in great plenty. The place was after called Curtius Læcus, of his name, and not of that Curtius Metius in the old time, who was a souldier under Tiberius Tatius. If I could by any means search out the truth, I would not spare for any pains in that behalf. But now seeing that by reason of antiquity the certainty is not fully known, we must go by the common voyce and report of men. And verily the name of the lake is more renowned and noble by occasion of this later and fresher tale, than the other.

M. Curtius his valor and resolution.

Curtius Læcus.

After the expiation of so great and prodigious a wonder, much consultation there was in the Senate that year, as concerning the Hernicks, for having sent their Heralds unto them for restoration of harms done, but to no effect; they determined with all convenient speed to propose unto the people, for to proclaim war against the Hernicks, and bid them defiance. The people generally with one voyce liked thereof, and approved it. The charge of that service and exploit fell to L. Genucius his lot, to undertake. Now for that he was the first Consul of the Commons that by his own auspices and conduct should manage war, the City was in great expectation of the sequel and issue: and according to the event that should fall out, good or bad in this journey, they were to judge, whether they had done well or amiss to communicat these dignities with the Commons.

Consul slain.

But it fortuned so that Genucius being with great preparation and power set forth against the enemies, was entrapped by an Ambuscado, his legions upon a sudden fear unlooked for defeated; himself (the Consul) environed round about, and slain by them, that will not whom they slew. Which tidings being brought to Rome, the Senators were not so pensive and sorrowful for the common calamity, as they fumed and took on most insolently, for this unhappy expedition and conduct of the Commoner Consul: and muttered in all places these and such like speeches: "Now let them go and create Consuls again out of the commonalty, and translate the Auspicia whither they ought not. What? Because the Senators by an Act of the Commons, might be defeated and dispossessed of their dignities, could so inauspicate and irreligious a law prevail likewise against the Gods immortal? Who now themselves have taken the matter into their own hands, and maintained their power, their deity and Auspices: which were not so soon meddled withal, and polluted by one that had no right thereto, nor lawful title, but both the whole army, and Captain also, were vanquished and overthrown: to teach them for ever hereafter, how they make their solemn Elections of Magistrats confusedly, without regard of the rights and royalties of noble houses. These speeches both Council-House and common place rung again withal. So the Consul Servilius with consent of the Nobles, named for Dictator Appius Claudius, who had aforetime in an Oration before the whole assembly of the Commons, disavowed the proceeding of that law; and now with greater authority blamed the mishap of that counsel, which was by him disliked and reprov'd. A muster was proclaimed, and a publick Vacation. But before that the Dictator and these new enrolled legions were gone as far as the Hernicks confines, the other army under the leading of C. Sulpitius the Lieutenant, by occasion of an occurrent that fell out there, got a good hand against their enemies. For when as upon the death of the Consul, the Hernicks advanced in scornful and contemptuous manner, close under the camp of the Romans, with a full hope to be masters of the same; behold, what with the exhortation of the Lieutenant, and what for anger and indignity, wherewith the souldiers stomachs were full, they made a sally out against them. Whereupon the Hernicks came so far short of their accompt, that they had no hope to assail, no, nor approach the rampier: and so in disaray they dismarched and departed. Afterwards by the coming in of the Dictator with a fresh power, the old army was reinforced double. The Dictator in a solemn audience, having praised the Lieutenant and his souldiers for defending their rents so manfully, both encouraged them, that heard themselves so highly commended according to their deserts, and also whetted on the rest to perform the like valorous service. The enemies on the other side were nothing slack to prepare themselves to fight again: who in remembrance of the honour they had already won, albeit they were not ignorant that the Romans forces were redoubled, encreased their own power also. For the whole Nation of the Hernicks, even as many as were able to draw sword, were called forth to the wars. Eight cohorts by themselves consisting of four hundred in a band were enrolled, even the most able and choice men of all others. This elect and especial flour of their youth and manhood, they fed with hope and encouraged the more to this service, because they had taken order they should have double pay. Freed they were besides from all other labour and Military toil, that being thus reserved to intend the fight and nothing else, they should make reckoning and know, that they were to indeavour and strain themselves above the ordinary carriage of souldiers. Placed also they were in the battel, apart from the other ranks: to the end their valour and manhood might be more seen and marked. Between both camps of the Romans and Hernicks, there was a plain of two miles in length: and there in the mid way in a manner, was the battel fought. First, the fight was doubtful on both sides, whiles the Roman Horsemen charged and recharged again; but ever in vain, to see if they could break their battalions. Thus when the service on Horseback, proved less in effect than in attempt, they asked the advice and craved leave of the Dictator: which being granted, they abandoned their Horses, and with a mighty shout, ran forth before the ensigns, and renewed the battel afresh. Neither could they have been any longer endured, but that those extraordinary bands opposed themselves, and received them with equal might of body and valour of heart. Then was the fight maintained between the brave youth and principal flour of both nations. And look what slaughter there was by common hazard of war, as well of the one side as of the other, the loss was greater for the quality of the persons, than the proportion of the number. For the rest of the common souldiers, as if they had shifted from themselves the whole conflict, and betaken it to the vanguard only, reposed their own event and hap in the manhood of others. Many a man on both parts was smitten down and dyed in the place, but more were hurt and wounded. "At last, those Horsemen that dismounted, fell to call and rebuke one another, asking what hope remained else besides? If neither on horseback they were able to drive the enemies back, nor on foot force them to give ground and remove them, what third kind of service looked they for? Why leapt they out so lustily and bravely into the forefront before the ensigns? and fought in the place of others? With these words provoking one another, they pluckt up their hearts, and with a fresh shout set foot forward and gave a new charge. First, they compelled the enemies to retreat and lose their standing: then to give more ground: and at length plainly to turn their back and run away. Hard it is to say, being so equally and indifferently matched as they were, what it was that turned the ballance and gave the victory: unless it were the perpetual fortune that ever followed both nations, able to advance the spirit and courage of the one, and to daunt and abate the hearts of the other. The Romans had the Hernicks in chase, all the way long, so far as to their camp: but because

A because it was far in the evening, they staid from assailing it. For by reason that it was long ere the Dictator could by sacrifice gather any assured token of Gods favour, he sounded not the bat-tel before noon: whereby it continued until night. The morrow after, were the Hernicks fled and their camp abandoned: only some hurt and wounded souldiers were found left behind. But one troup of them that forsook their ensigns (when as neer unto their walls and sorts their banners were discovered, slenderly accompanied, and with few about them) was scattered abroad over the fields, and in great fear stragled all about, and shamefully fled away. And yet this victory of the Romans cost them well the setting on, and spent some blood: for they lost a fourth part of their men: and that which was no small damage unto them, some of the Roman Horsemen also were

B slain.

The next year following, when C. Sulphur and C. Licinius Calvus the Consuls, were gone with a power against the Hernicks, and finding not the enemy abroad in the country, had by force won Forestinum: a Town of theirs: in their return homeward, the Tyburts kept their gates shut against them. And after many complaints and unkindnesses ripped up between them: this last quarrel was it, that moved the Romans by their Heralds (after restitution and amends demanded) to send defiance, and proclaim war against the people of Tybur. That Titus Quintius Pennus was Dictator that year, and Serg. Cornelius Maluginensis General of his Horsemen, it is agreed upon by all authors. Maecur Licinius writeth that he was created for the holding of an assembly for Election of Magistrates, and that, by the Consul Licinius: because when his fellow Consul made hast to have the Election before the war, thereby to continue his own Consulship, it was thought

C good to withstand and meet with his naughty desire in that behalf. But Licinius [Maecur] in usurping to his name and family, that praise and commendation, maketh himself to be of less credit in writing of the rest: especially, seeing that in none of the old records, I find mention of any such matter. Mine own mind giveth me rather, that the Dictator was created because of the Gauls tumultuous war. For certainly that year they encamped themselves three miles from Rome, beyond the bridge of Anio, in the way *Sala-*ia. The Dictator having proclaimed a Vacation, because of these troubles of the Gauls, received the Military oath of all the younger sort: and with a puissant army departed the City, and upon the very bank on this side of Anio pitched his tents. In the mid way between them and the enemies there was a bridge: which they

D would not break down on either part, lest they should be thought fearful towards. But about the seizing and gaining of that bridge, first, there was many a skirmish: and judged it could not be, considering the equal forces of both sides, who should be masters of it. Then advanced forward unto the bridge (void of all guards) a mighty tall and big Frenchman, and as long as ever he could set out a throat, maketh this challenge: Now (quoth he) let the bravest gallant that Rome hath, come forth and spare not, to combat if he dare, that the event of us twain may shew whether nation is more valiant and warlike. The brave Knights and youths of Rome, held their peace a good while, both abashed to refuse the challenge, and also unwilling to run upon the present hazard of a single fight. Then T. Manlius, the son of Lucius, even he who released his father from the Tribuns troubles, goeth forth of his quarter unto the Dictator. "Without your leave and express

E "commandment (quoth he) O Noble Sovereign, I would never presume to fight out of my rank
"and standing, no, not if I should see assured victory before mine eyes: but if it will please your "Excellency to give me licence, I will shew unto that beast yonder (that so proudly and lustily is "come forth leaping before the enemies ensigns, and braving as you see) that I am descended of
"that house and race, that gave the whole army of the Gauls the foil and turned them down the "Cliff Tarpeia. Then said the Dictator unto him, God blesse thee T. Manlius: On forth a Gods Name, in this thy dutiful mind and zeal that thou carriest both to father and Country: Go on I say, and with the help of the Gods, perform the Roman name to be invincible. Then his fellows and companions help to arme the young Gentleman. A light footmans shield he takes unto him, and a spanish blade by his side, more handiome to fight short and close. Being thus armed

F and set out, they bring him forth against this vainglorious Gaul, set all upon joyful foolishly, and (as the ancient writers have thought it worth the noting and remembrance) scornfully lolling and blaring out his tongue. Then the rest departed every man to his own quarter and ward:
and the two armed Champions were left in the midst, more like a festival spectacle and pageant to behold, than any fight in field, suiting to the manner, guise, and law of combat, considering they were not equally matched, if a man should judge by the eye and outward view. The one of them of personage mighty and exceeding tall, his coat armour of sundry colours and gay, his harnels glittering and all damasked and engraven with gold. The other, a man of a middle * stature of Souldiers, no great shew of armor, and that rather fit and handiome, than gaudy to behold: without any hooping, singing, and joyous vaunting of himself, without vain flourishes and shaking of his weapons in the air: but he had an heart full of resolute courage, stomach, and close anger within, reserving all his fierceness and eagerness unto the very combat and tryal of fight. As they stood thus between the two armies, and so many men all about looking on, in doubtful suspence between hope and fear, the Gaul like as he had been a huge mountain aloft over the other, ready to fall upon him, held forth his target with the left hand to bear off the sword of his enemy coming against him, and let drive a down-right blow edgelong, that it resounded again upon his shield, and did no harm at all. The Roman bearing his own sword with the point upward, and with his shield having smitten the nether part of his enemies target, and turned it aside, got with his whole body close within him, and without the danger of being hurt; and when he had wound himself between his enemies body and his swords point, he redoubled one or two foins, and thrust him up into the belly at the groin, and so overthrew him. There lay the Gaul along, and took up a great ground in length. When he was down, without any further mangling and tormenting his carcass, he despoiled him only of his collar of gold, which embraced as it was with blood, he did about his own neck. The Gauls with fear and admiration of this fight were astonished. The Romans with great cheerfulness came forth of their wards and quarters to meet their champion; and with great praise and congratulation brought him before the Dictator. And as they merrily cast forth (as the manner of soldiers is) certain pleasant ditties, ballad-wise, but without artificial skill of poetry, they were heard to surname him * Torguatus: which afterwards was taken up and commonly used, and became an honorable name to his posterity, and the whole house besides. Besides all this, the Dictator bestowed upon him a coronet of gold for a reward, and openly before the whole audience of the army, highly and wonderfully commended that fight of his. And certainly, that combat was of such consequence, and made so much to the event of the whole war, that the night next following, the host of the Gauls, fearfully abandoning their tents, departed into the Tyburin country: and being drawn into a society of war with the inhabitants of Tybur, and liberally by them relieved with victuals; they passed within a while into Campania. Which was the cause that the next year, C. Petilius Balbus the Consul (whose fellow M. Fabius Ambustus was by lot, sent with commission against the Hernicks) led an army, by the appointment of the people, against the Tyburins. To the aid of whom, when the French were returned out of Campania; there was foul spoil and havock made in the Latican, Tusculan, and Alban territories, by the leading and conduct, no doubt of the Tyburins. And whereas the State stood well contented that the Consul should be the General commander, against these enemies the Tyburins; this new trouble and tumult of the Gauls, caused a Dictator to be created. And that was Q. Servilius Hala, who named for his General of Horsemen, T. Quintius. And by the authority and assent of the Senators, he vowed to set out the great games, in case he sped well in this war. The Dictator having commanded the Consul with his army to tarry still, that by his own conduct of war he might keep in the Tyburins, took the oath of all the younger people; and there was not one refused to go to the war. Not far from the gate Collina was this battel fought, in the sight of their Parents, Wives and Children. Great encouragements, doubtless; to cheer up and animate men; absent and far off: but now before their eyes, partly, for shame, and partly, for pity and compassion, they set the soldiers all on fire. After much blood-shed on both sides, at the last the army of the Gauls turn back: and being put to flight, they made shaft to Tybur, the very strength and fort of the Gauls war. But as they fled stragling one from another, they were encountred by the Consul Petilius not far from Tybur. And when the Tyburins issued forth to succour them, they with the rest were beaten into the Town. Likewise the other Consul Fabius, first in small skirmishes, and at last in one notable pight field, vanquished the Hernicks; at what time as his enemies charged upon him with all their forces and whole puissance. The Dictator having highly commended the Consuls, both in the Senat-house and also in a publick assembly of all the people, and attributed the whole honour of his own Acts unto them, gave up the Dictatorship. Petilius, obtained a double triumph, over the Gauls and the Tyburins. For Fabius it was thought sufficient, that he should enter into the City Ovan, in a pety triumph. The Tyburins scoffed and made good game at the triumph of Petilius. For, "where was it (say they) that they encountred and joyned battel with us? There went forth indeed out of the City gates a few of us to behold the sight and fright of the Gauls: but seeing our selves also to be set upon, and killed one with another as we came in the way, we retired back, and and got the City over our heads. And was that such a doughty deed, that the Romans should think, it deserved a triumph? But that they may not deem it still, so noble and so wondrous an Act, to make some stir, and raise a tumult in the enemies gates: they should themselves see shortly greater fearfulness, even under their own walls. Hereupon, the year following, when M. P. pilus Lenas, and C. Manlius were Consuls, at the first watch of the night, they came from Tybur in warlike manner to the City of Rome. This sudden occurrent, hapning so fearfully in the night season, stroke a mighty terrour into them, that hastily awakened out of sleep. Besides, many there were that wist not, either what enemies they were; or from whence they came. Howbeit they cryed Alarm with all speed, on every side. The gates were fortified with warders; the walls manned with strong guards. When as early in the morning, they were descried to be but a mean number of enemies before the Town; and those none other but Tyburins; the Consuls sallied out at two gates, and assailed both wayes their forces; as they were now come under the walls ready to scale. Then was it seen that they were thither come, presuming rather on the vantage of the time, than trusting in valour and manhood: so little were they able to abide the first brunt and charge given by the Romans. Furthermore, it was well known, that this their coming turned to the Romans good: for, the discord that was now breeding between the Senators and the Com, for fear of this so neer danger was quite staid. But in the next war that ensued, the enemies came after another sort, and were more terrible to the fields and country, than to the City. For the Tarquinians over-ran all the marches of the Roman pale, wasting and spoiling all those parts, especially that border upon Hetruria. And after restitution & amends demanded, but to no effect, the new Cons, C. Fabius & C. Plantius, by the ordinance of the people proclaimed war against them. The rumors also

Also of the Gauls war began to be rife. But amid these manifold and fearful troubles, this was their comfort, that the Latins had peace granted unto them, upon their own sute: and from thence a great power was received, according to the ancient league, which for many years space, they had let pals and discontinued. The Roman forces by this aid well strengthened, made a lighter matter of it, when they heard that the Gauls were arrived already at Prentse, and were set down and encamped about Pedum. It was thought good, that C. Sulpicius should be chosen Dictator, named by C. Plautius, sent for to the same purpose. Where, whom M. Valerius was appointed for Commander of his Horsemen. These marched against the Gauls with the choice souldiers of two Consular armies. This was a lingering war and protracted longer a great deal, than both parties liked of. At the first, the Gauls only were impatient and eager of battel, but afterwards the Roman souldiers, by rushing into fight and skirmish, exceeded far the fierceness and forwardness of the French. The Dictator was nothing pleased, here with, to put all upon the hazard of fortune, when there was no need at all, especially having to deal with that enemy, whom tract of time and disadvantage of the place, made daily worse, and worse, being unprovided besides of victuals and making long abroad without any fenced fort: moreover, of that stomach and constitution of body, as served wholly for expedition and quick service, and by small delays waxed feeble and faint. Upon these considerations the Dictator held off still and drew the war on length, and had proclaimed a grievous punishment in any without his exprels commandment should fight with the enemy. The souldiers could not well brook this: but first within their wards and watches began among themselves to carpiat the Dictator, and other whiles they let flie at the LL. of the Senate in general, blaming them for their direction in that the Consuls had not the managing of this war. They have chosen indeed (say they) a singular General on set purpose, a Capitaine alone, who thinks whiles he sitteth still and doth nothing, the victory will fall from Heaven, or flie into his very lap. After this they began openly abroad, and in the day time, to cast out the same, yea, and worse speeches too and more malepart: namely, that they would either fight, and ask the Dictator no leave, or go along in order of battel to Rome. The Centurions also joyned themselves to the souldiers: and not only in conventicles and knots together, there was whispering and grumbling: but in the very Principia, yea, and within the quarter of the L. General his pavilion, were heard confused speeches together in one accord. So as the multitude began now to grow to a full assembly, and from all parts to call and cry aloud, to go presently to the Dictator: and that Sex. Tullius should in the name of the whole army speak unto him, as beseeched his vertue and courage. This Tullius now had been seven times already a primipilar or principal Centurion: neither was there in the whole army, of all those that served on foot, a man more renowned for feats of arms. He going before the army of footmen, steppeth to the Tribunal. And when as Sulpicius marvelled, not so much to see that company, as the leader of the company Tullius, who of all the souldiers had ever been in best order and most obedient. "This is the matter (quoth he) O Noble Dictator and nothing else. The whole army in general, supposing themselves by you condemned of cowardice, and in a manner to their utter shame abandoned, and disarmed, have intreated me to plead their cause before your Majesty. And I for my part, I assure you, in case we might be charged to have lost ground any where, in case we had turned our backs upon the enemy, in case we had lost our ensignes shamefully, would think it yet a reasonable suit to be obtained at your hands, that you would give us leave to amend that which is amiss, to correct our former fault with hardiness and valour, and by some fresh and glorious exploit, to cancel the remembrance of so foul a foil and shameful dishonor. Even those very Legions that were defeated and put to flight at Alia, afterwards in their return from Kair, recovered the same country of theirs by valour, which they had once before lost through cowardice. But we by the goodness of God, through the felicity of your self and the people of Rome, have hitherto kept both the army unfoiled, & honor unstained. And yet I scarce dare say, honour: if so be, that not only our enemies may with all reproachful teanims scorn and flout us, as if we were women pent in & mew'd up close within our rampier: but also you, our General (the more is our grief) deem us your army to be heartless, handless, & armourless: and before any tryal of us made, to despair of us, as if you took your self to be a Commander & Leader of a sort of maimed & feeble persons. For what else may we think of it, that you, an old experienced Captain and a most valiant warrior, should sit, as they say, with one hand in another, doing nothing? For howsoever the truth is indeed, more meet it is, that you should be thought to doubt of our valor, than we of yours. But if this be not a device of your own setting, but a publick plot laid: and some matter agreed upon among the Senators at home, rather than any war of the Gauls, keepeth us away from thence, confined as it were from the City & our own houses: then I beseech you, whatsoever I shall say, you would think it as spoken, not by the souldiers to their Lord General, but by the Commons to the rulers and Senators. Who may thus reply, that as ye have your policies and counsels, so will they have their designs & wayes of their own likewise. For who would think I pray you, that we are your souldiers, and not your slaves: sent to war, and not into banishment? If any set out the banner of war unto us, lead us forth into the field, and sound the battel, ready we are to fight like men, and like Romans: but if there be no need of war, we will rather sit still at home, than in the camp. And thus much, suppose as spoken to the Lords of the Senat. But we thy souldiers, O worthy General beseech thee first to give us leave to fight, then desirous are we to conquer and under thy standard and conduct to conquer: to present thee with a glorious garland of lawrel, and in triumph to enter with thee into the City: and after thy chariot

The Oration of Sex. Tullius unto the Dictator.

“chariot to go up with joy and mirth to the Temple of Jupiter Optimus Maximus. This Oration of Tullius, the multitude seconded with their petitions, calling aloud unto the General on every side, to sound the alarm, and command them to arm. The Dictator, albeit he thought the matter in it self good, but not handled in good manner; and for example sake not to be allowed: yet promised to satisfy the souldiers desire. “And calling Tullius secretly apart, questioned with him what this matter meant, what precedent or custom they had for their warrant? Tullius earnestly besought the Dictator, not to think him to have forgotten either military Discipline, or his own place; nor yet the Majesty of his Sovereign. And whereas he had not withdrawn himself away from the multitude being in a mutiny, nor refused to be their speaker (who lightly resemble those that are their ring-leaders) it was only for fear lest some other should have stepped in place, such as the unruly people in mutinies are wont to set up for their Captains. As for himself, do nothing he would, without the pleasure of the General. Howbeit he would advise him to look well about him, and carefully to see to it, that he keep his army in order, government, and obedience. And high time it is now, and would not be deferred. For considering their hearts were kindled already, and their bloud up, they would be their own carvers, and chuse themselves both time and place, if the General would not grant it them the sooner. Whiles they were thus in sad communication, there hapned two Roman souldiers to take perforce from a Gaul certain sumpter Horses, which feeding without the camp, he was driving away. At whom, the Gauls let flye stones good store. And thereupon rose an alarm from the Roman Corps de guard, and running out there was apace, on both sides. So as now they had grown to a full skirmish and battel indeed, had not the Centurions speedily stickled them, and ended the fray. Upon which occurrence, the credit of Tullius with the Dictator was confirmed: and seeing the case would abide no delays, he proclaimed battel against the morrow. The Dictator notwithstanding he had yeilded to fight a field, as presuming more upon the courage of his men, than their forces: began to devise with himself, and cast about every way, how by some stratagem he might strike a terror among the enemies. And having a subtle wit and nimble head of his own, this new policy he thought upon: which afterwards many warriors, both of our own country, and of others also, yea, and some even in our time, have used and put in practise. He gave order, that the mules sumpters should be taken off their backs, leaving only two course twillies or coverings upon them, and setteth the muletors aloft thereon, furnished with the armour of certain captives, and sick and diseased persons. Of these he made wel-neer one thousand, and joyned unto them one hundred good Horsemen. All these, he chargeth in the night time to get above the camp into the hills, and among the Furs and woods, to bestow themselves close: and not to stir from thence, before that he gave them a signal. Himself, so soon as it was day light, began with great wariness and considerate care to embattel and arrange his army in length along the very foot of the mountains: to the end, that the enemy might have the hills full against him. Thus having set out and directed these counterfeit cornets of Horse, to scare the enemies with, who, as it fell out, did more good in a manner, than the other forces indeed: at the first, the vanguard of the Gauls thought that the Romans would not come down on even ground: but afterwards, when they saw them upon a sudden descended, they also, as desirous of fight, ran on forward presently to joyn battel, and began the fight before the Captains had sounded. The Gauls charged the right wing more fiercely, so that hardly they might have been abidden, had not by good hap the Dictator been there in person. “Who called upon Sextus Tullius by name, and rebuked him, demanding whether he had given his word unto him, that the souldiers should in that sort fight? What is become (quoth he) of these, that with out-cries and open mouth called for battel? Where are those threats now, that they would begin to fight a field without commandment of the General? Lo, your General himself calleth upon you as loud as he can, to fall to your business, and goeth armed before the ensigns in the vanguard: will any now follow after that erewhile would needs lead the way afore? Fierce (I see well) in camp, fearful in the field. And no fable it was that they heard him speak. Whereupon for very shame they were so pricked forward, that without casting any N perils, or minding present danger, they ran upon the darts and shot of their enemies. This violence of theirs, as if they had been wel-neer out of their right wits, at the very first troubled and disordered the enemies. The Horsemen that were sent out hard after them, forced them to turn back, when they were once in disarray. The Dictator himself seeing the battel of one side to shrink, advanced forward with the ensigns against the left wing, unto which he saw the main multitude to resort and gather together, and withal he gave the sign to them that were within the hills, according as it was before agreed. And when from thence also a new shout arose, and that they were seen to march side-long overthwart the hill, toward the Gauls camp; then for fear, lest they should be shut out from their hold, they gave over all fighting, and ran by heaps to their camp. Where M. Valerius, the General of the Horsemen encountred and affronted them. For he seeing the right wing discomfited, had set a compass about, and ridden to the fortifications and munitions of the enemies. Whereupon they fled to the mountains and the woods. Most of them were received by the counterfeit shew of Horsemen, and by the muletors caught up, and came short home: but as many of them as fear drave through into the woods, were (after the heat of the battel was past) cruelly slain and hewn in pieces. Neither was there any one, setting M. Furius aside, that triumphed more worthily over the Gauls, than did C. Sulpicius. He consecrated also in the Capitol a good weighty mass of gold, got out of the Gauls spoil, and compassed it within an enclosure of square stone.

The stratagem
of C. Sulpicius
the Dictator.

Aft one. The ſame year, the Conſuls likewiſe warred, but with diſſerſe fortune and ſucceſs. For by C. Plantius, the Hernicks were vanquiſhed and ſubdued. But his companion Fabius fought raſhly and unadviſedly againſt the Tarquinians. The loſs in the battel received, was not ſo much, but that the Tarquinians ſacrificed three hundred and ſeven Roman ſouldiers, whom they took priſoners. This loſs and ſhameful execution, cauſed the ignominy of the Romans defeat afore, to be much more notable, and talked of abroad. Beſides this loſs, was the Roman territory much waſted (to help the matter withal) by the Privernats, and after them by the Veliterns, who made ſudden inrodes into the Country. The ſame year alſo were two more Tribes added, Pompina and Publicia. The votive ſolemn playes or games likewiſe, which Marcus Furius the Dictator had vowed, were then ſet forth and performed.

B Then and never before was the firſt law put up to the people by P. Petilius, a Tribun of the Commons, and that by the conſent and approbation of the Senators, againſt the exceſſive ſuit and ambitious ſtanding for dignities. By which lawmen ſuppoſed, that the ambition principally of certain perſons new riſen and of the firſt head, who were wont to haunt fairs and places of great reſort for that intent, was reſſeſſed and kept under. But the year enſuing, when C. Martius and Cn. Manlius were Conſuls, M. Duellius and M. Menenius two Tribuns of the Commons, went through with a law and got it enacted, which was not ſo well liked of the Senators, to wit, concerning Uſury of one in the hundred. But the Commons were ſo much the more forward and better contented, to grant and accept it. Over and beſides thoſe new wars the year before intended,

A law againſt ambitious ſeeking for offices of government.

C the Falſci were declared new enemies: and that, for two quarrels pretended againſt them; One, for that their youth had ſerved againſt the Romans under the Tarquinians: the other, becauſe they had not delivered again thoſe Romans which fled unto Falerii, after their defeat and unlucky fight, notwithstanding the Heralds had made claim unto them and demanded them. This Province fell to Cn. Manlius. But Martius had the leading of an army into the Land of the Privernats, which by reaſon of long peace was unſpoiled yet, and in very good ſtate, and thereby enriched his ſouldiers with good prizes. For, to the plenty and ſtore that there was found, he added his own bounty and liberality: in that he ſet out nothing for the common Treafury, but favoured the ſouldiers, and gave them leave to better their own private ſtate. The Privernats lay ſtrongly encamped before their own City: and when he had aſſembled all his ſouldiers together:

A law againſt Uſury.

D "Now (quoth he) I give unto you the enemies camp and their City for a booty, ſo you will promiſe me to quit your ſelves like men, and to be as ready to fight as to ſpoil. Hereupon, with a great cry they call for the ſignal of battel: and ſo advancing forward and exalting themſelves bravely and couragiously, with aſſured hope of victory, to battel they go. There, even before the ensigns in the vanguard, Sextus Tullius, of whom we ſpake before, cryed out aloud, Behold, Noble General (quoth he) how thine army performeth their word given unto thee: and therewith laying down his Javelin, with drawn ſword confronteth the enemy. Then follow after Tullius, all they that fought in the vanguard before the Standards, and at the firſt ſhock put the enemies to flight, followed the chace and drave them into the Town. And as they were ſcaling the Walls, the Town was rendred up into their hands. So he triumphed over the Privernats. By the other Conſul there was no worthy exploit done, but that as he lay encamped before Sursum, he propoſed a law to paſs by the Tribes, (a courſe never taken before, and without example) concerning a twentieth part or vicesime, to be levied of their goods that were made free. The Lords of the Senat (becauſe by that Act there accrewed no ſmall revenue to the Exchequer, that was now waſted) allowed thereof and gave their aſſent: But the Tribuns of the Com, moved not ſo much at the quality of the law in it ſelf, as at the dangerous precedent given, or dained under pain of death. That no man ever after ſhould in making of laws withdraw the people apart: For, if that were once by law permitted, there would be nothing, were it never ſo pernicious to the people, but it might be enacted by ſouldiers, that have ſworn to their Conſuls allegiance, and were at his devotion. The ſame year was C. Licinius Stolo at the ſuit of M. Popilius Lenas, condemned upon his own ſtatute in

* 25 lib ſſi ſter.

E 10000 Aſſes, for that he together with his ſon, was poſſeſſed of a thouſand acres of Land, and under colour of freeing his ſon, he had deluded the ſtatute in that caſe provided.

After this, the two Conſuls M. Fabius Ambuſtus the ſecond time, and M. Popilius Lenas the ſecond time made two wars. That which Lenas fought with the Tyburtins was performed with eaſe and facility, For having driven the enemies into the Town, he forraged their fields. But in the other war, the Falſci and the Tarquinians, diſcomfited in the firſt battel the other Conſul. Their greateſt fear aroſe upon this occaſion. For, their Priests carrying afore them light burning torches, and ſnakes beſides, went after a lunatick and ſtantick manner, and with ſo ſtrange and uncouth a ſhew troubled and diſordered the Roman ſouldiers. And therewithal, at that very inſtant the ſouldiers, as if they had been diſtracted, beſides themſelves, and aſtonied, diſmarched fearfully and ſtumbled upon the munitions and fortifications of their camp: But after, when as the Conſul, Lieutenants and Colonels mocked and rated them, for being ſcared like children with theſe vain bugbears: for ſhame ſuddenly they took heart again, and like blind men ran upon thoſe very ſame things, that before they had fled from. And ſo after they had diſpatched this vain deviſe and preparation of their enemies, they fell upon the armed men indeed, diſcomfited their whole army and put them to flight: and being the ſame day maſters of their camp, with a rich booty returned victors, both recounting in their military merry ditties and ſongs,

C. Martius Rutilius first Dictator of the Commons.

* i. The assembly of the people.

songs, the foolish preparation of the enemy, and also condemning their own fearfulness. After this, the whole nation of the Tuscans arose, having for their leaders the Tarquinians and the Falisci, and came as far as Salina. Against which fearful danger was C. Martius Rutilius chosen, the first Dictator that ever was of the Commons: who named for his General of the Horsemen a Commoner likewise C. Plautius. But the Senators thought this a shameful indignity, that the Dictatorship also should now be chosen in common: and did all they could possibly to hinder, that there should be nothing decreed toward the war, nor any preparation made for the Dictator. But so much the sooner, and with more readiness, all that the Dictator proposed, the Commons granted. So he departed from the City, and marched on both sides of the Tyber (transporting his army in boats and planks fastned together) to what place soever he heard the enemies were gone: and surprised many forragers of them, as they wandered and straggled one from another, in the fields. He set upon their camp also, and won it: and after that he had taken eight thousand prisoners, and either slain or chased all the rest out of the Roman pale, he triumphed, by the suffrages of the people only, without the approbation and assent of the Senators. And forasmuch as they would not in any case have an assembly for Election of Consuls, held either by the Dictator a Commoner, or by the Consul: and because the other Consul Fabius was banished abroad in the wars, and not returned: therefore, the matter fell again to an Interregnum. So there were Interregents one after another, Q. Servilius Hala, M. Fabius, Cn. Manlius, C. Fabius, C. Sulpitius, L. Amylius, Q. Servilius, and M. Fabius Ambustus. During the second Interregnum, there arose some variance, for that both Consuls were Patritii, i. of the Nobles. And when the Tribuns interposed themselves, and crossed those proceedings, Fabius the Interregent, alleged a Law out of the twelve tables in these terms, That whosoever the people ordained or granted last, the same should be good, and stand firm and ratified: and in suffrages and voices of the people, were comprised their grant and ordinance. But when the Tribuns, for all their gain saying and stepping between, could prevail no more, but to prorogue the Comices for the Election, there were at length two of the Nobles created Consuls, C. Sulpitius Peticus the third time, and M. Valerius Publicola: who the same day they were chosen, entered into their office. Thus in the 400 year after the foundation of the City, and the 35 after it was recovered from the Gauls, the Commons lost the Consulship again, when they had enjoyed it nine years. And two Consuls of the Patritii, upon the Interregnum, began to govern, to wit, C. Sulpitius Peticus the third time, and M. Valerius Publicola. The same year was Empulcum won from the Tyburtins, without any memorable warlike exploit: were it that, under the conduct of both Consuls there jointly together, the war was managed, as some have written: or that about the same time the Tarquinians Country was by the Consul Sulpitius over-run and wasted, whiles Valerius led forth a power against the Tyburtins. But more ado had the Consuls at home, with the Commons and Tribuns. The Consuls thought now, it concerned them in trust and credit, as well as in vertue and valour, that as they, being Patritii both of them, had received the Consulship, so they should make over the same again to twain of the Nobility: and either wholly to give up their interest and title for ever, if so be the Consulship should now become a Commoners dignity: or else to keep it wholly in their possession, whereof they were first seized intirely, in right of their ancestors. On the other side, the Commons fumed and stormed in these and such like terms. "What should we live any longer? and why are we accounted citizens? In case, that which was first got by the vertue and power of two only persons, L. Sextius, and C. Licinius, we cannot now all of us together hold and keep? Certainly, better we were to endure the KK. and Decemvirs again, or any other heavier and more fearful name of absolute and Lordly Empire, than to see both Consuls of the Nobility: and that we, may not both rule and obey in turns, but that the one part settled in the place of rule for ever, should think us, the Commons, born for nothing else but to obey and serve. The Tribuns themselves were nothing behind to set forward these troublesome mutinies. But when the people are up once altogether and in commotion, the principal leaders are hardly seen above the rest in the action. And when as they were come down into Mars field sundry times to assembly, but ever to no purpose and effect, and that many Comitial dayes of assembly were passed over, only in seditious troubles: at the last, the Commons being overmatched through the stiffness and obstinacy of the Consuls, took the matter so grievously to the heart, that when the Tribuns brake forth into these speeches: "Now farewell freedom for ever: now are we driven, not only to forbear coming into Mars field, but also to abandon and forsake the City, taken captive and oppressed by the Lordly rule of the Nobles, and therewithal departed: the Commons with sorrowful cheer did the semblable, and followed after. The Consuls being thus left destitute of one part of the people, yet nevertheless went through with the Election, as few as they were there remaining. And Consuls there were elected of the Nobility both, M. Fabius Ambustus the third time, and T. Quintius. In some annals or yearly records, I find Coss. M. Popilius, instead of T. Quintius.

In that year, were two wars performed with prosperous success. And the Tyburtins were fought withal until they yielded. From them was the City Sassula won by force: and other Towns had tasted of the same fortune, but that the whole Nation laid arms aside, and submitted themselves to the Consul his mercy. He triumphed over the Tyburtins: otherwise the conquest was mild and gentle enough, without extremity of execution. But the Tarquinians were cruelly dealt withal: and many a man of them slain in field. Of the prisoners that were taken, whereof

A whereof there was a mighty number, there were 358 of the Noblest and greatest Gentlemen chosen out, and sent to Rome. The rest of the common sort were put to the sword. Neither sped they better at the peoples hands that were sent to Rome. For in the mids of the Forum, were they all beaten with rods and beheaded. This execution made quittance with them, for sacrificing the Romans in the market place of the Tarquinians. This good success in war caused the Samnites also to seek for peace and amity. Their Embassadors were courteously answered by the Senat, and so upon covenants they were received into society. But the Commons sped not so well at home in the City, as abroad in warfare. For albeit the Usury was well eased by bringing it down from twelve to one, in the hundred: yet the poorer people were overcharged with the payment of the very principal, and became bond and thrall to their creditors. Whereby the Com. in regard of their privat streights, that they were driven unto, never troubled their heads with the making of both Consuls of the Nobles, nor with the Assemblies and Elections, nor other publick affairs. Still the two Consulships remained among the Patritii. And created there were Consuls, C. Sulpitius Peticus the fourth time, and M. Valerius Publicola the second time.

Now when as the City was earnestly amused upon the Tuscan war, by reason that the news went, how that the people of Cere, for very pity and compassion, and in regard also of consanguinity, took part with the Tarquinians: behold the Embassadors of the Latins turned them clean against the Volscians. Which Embassadors brought word, that there was an army levied already from thence and in arms, even now upon the point to invade their borders: and would from them enter the territory of Rome, and spoil as they go. The Senat therefore thought good to neglect neither business, and gave direction, that to both places certain legions should be appointed, and the Consuls to cast lots for their severall Provinces and charges. But afterwards, the greater care was taken for the Tuscan war, upon intelligence given by Sulpitius the Consul his letters, whose commission was against Tarquinius, that the countrey was wasted and spoiled all about the Roman Sallina, [or Salt-pits] and part of the booties carried away into the confines of the Ceritis: and that the youth of that people were doubtless employed in the driving of that booty. Whereupon Valerius the Consul, who was opposed against the Volscians, and encamped in the marches of Tusculum, was called back from thence, and commanded by the Senat to nominate a Dictator. Who named T. Manlius, the son of Lucius, and he taking to him A. Cornelius Cossus for his General of the Horsemen, contenting himself with his Consular army, by the authority of the Senat, and the peoples suffrages, proclaimed war against the Ceritis, and sent them defiance. Then were the Ceritis afraid of war indeed, and not afore, as though there had been more force in their enemies bare words, to denounce and signify war, than in their own deeds, who by spoiling and plundering, had provoked the Romans to war. Then saw they plainly that they were overmatched and not able to make their parts good: then repented they that they had made such wast and spoil, cursing the Tarquinians for soliciting them to revolt, not one of them making any preparation of armour or war: but every man labouring what he could, that Embassadors should be sent, to crave pardon for their trespasss and offence. When their Embassadors were come to the Senat, they were from thence put over to the people. And then they beought the Gods, whose sacred Images they had received in the French war and devoutly kept and cherished, That the Romans now in their flourishing estate, would take that pity and compassion of them, which they in times past had of the Romans, in their calamity and hard distress. And turning to the chappels of Vesta, they called upon the Flamins and Vestal Virgins, sometime their guests, whom they so chastly and religiously had received and given intertainment unto, saying in this wise. "Would any man believe we had deserved no better, but thus of a sudden, without cause given, to be reputed enemies? Or suppose we had done somewhat smelling of hostility, would any man impure it rather to deliberat counsell, than to some fit of heat and folly? And that we would blamish and mar our own good deserts, especially conferred and bestowed upon so thankful persons, with new misdeeds and shrewd turns? and chuse to make the people of Rome their enemies now in their wealthy and flourishing State, and in their most happy felicity of war: whose friendship in their adversity we had embraced? Beseeching them not to term that considerate advice, which rather were to be called force and necessity. For the Tarquinians, say they, passing with a cruel and puissant army through our country & requesting nothing but away, had drawn with them some of our rustical Peasants, to assist them only in fetching of that booty, which now so heavily is laid to our charge. Whom if you please to have them yielded, we are ready to deliver them: if to be punished they shall suffer accordingly: most humbly craving, that their City Cere, the very sanctuary of the people of Rome, the harbour and habitation of their Priests, the place of receipt for the Roman sacred images and reliques, they would grant unto them safe from the calamity of war, and exempt from the slander thereof: and the rather for the professed vestal Virgins sake, so kindly intertained, and for the love of the Gods, by them so devoutly honored. The people were moved, not so much with the justice and equity of the present cause, as for their old deserts and good turns to forget rather the harm sustained than the good received. Whereupon, the people of Cere were pardoned, & agreed it was that a truce for one hundred years should be registred among the Acts of the Senat. Then were the forces diverted against the Falisci, who were tainted likewise with the same offence. But the enemies would no where be found. They wasted therefore all over their confines: & forbore to assail their Towns. So they withdrew their legions to Rome. The rest of the year was employed in repairing their wals & Towers: and the Temple of Apollo was dedicated.

dedicated. In the very end of the year, the contention between the Senators and the Commons, brake off the Election of the Consuls: whilst the Tribuns stily denied to suffer any assembly therefore to be holden, unless it were according to the Law Licinia. And the Dictator again was as stoutly and stily bent, to abolish wholly out of the City the Consulship, rather than it should be indifferent for the Nobility and common people. Thus by adjourning the Election, the Dictator left his office, and the matter grew to an Interreign. And the Interregents, finding ever the Commons maliciously set against the Senators, succeeded one after another unto the eleventh Interreign: and all the while continued the discord and variance. The Tribuns they called on hard for the maintenance of the Law Licinia. The Commons, they had an inward grief that stuck neerer to them, upon the excessive usury that still increased: and each mans privat care and grievance, brake out in their publick contentions and debates. The LL. of the Senat weary of these troubles, commanded L. Cornelius Scipio the Interreign for the time being, for concord and unity sake, in the Election of Consuls to observe the Law Licinia. So P. Valerius Publicola, had joynd with him in fellowship of government, Caius Martius Rutilus, one of the Commons.

instituted, called Mensarii.

Now whilst mens minds were enclined once to concord, the new Consuls labouring to ease also this matter of usury, the only spill or bone (as it were) between, that seemed to hinder the uniting of their hearts, and impeach the general agreement: took order publicly for the payment of debts, by creating five officers or Quinquivirs, whom of the despending and disposing of the publick monies, they called Mensarii. And surely, for their equity and careful diligence, they deserved in all monuments and records to be remembered and renowned. And these they were, C. Duellius, P. Decius, M. Papirius, Q. Publius, and T. Amylius: who underwent and managed this matter, so intricat and difficult to be dealt in: so grievous and combersome to both sides for the most part, but evermore to one at the least. Which they performed both with indifferent moderation otherwise, and also with some cost and defray of charge, rather than any loss and dammage to the State. For the long debts and more entangled, rather in regard of the debtors slackness and negligence, than their want of ability, either the City out of the common stock crossed out of the book, by setting up certain counters or tables with ready coin in the publick Hall (provided, that there were good security unto the City by sureties and cautions put in aforehand) or else the goods of men valued at indifferent and reasonable prices discharged. So as not only without any wrong done, but also without the complaint of both parties, a mighty deal of debts was satisfied and paid.

All debts cleared in Rome.

After all this, a vain fear of the Tuscan war, upon a false Alarm given, that their twelve Nations conspired and were confederate together, caused a Dictator to be chosen. So C. Julius was named in the camp: for thither to the Coss. was the patent of the Senats decree sent. And to him was joynd as General of the Horsemen, L. Amylius. But all was quiet without the City: Within the City the Dictator gave the attempt, that both Consuls should be created of the Patritii: which brought the government for the time to an Interreign. And the two Interregents that were in that while (to wit) C. Sulpitius and M. Fabius, obtained that which the Dictator had reached at in vain: namely, that both Consuls might be created of the Nobility: for now the Commons were more pliable and tractable, by reason of the fresh benefit received, in the easement and satisfying of their debts. So there were chosen C. Sulpitius Peticus, he, who was the former of the twain that gave over the Interreign, and T. Quintius Pennus. Some there be that give to Quintius the addition of Caso for his surname [and of Caius for his forename.] Both of them went forth to war: Quintius against the Falisci, and Sulpitius against the Tarquinians. Who, for that they could never meet with the enemy in open field, by burning and spoiling made war with the fields rather than with the men. By which lingring continuance, as it were of a languishing consumption, the stubbornnes of both Nations was so wel tamed, that they made petition first to the Consuls, and by their permission after to the Senat, for a truce, and obtained the same for the term of forty years. Thus the care was laid aside of the two wars, which seemed so neer at hand. And whilst there was some rest from Arms, it was thought good because the payment of debts abovesaid, had changed the owners and masters of many things, that there should be held a general Sessing of the citizens. But, when there was an assembly summoned for the chusing of Censors, C. Martius Rutilus professing himself to stand for a Censorship, even he that had been the first Dictator of the Commons, troubled the peace and unity of the States of the City. This he went about (as it seemed) in a very undue and unseasonable time. For, both Consuls were then of the Nobility, as it fell out, who gave it forth that they would not admit him to be a Competitor, nor propound his name at the Election. Howbeit, both he by earnest perseverance in his resolution obtained that which he went about: and also the Tribuns with all their might endeavouring to recover their right, which was lost in the Election of the Consuls, set to their helping hand. And as the countenance and Majesty of the man himself, seemed worthy of the highest type of honor: so the Commons were right willing, that by the same man who had opened the way unto the Dictatorship, the Censorship also should draw to that side, and be in part conferred upon them. Neither in the assembly was there any variance in the Suffrages, but that, together with Manlius Navius, Martius should be created Censor. This year likewise had a Dictator, M. Fabius, not for any fear of war, but because the Law Licinia, for the choice of Consuls, should not be revived and observed. The General of the Horsemen unto the Dictator was Q. Servilius. And yet for all the Dictatorship, the agreement of the Senators together, was in the Election of the Consuls

A Consuls no more force then it was in the choosing of the Censors. For Popilius Lenas was Consul, of the Commons, and L. Cornelius Scipio of the Nobles. And the commoner Consul, by good fortune, proved more famous of the town. For when upon tidings brought that a mighty army of the Gauls were encamped in the Latine country, this Gauls war was laid extraordinary upon Popilius, because Scipio lay grievously sick. Who having soon levied an army, and commanded all the younger men, to meet him in their armour at Mars his Church, without the gate Capena, and that the Quæstors should bring thither the Standards and ensignes out of the Atrium. [City chamber] and after he had chosen out of them, fully four Legions, he delivered all the residue of souldiers unto P. Valerius Publicola, the Pretor, and moved the L. of the Senat to enroll another army to be in readines, against all uncertain occurrents of war, what need soever the City should have. And now himself being at all points thoroughly furnished, setting forward to meet the enemy. Whole power because he would know, before he had trial therof with the uttermost hazard, he began to cast a trench and raise a rampier upon the next hill unto the Gauls camp, that he could come unto. The Gauls, a fierce kind of people and by nature eager of fight, having discovered afar of the Roman ensignes, embattelled themselves forthwith, as ready to bid battle. But when they saw the Roman army not brought forth into the plain and even ground, but that they were strongly defended, not only by the height of the place, but also with a ditch and palisado, and supposing them to be smitten with fear, and the suter therefore to be assailed, for that they were at that instance busily occupied about their other fortifications, with an hideous noise and horrible shout, gave the charge upon them. The Romans gave over their work never the sooner (they were the Triarii of the rearward that made these fortifications) but the spearmen or javelottiers of the vanguard, and the Principes of the middle ward, who stood ready armed in guard for the defence of the pioneers, made head and received them with fight. Besides their valour, the higher ground was their vantage: so as all their darts and spears light not in vain (as commonly they do that are flung and lanced on level ground) but stuck all fast as being poised with their own weight: so that the Gauls being surcharged with darts either sticking through their bodies, or fast set in their shields, and so weighing them down; having also run themselves upon the hill, first, as doubtful what to do, made stay afterwards, when protracting of time had discouraged themselves, and encouraged their enemies, they were driven back and fell one upon another, and in that confusion made greater havock and worse, then the slaughter was by the enemy: and crushed they were to death, more in that crowd and thrust, then were slain by sword. Yet were not the Romans sure of victory: for when they were come down into the plain, there was a new piece of work to begin, and a fresh trouble behind. For the Gauls, by reason of their number, little feeling such a losse (as if a new army had started up in fight, out of the ground) stirred up their fresh souldiers and untold, against the enemy in his victory. Whereupon the Romans made a stand and staid their eagerneite: both because they being already wearied, were to abide a new conflict; and all for that the Consul, whiles he laid about him with the formost, without regard of his own person, was wounded well neer the left shoulder with a pike, and thereupon for a while was departed out of the battell. By occasion of which lingring, the victory had like to have been lost again: but that the Consul when his wounds were dressed and bound up, came back again with speed to the formost ensignes, and said: Why stand you still first, ye have not to deal now, with the Latins or Sabins your enemies, whom after ye have conquered by the sword, ye may make of enemies friends and confederats: but upon very savage beasts we have dravn sword. Either we must have their blood, or they ours. From the camp ye have driven them back: chased ye have them headlong down the hill side: over the bodies of enemies lying along, now ye stand: fill the plain also with their dead carcases, as ye have done the hills already: and never look that they will lie, so long as ye stand still. You must advance your ensignes, and charge the enemy afresh. With these exhortations they fell to it the second time, and forced the former ranks and files of the Gauls to lose ground: and then with pointed close battallions of footmen, they brake through in to the heart of the main battell. Whereupon the barbarous people being disarrayed, such as had neither certain directions to follow, nor Captains to command, turned their force upon their fellows, were scattered here and there about the plains, fled in this pursuit beyond their tents, and made toward the fort of Alba: which among many hills that stood of even height, they espied mounting above the rest. The Col. followed the chase no farther than their camp: both because his hurt made himself unviellie, and also for that he was unwilling to put his tired army to a new labour, considering the enemy had gained the hills tops, and so rested from farther pursuit. And when he had given the whole pillage of the camp to his souldiers, he brought back to Rome his army with victory, and enriched with the spoils of the Gauls. The Consul his wound staid his triumph, which was a cause also that the Senat wished and longed for a Dictator, to hold the assembly for the Election of Consuls, whiles the other were sick.

G L. Furius Camillus being chosen Dictator, had joynd unto him P. Cornelius Scipio for his General of the horsemen. He restored again to the Senators their ancient possessing of the Consulship: and for this good turn, was himself with exceeding affection of them all, created Consul. And for his companion he chose unto him App. Claudius Crassus. But before the new Consuls entered unto their office, Popilius with great love and favour of the Commons triumphed over the Gauls: who mumbling and muttering among themselves, would often ask one another, whether there were any repented of a Commoner Consul: rating withall at the Dictator, who despising the the law Licinia, had got for his reward a Consulship; which was more shamefull and infamous, in regard of his privat seeking for it, for being Dictator he had made himself Consul; then for any publick harm and injury. This year for many and faulty troubles was very famous. The Gauls from the Alban woods for that they were not able then to endure the cold of winter) ranged all over the Champion and sea-coasts, and wasted the country. The sea likewise were dangerous by reason of the Greeks navy. Also all the tract along Adriam, and the river of Laurentium, even to the very mouth of Tyber. So as the rovers and men of war by sea, and the land robbers of the French, met both together, and struck once for all a dangerous battell; and then departed sundry, the French unto their standing camp, the Greeks back unto their ships: both doubtfull, whether they had won or lost. Amid these troubles, the greatest fear by far, arose from this, that the Latine Nation held certain Diete and Councils at the grove of Feronia; and when the Romans demanded soldiers from them, that answer was made, That they must no more think to command them whole aid they stood need of. And as for the Latins, they were resolved rather to bear arms in defence of their own liberty, then fight for the maintenance of the dominions of strangers. The Senat being grieved and perplexed as well for these two forrain wars, as also for the revolt of their confederats, seeing no other way, but to keep them in by fear, whom loyalty would not restrain, commanded their Consul in their mustring, to extend and strain to the utmost the whole strength of the State: for now that their Allies failed them, they were to trust upon their City forces only. From all parts therefore, the youth as well without in the country, as within the City were taken up, and ten legions (as men say) were enrolled of soldiers, amounting to 4200. foot and 300. horse in a legion. Which puissant army, if now at this day any forrain wars were toward, these mighty forces of the people of Rome, which the whole world is hardly able to contain, if they were united and brought into one together, would not easily make again: so great are we grown in wealth only and superfluous delights, to which we strive and apply our minds.

Among other heavy occurrents of that year, Ap. Claudius one of the Consuls, in the very preparation of the wars, departed this life. Whereupon the whole government was devolved upon Camilus. To which sole Consul, either for his quality and worth, or else otherwise (not meet to be controlled by the absolut command of a Dictator) or for the lucky preface of his name to fortune in all the tumultuous wars of the Gauls, the Lords of the Senat thought it not decent and convenient that there should be a Dictator adjoynd. The Consul having ordeined and appointed two legions for defence of the City, and parted the other eight with the Pretor L. Pinarius, bearing in mind his fathers valour and manhood, undertook the Gauls war himself, without casting lots therefore: commanding the Pretor to keep the sea-coasts, and to put the Greeks back from landing on the shore. He went himself down into the country of Penoptinum, and because he was not willing to give battell in the champion, unfenced therunto; and thought the enemy might be wearied out well enough by keeping him short, for foraging and fetching in booties, who of necessity was driven to live of prey, chose a convenient place for a standing camp. Where, as they passed the time quietly in their wards, as a settled Garrison: there cometh forth a mighty Gaul in person tall and big, for armour brave and glorious: who clattering his shield and spear together, and thereby making silence, gave defiance and challenged by his interpreter the Romans to a combat, man to man. There was one M. Valerius a Colonel of footmen, and a very young man, who thinking himself nothing less worthy of that honour than T. Manlius, having first known the Consul his pleasure, advanced himself forth apart from the rest, armed at all points. But this conflict (as touching the prowess of the men) was less notable than the other, by reason that the hand of God came between & took a part. For as the Roman was ready to joyn and cope, behold suddenly a raven seiled upon the crest his of imbrion, even full in the face of his enemy. Which at the very first, the Colonel took joyfully as a token of good luck sent from heaven. Afterwards he praised devoutly, that the God or goddesse whosoever, that sent unto him from above that augural fowl, to preface and forefigure the future event, would be favourable and gracious unto him. And so, (a wonder to be spoken) the bird not only held the place still, which it first light upon, but also, as often as the champions buckled and closed together, mounting up with the wings made at the eyes and the face of the enemy, with beak and claws both, so long, until Valerius killen him. For the Gaul being affrighted at this so strange & wondrous a sight, both his eyes dazzled, and his mind was mightily troubled. Then the raven took his rise, flew on high quite out of sight towards the East. All the while the camp on both sides was quiet hitherto. But after that the Colonel began to rise and disarme the Body of the main enemy, neither could the French keep themselves within their Stations, nor the Romans contain, but run with more speed unto their Conquerour champion. And so about the bodie of the Gaul that lay along dead, began some skirmish, and thereof grew a sharp and cruell battell: for now not only the companies of the next quarters, and corps de guard, but also the whole legions on both sides, came a broad and fought. Camilus commanded the soldiers, joyous for the victory of the Colonel, joyous also for the gods, so favourable and ready to help, for to go to battell: and shewing very often unto them the Colonel, set out bravely and enriched with the spoiles of his enemy. Follow this brave gentleman, good soldiers (quoth he) and about the dead champion of the Gauls killed their whole troops, and lay them along. In this fight appeared the help of God and man evidently: and they fought it out with the Gauls, and had no doubtfull conflict: both armies

A armies had so conceived and deeply imprinted before hand in their mind the future event of these two souldiers that had long been together. Between the foremost, whose concourse had failed others, there was a sharp conflict: but the rest of the multitude, turned back before they came to the volley of darts. And first they were scattered along the Volscian and Falern countries: but afterwards they took their wates toward Ardea and the lower Adriatick sea.

The Consul having assembled the souldiers to an audience, solemnly before them all, commended the Colonel, and rewarded him with ten oxen and a coronet of gold. Him self, by direction from the Senat, to attend the war by sea, joynd camp with the Preter. And there, because through the cowardise of the Greeks that would not come into the field, the war was like to be long and lingering, he nominated, by the authority of the Senat, T. Manlius Torquatus for the Dictator, to hold the Election of Consuls. The Dictator having named for his General of horsemen, A. Cornelius Cossus, held the Election, and with exceeding favour of the people, declared for Consul one like himself, and raising the steps of his own virtue and glory, M. Valerius Corvinus (for that was his surname afterwards) in his absence, a young man, say, three and twenty years old. T. Corvinus was so joynd companion in government a Commoner, M. Papius Lentus the fourth time. Camillus performed no memorable exploit with the Greeks: for neither were the Greeks good souldiers on land, nor the Romans at sea. At the last being kept from landing, and failing, besides other necessities, of fresh water, they left Ardea. Of what people, or of what nation in Greece this fleet consisted, is not certainly known. I would think verily, that they were the Tyrrants or potentates of Sicily, more all other. For all Greece beyond them, at that time wearied and toiled out with civil wars, much feared the greatness of the Macedonians. After the armies were discharged, and that both abroad there was peace, as also at home quietnesse, through the unity of the States: lest they should be grieved with too much joy, behold a pestilence arose in the City and constrained the Senat to command the Decemvirs, to overlook the books of Sylla, and by direction thereof, was a Lex Julia celebrated. The same year there was a Colony drawn out of the Aotians, to people Saturnum, and the town was repaired for them, which the Latins had destroyed. Also there was at Rome a league concluded with the Carthaginian Embassadors, who came of purpose to sue for society and unity. The same year continued full both at home and abroad, when T. Manlius Torquatus, and C. Plautius the second time were Consuls. The bury which was before after one, in the hundred, became now but half so much. The payment of debts was dispensed & ordered into three years by even portions, so as a fourth part should be paid out of hand. And albeit some of the Commons (for all that) were pinched therewith, yet the Senat had more regard to see credit kept with the chamber of the City, then of the difficulties of private persons. The greatest matters were well eased, in that they forbore to collect the tribute and to

The third year after that Saturnum was recified by the Volscians, M. Valerius Corvinus the second time Consul with C. Postumius, upon news of Latinum, that Embassadors from Antium went about to the nations of the Latins, soliciting them to rise up in arms, was commanded to make war upon the Volscians, before the enemies forces were greater: who put himself on his Journey with a fierce army toward Saturnum. Whether when as the Aotians and other Volscians were come to meet him, with a power provided beforehand, against any preparations from Rome, presently without any stay they joynd battel, as being through a deep hatred and long hatred, maliciously bent one against the other. The Volscians, a nation more hasty to rebel, than hardy to fight, being defeated in a battel, fled swiftly and highted space to put themselves within the wals of Saturnum. But when the wals were not able to save them, for that the town being environed and invested round with souldiers, was ready to be taken by scaling, there were upon 4000. of them, besides the common sort not meet for service, that yielded themselves. The town was rased down and burnt, only they spared the firing of Mars church. And the whole Luggage and spoil was bestowed upon the souldiers. But there were not comprised within this booty, the 4000 that yielded. Those the Consul in his triumph caused to be led bound before his chariot: and after that sold them, & brought a round sum of money into the treasury. Some write, that this number of captives, were bondslaves. And that is more like to be true, than that they should be sold, who yielded themselves. After this followed Consuls, M. Fabius Dorsuo, and Servius Sulpicius Camerinus. Then began the Auruncan war upon a sudden invasion that they made. And for fear lest the action of that one State and City, had been the resolution of the whole Latine nation and by their maintenance, there was created Dictator (as if it had been against all Latins already up in arms) L. Furius Camillus: who chose for his General of horsemen, Cn. Manlius Capitolinus. And (as the use had been in time of great troubles and sudden tumults) he mustered without any respect of immunity and Exemption, and therewith proclaimed a Cessation of all courts of law: and the legions with all speed possible were led against the Auruncans, where they found, that they carried the mind of plunderers rather then of warriors. So that in the first battel, that war was dispatched. Howbeit the Dictator, because they not only made the quarrel and warred first but also offered fight without any drawing back, supposing there were some need of Gods help withall from heaven, had vowed a temple to Juno Moneta: and after he had obtained that he vowed for and thereby was charged to perform his vow, so soon as he was returned home to Rome with victory, gave up his Dictatorship. The Senat commanded two officers called Duumvirs to be created for the edifying of that temple, according to the magnificence of the people of Rome. The place was appointed and set out on the

The Consul having imploied the Dictator his army in the Volscian war, surprised at unwarre, the town Sora out of the enemies hands. The Temple of Minerva was dedicated the year after it had been vowed, when C. Marcius Rutilius the third time, and T. Manlius Torquatus the second time, were Consuls. Immediately upon the dedication of that church, there ensued a strange wonder, like unto that old marvel of the hill Albanus: For it rained stones, and in the day time it seemed to be dark night. And the books of Sibylla being perused (for that the City now was mightily given to superstition) the Senat ordered, that there should be a Dictator named for the ordering of certain feasts and holy duties. So P. Valerius Publicola was chosen, and with him, Q. Fabius Ambustus Generall of the horimen. Order was given, that not only the Tribes should go in solemn procession with their prayers and Litanies, but also the nations that bordered upon them: with a precise direction unto them, upon what daies every one shall make supplication. That year (as it is reported) there passed heavy judgments and the Sentences of the people against the Vitrers, with whom the Ediles had commenced suit. And without any notable cause to be remembered, they grew to an Interrein. Upon which that something might be thought thereby done, both Consuls were made of the Nobles, M. Valerius Corvinus the third time, and A. Cornelius Cosus.

The Embassadors of the Campanians in the Senat at Rome.

Now from hence-forth will we treat of greater wars, both for the puissance of the enemies, and also for their far distance: as well for their spacious countries they inhabited, as long tract of time that they continued. For this year began the Romans to bear arms against the Samnits, a nation powerful in wealth, and valiant in field. After which war, fought on both sides with alternate fortune, there succeeded Pyrrhus their enemy, and after Pyrrhus the Carthaginians. To see (good Lord) the wonderfull stirs and troubles, and how often the Romans fell into extremities of perils, that their Dominion and Empire might arise unto this greatness and high state, which hath much ado to hold its own, and stand maintained. But the cause of the Romans war with the *Samnits, being in society and amity linked together, arose first from others, and not upon any quarrel between themselves. At what time as the Samnits warred unjustly (as being more mighty) upon the Sidicins: they as the weaker and forced to flee for succour unto the richer, banded with the Campanians. Who bringing with them a greater name, than power (in deed) to aid and assist their Allies, & flowing in riot and superfluous delights, hapned in the country of the Sidicins to be foiled & defeated by the other, who had been injured and hardened by continual use of arms: and so afterwards drew upon their own heads, the whole violence and poise of the wars. For the Samnits letting the Sidicins alone, went to the head, and set upon the Campanians, as it were the very fortress and castle of defence for all the borderers. For we they wist that there they might win victory as easily: but riches & honour at their hands they were to achieve much more. And when they had gained and held with a strong garrison, the hill called Tifata, that were adjoining, and commanded the City Capua. From thence they descended with a four-square ranged battell into the plain that lyeth between Capua and Tifata: where a second field was fought: In which the Campanians had the overthrow, and were beaten within their walls. Having therefore no hope near hand, and seeing the strength of their youth greatly decayed, they were constrained to seek for aid of the Romans. Whose Embassadors being admitted into the Senat, and having audience given them, spake much what to this effect. "The people of Capua, most noble Senators, hath sent us in "ambassy unto you, to crave at your hands friendship for ever, and succour for the present. Which "amity if we had requested in our prosperity, well might it sooner have begun, but knit had it been
"with a weaker bond and not so durable. For then, remembering our selves to have entred league
"and society on even ground, and in equal estate with you: friends haply we should have been as "we now are, but bounden and devoted unto you, we had never been. But now, in case by your
"commiseration and pity we be gained and won, and in our distresse, by your aid, helped and re"lieved; we must needs affectionately embrace a benefit from you received, unless we would be "thought unthankfull wretches, and unworthy of any help either of God or man. And albeit the "Samnits, have been before us intainted in friendship and confederacy, yet we think that no "sufficient bar, but that we may also be received into the same. Only thus much it ought to make "for them, as to be preferred before us in antiquity of time, and degree of honour. For in that "alliance between you and the Samnits, there is no expresse clause, no caveat or proviso contained,
"against the making of any new confederacie. And surely, alwaies heretofore ye have thought
"it cause good enough of your friendship, if the party who sought the same, were but willing "and desirous to be your friend. We Campanians (albeit our present condition suffereth us not "to speak magnificently) giving place to no nation but your selves, either for the stately port of "our City, or goodnesse, and fruitfulness, of our soil, in entring into your acquaintance, shall "not a little, I suppose increase and better your good estate. And first for the Equians and "Volscians, those eternall and perpetuall enemies of this City, they shall not so soon at any time "stir and put out their heads, but we will be streight upon their jacks. And look what ye first
"shall find in your hearts to doe for our safety, the same will we alwaies do for your Empire "and honour. And when those nations be once subdued that are between you and us (which your "vertue and fortunate felicity, promitteth will be shortly) then shall your dominions reach all the "way in a continued train, as unto us. A pitifull and lamentable case it is, that our present for"tune urgeth us to confesse: To this exigent and hard terms of extremity are we Campanians driven "even (right honourable) that subject we must be, either to our friends or to our enemies. If ye defend defende. As yours will we be; for that we have not wise Samnites. Comply ye now therefore deliberately, whether ye had rather that the Samnites should be the Lords of Capua, should be annexed unto your power and state, or that to the Samnites they should be your mercy your favour. O Noble Romans, ought it not to seem to you to extend unto all men, but especially unto those who by yielding their rest and helping hand, even above their power, unto others, that explored and humbly belong to you, are not to be treated as if they were the least of men? And yet to lay the same words upon the new and unknown of war for the Sidicini; but in very deed and especially for our selves. For considering a Neighbour Nation, bordering even upon us, to be robbed and spoiled most wrongfully by the Samnites; we well foresaw, that when the Sidicini were once let a burning, the same fire would have been kindled in our hearts. For now are not the Samnites come to us, as if they were to us, as if they were to us, as if they were to us, as if they were to us, they have sent of Quakers, offered and presented unto them. For if it had been but a revealed only of anger upon some pretended wrong, and not when and occasion, to satisfy their greedy appetite; and it not been enough for them, that they had possessed and put to the sword our Legions, once in the Samnitiene country, and a second time in Campania, and our own territory; what a cankered and a morrant malice is this which bloodied and massacred in two battles can not suffice in its rage, to make the walls of our cities, the driving away of bottles, as well of it people as cattle, the burning of villages, the ruin of the houses, the making of every place no thing but fire and sword. Could not their rage and wrath have been satisfied with all this? But it is their greedy and insatiable covetousness, and nothing else that must be filled. That is it which carrieth them, that hath led drageeth them to the assault of Capua. At it then were, when that most goodly and beautiful City will they either destroy, or be all thereof themselves. But may it please you Romans, to gain it more by your own benefit and good desire, rather than suffer them to lie upon it, by wrong and mischief. I speak not this before a people that ought to make it strange and goodly to undertake any fight and just war, if ye but shew a copy of your countenance, as if ye would aid and succour us, I suppose ye shall have no need at all of further war. The Samnites overweening of themselves and contempt of others, reacheth to us only, further it proceedeth not. So that under the very shadow of your assistance, O Romans, we may be fully covered and protected. And whatsoever we shall hereafter suffer thereby, whatsoever we shall be of our selves (even as much as we are worth) ready are we to acknowledge it to all yours. For your sake shall the Campanian ground be filled, for your benefit shall the City be fortified unto and frequented; and accounted shall we be of us, no less than founders. But ye, ye, and as the minor all gods. There shall be a borough or Colony of yours, that shall be beyond us in obsequious duty towards you. Do but afford unto us Campanians, O Noble Senators, a token of your gracious condescension, yield us your invincible name as a powerful deity, and bid us hope assuredly, that Capua shall remaine still and continue in safety. What a number think ye of all sorts and degrees of people, followed and accompanied us, when we came from thence? How left we all places filled with their vows, their prayers and tears? In what expectation now, do the Senat and of people Capua, but wives and children, and our return? Assured I am, that the whole multitude stand about the gates looking toward the high post-way that leadeth from thence thither, waiting to know what news becoming what answer, my LL. your pleasure is that we should report back from you unto them, to carefull, to heavy, to perplexed. One word presenteth unto them safety, victory, life and liberty: the other, I dread to preface what it may import. Wherefore to conclude, determine of us, either as of them that shall and will be, your confederates and faithful Allies; or else such as must be worse than nothing. After that the Ambassadors were withdrawn aside, and the Se-nat fell to counsel: although good part of them were of opinion that the greatest and weakest City of all Italy, the most plentiful country and near to the sea, might be as it were the garner and storehouse, whatsoever variable changes of corn and victuals might happen: yet they let more by keeping their faith and promise, than of that great commodity that might accrue unto them; and thus by direction of the Senat made the Consul answer. The Senat judgeth you O Campanians worthy of aid; but meet it is that we entertain your amity, so, as a more ancient society and friendship be not thereby violat and broken. The Samnites are in league, and confede-rat with us. We must needs therefore debar you from making that war against the Samnites, which should sooner dishonour the gods than hurt and wrong men. Howbeit, as equity and reason both require, we will to our Allies and friends send our Ambassadors, to intreat them to offer no violence unto you. To this answer the chief man of the Embassage (according as he had commission from home) replied and said. For as much as ye are not willing to defend our right and cause, by just and lawful power against violence and injury: your own selves, I am sure ye will maintain. Therefore my LL. of the Senat, here we yield up in your hands, and to the G Signory of the people of Rome, the whole Nation of the Capuans, the City Capua, our lands and possessions, the sacred temples of the gods, and all things whatsoever holy and profane. And whatsoever from henceforth we shall suffer and abide, we will submit as if your liege men and subjects, wholly devoted as vassals unto you. At which words they all held up their hands unto the Consul, in tears plentifully, and fell down upon their knees to the very entry of the Council house. The Senat moved with consideration of the changeable course and turn of human fortune, in the world, to see so great and mighty a people of puissance, so pompous for superfluous abundance and magnificence (at whose hands but a while before, the nations bordering had craved and begged their aid) to carry with them now to give and broken pearls, as if their own accords, to submit themselves as they had in the whole world, to the power and domination of others: were persuaded now it was a matter of truth and fatalistic, not to be shaken and be betrayed, those that thus were reduced under their protection. Neither thought they, that the people of Samnium could in any equity or colour of justice, invade that land or assault that City, which was surrendered and imposed in the imperial State of Rome. Whereupon presently they agreed to dispatch Embassadors unto the Samnites, who had incharges and commission to make declaration unto them: First, of the Campaigns petition; secondly, of the answer of the Senat returned unto them, implying the remembrance of the Samnites treaty: In all, of the Campaigns surrender. Then to request and desire them in regard of their mutual society and friendship, to spare and forbear those, that were their vassals, and not with any hostility to invade that territory, which was become subject to the people of Rome. If by this courteous dealing they could do no good, then, to command the Samnites in the name of the people and Senat of Rome, to abstain from the Clay Camp and the country of the Campaigns. When these Embassadors debated these matters in the Council House of the Samnites, they returned to front and arrogant answer again, not in these terms only, that they would go forward in the war begun; but (that which more was) the soldiers coming forth of their Council House, even whilst the Embassadors there stood, called to the captains of the cohorts, and with a loud voice commanded them forthwith to make a rode into the Campaign country, for to spoil and fetch booties. This Embassage being returned home again to Rome, the Samnites setting aside the care of all other matters, sent their heralds to demand restitution; and for default thereof, after the solemn manner so proclaim open war. Whereupon they decreed with all speed possible to propound this matter to the people; and by the consent of the people, both Consul, with two armies departed the City Valerius into Campaign, Corvinus into Samnium; and pitched their tents, Valerius at the foot of the hill Gaurus, and the other at Saricula. The Samnite legions protected themselves first to Valerius (for that way they supposed all the forces would be bent) for indignation also against the Campaigns because they were to ready one while with their own incoors, & another while in sending for the aid of others against them. And so soon as they discovered the Roman camp, in all hast (every one for his part) called loudly to their captains for to strike up and sound the battell: assuring themselves, and laying plainly, that the Romans should speed as well in incurring the Campaigns, as the Campaigns had done before them in doing the Sidicins. Valerius, after he had smiled the speeches not many daies together, with some light skirmishes, only to make trial of them what they could do, put forth the signall of battell at the last, but first exhorted his souldiers in a short speech in this wise, "That neither this new war nor new enemy should terrifie them; for as much as the fathers they warred from the City, the more cowardly Nations they were and less would still in whom they went. That they should not esteem the valour of the Samnites by the late losses & defeats of the Sidicins or Campaigns: For whatsoever they be that contend & fight together, one side or other cannot chuse, but go to the wals. The Campaigns, doubtless, had the overthrow; rather through their own effeminate tenderness, as flowing too much in excess and impetuosity of pleasures, than by their enemies hardiness and valour. And what were two only fortune battels of the Samnites, in so many ages to be set against so many honourable victories of the people of Rome? Who, from the first foundation of their City, may number more Triumphs well near than years: who have by war subdued all Nations about them, the Sabines, Hetrurians, the Larins, Hernicks, Equians, Volscians, and Auruncans. And as they ought to go into the field, every man presuming & trusting upon his own manhood and glorious warfare: so should they have an eye, and consider, under whose leading and regiment they were to enter into battell. Whether he were a man that in the hearing of his souldiers, could only make goodly and magnificent Orations, fierce in brave words, void of Military works: or he who himself knew how to handle his weapon, to advance before the standards, yet, and to be employed even in the middle of all the battell. I would have you (quoth he) my souldiers, to follow my deeds and not my words, and of me to learn, not only discipline, but also good example. I have not by bribing and flattery, nor yet by courting and Orations (usual matters among Noblemen) but by this right hand of mine, attained unto three Consulships, and to the highest honour. The time had been indeed, when a man might have said thus unto me: No marvel, For why? You were a gentleman of noble blood, descended from those that were the deliverers of their country: & in the same year, that the City had first a Consul, this house of yours had the Consulship. But now the case is altered, the way unto a Consulship, is as open to you Commoners, as to us of the Nobility. Now is it not the guerdon of birth and gentry, as aforesaid: but the reward and recompence of virtue and valour. And therefore my souldiers, shoot at the highest dignities, and aim at sovereign honour. And although ye that are men, have by the grace and approbation of the gods, given unto me this new addition of surname (Corvinus), yet have not I forgot the ancient name of the Publiculus, appropriat unto our family. I love and ever will (as alwayes I have done) the Commons of Rome, at all times alike both abroad in wars, and also at home in peace, as well a private person, as in my offices, were they little, or were they much: whilst I was Tribune, whilst I was Consul, and no changing have I been throughout all my Consulships, one after another. Now for this present enterprise which we are about with the help of God, & in his name, have a call with me

Defiance given by the Romans to the Samnites

A coat of arms of purple or scarlet colour hanging forth at the General his pavilion. The exhortation of Valerius Corvinus to his souldiers.

A ¹ me for a new and fresh Trough out the Samnites. Never was there a General more familiar with his soldiers: as willing as the master of them, to lay his hand upon any base offices that that were to be done: yea, and in the very training and exercises of the soldiers, at what time as equally by matters of shame, and strength, one with another, gently would be otherwhiles take the lead, as well as the victory, and each from one consequence still: not rejecting or setting any one whatsoever would seem to mock him, or be his mate. For deed, designs and bouy to make him more, and as occasion required: in his words, so little mindfull of the freedom of others: than respective of his own place and dignity, and (then which there is nothing more popular) look on what vestment dimesnour & carriage of himself, he sought to attend unto honours and promotions with the same he bare them and went through with them. Therefore the whole army with incredible cheerfulness accepting this exhortation of their Captain, lifted forth of the camp into the field. Never was there buttal fought more indifferently on both sides. Their hope was like, their forces equal: with full trust and confidence in themselves, and yet without contempt of their enemies. The Samnites, for to what their courage presumed upon their fresh and late achieved age, and their double victory but few days before. The Romans on the contrary side, stood upon their honour and reputation for the space of four hundred years, and their conquests every since the foundation of their City. Yet they were troubled both the one and the other, to deal with a new and unknown enemy. The manner of their fight showed what skirmishes they carried. For the Romans were more for a good while they stood on neither part in cold one foot.

C Then the Consul, seeing they could not by more force be caused to retreat, thought to let a sudden fear among them: and therefore allowing by leading in the footmen upon the foremost ensignes, to break their ranks, and put them in disorder. But when he saw, that in so small room of ground they tolled themselves in vain, and could not well manage their troops and comets, nor break in upon the enemies, he rode back again to the van and forefront of the Legions, and dismounted from his back. "What are footmen (quoth he) when all is done, must do the deed I see well. Come on then, and as ye behold me (which way faster I go) by dint of sword to make a way and entrance into the enemies battell: so every man for himself, down with him that stands next in his way. Straightwayes shall ye see, that where as now there is a great and strong stand glittering and bent upon us, there will be a wide lane made over their slain carcasses. The had not to loon spoken these words, but the footmen at the Consuls commandment, ran upon both the wings and points, and made way for the footmen to enter the main battell. First and foremost the Consul in person charged the enemy, and whomever he happened to encounter, him he killed in the place. This goodly sight set the rest on fire: and then every man did his best, laid about him manfully and carried it afore him right worthily. The Samnites stood to it still and moved not, albeit they got more knocks and wounds then they gave. Thus when the fight had continued a good while, notwithstanding much bloody slaughter about the Samnites ensignes: yet no flying was there on any side: so resolute were they, by death only to be vanquished. Whereupon the Romans feeling their own strength for weariness decayed and spent, and but little day left, inflamed with anger, gave a fresh charge, all at once upon the enemies. Then (and not before) began they to shrink and give ground, and ending to flight: Then were the Samnites taken prisoners and slain in great numbers. Few or none had escaped alive, but that the night came to fall upon them, that interrupted the victory, rather then ended the battell. Both the Romans themselves confessed, they never fought with a more stubborn and obstinate enemy: and the Samnites also being demanded the primitive cause, which forced them (so fully bent as they were) to run away at the last, said, that the Romans seemed to have burning fire in their eyes, and to carry in their faces and villages the furious rage of mad and frantic persons: and thereat first began they to be affrighted, more then at any thing else. When fearfulness of them, they bewailed not only by the present event of the battell, but also by their dislodging and departure away in the night. The morning after the Romans were masters of their empty and naked camp: unto which all the whole multitude of the Campanians came running in number to rejoice and congratulate their victory.

A cruel battle between the Romans and Samnites, and of the victory of the Romans.

E But this joy had like to have been fully diminished with an overthrow and defeat in Samnites. For Corvinus the Consul being departed from Samnites, had engaged his army unwisely with in a forest, through which went an hollow valley or lawn, for and on both sides with an ambush: neither discovered he his enemies over his head, before such time as he could not retire with his ensignes into a place of safe retreat. But while the Samnites stood only until he had brought his army fully down into the bottom of the vale, P. Decius, a Colonell of footmen, espied in the forefront one little high hill, which commanded the place where the enemies lay encamped: and as it was for an army heavily armed, and charged with carriage, hard to be got up unto: so for them that were lightly appointed and burdened, nothing difficult. He perceiving the Consul troubled in mind and affrighted, See you not (quoth he) O Antonius Cornelian yonder hilltop above the enemy? That is the very fortress of our hope and safety, so be that we can give the same lustily, as the Samnites have left it blindly. I require no more of you, but to let me have the Principes and best men of one only Legion. And when with them I have once seized the top thereof, let forward you from hence and fear not, neither make doubt to save your self and the army. For the enemy being under us, and lying open to all our shot, cannot stir without great loss and present mischief. As for us, either the fortune of the people of Rome, or our own manhood shall work out.

The policy and valour of P. Decius.

P. Decius to his soldiers,

our evasion. Being commended by the Consul, and having received that troop and guard which he demanded, he marched close through the woody part, and was not detected by the enemy before he approached the place that he went to get. And whilst they were united there, and woodred, and wholly turned their eyes to him, he both gained the Consul some time to withdraw his army into a more convenient and open ground, and possessed himself of the hill (top) and there rested. The Samnites, whilst they saw their engines to be so, (as men that lost the advantage of both sides) could neither make after the Consul, but through the same valley, whereas a while before they had him under their foot, nor yet erect their standards, and march up the hill, which Decius over them had already gained. But being more angry with those, that should have disappointed them of the fair means they had of a brave exploit, and considering within the necessity of the place, and their small number which were left behind, they were one while of mind to go upon the hill round with armed men, and to keep Decius from the Consul; another while, to make them way, that when they were come down into the valley, they might set upon them. Thus whilst they were in doubt what to do, the night overtook them. Decius at the first, was in good hope to fight with them from the higher ground, as they ascended up against the hill; but afterwards he marvelled much, that they neither began to charge upon him, nor yet when they were disappointed and put by that way, sought an advantage of the ground, fortified themselves with trench and rampier, and other proper works. Then calling the Centurions unto him, who were unskilful in the use of the sword, or in any other service, with some back-bone and stout heart, and now got the victory of the Samnites and Campanians. To see their engines waving hither and thither: one while huddled they are in one together, another while advanced and dispersed at length. As for munitions and fortifications, no man began to any; and by this time we might have been enriched round about. But if we stay any longer then for our victory, we might be counted lazy like those, that on the coast with spears, that whilst day light serves, we may see in what places they quarter their guards, and what way we may get from hence and escape. All this while he to climb and discover himself in person, clad in a common soldiers jacket, leading with him the other captains in the habit of their soldiers; to the end that the enemies might not take mark of the General himself, how he went about to view them. After this, when he had disposed the tenters, and corps de garde, to all the rest he commanded a watchword to be given, that when the trumpet sounded the second watch, they should come all unto him armed, and make no noise at all. When they were further assembled with silence, as he had commanded, "This silence my fellow soldiers (quoth he) must ye keep whilst ye hear me speak, and forbear all giving silent by uttering your voices as soldiers are to do. When I shall have delivered my mind to you, let as many as like thereof, go softly on the right hand, and not speak a word: and look what side is greater, that count shall stand and take place. And now listen what my counsel is, and what I would have done. The enemy hath not invested you here, so men either had away for fear, or lagging behind for sloth and idleness. The place have ye won by manhood: by manhood must ye from thence escape. In coming hither, ye have already saved a brave army of the people of Rome: and now by breaking out from hence, save your own selves. Worthy you are that being but a few, have incouraged many, ye should not stand in need your selves of any man's help. With that enemy ye have to deal, who yesterday through their senseless sloth, over-dipped their happy opportunity to defeat our whole army: who were so blind, that they saw not this hill of great importance even over their heads, before it was by us gained: who being so many thousands, could neither debar us from climbing up, as few as we were, nor when we had got the place, compass us about with a trench, having so much day as they had. These enemies, whom ye have thus deluded & beguiled, whilst they were awake, and had their eyes light, ye are to deceive when they are fast asleep, nay, you must do so indeed, there is no other remedy. For at that pass we are now, that I am rather to shew you, in what terms of extremity ye stand, then to advise you to the execution of any good counsel. It is no consulting at this time whether ye should here stay, or depart hence; for that besides your weapons, and hearts setting up rest upon their weapons, fortune hath left you nothing at all. And die we must without doubt for hunger and thirst, if we dread the swords point more than befuteth hardy men, and valorous Romans. One way there is therefore, and but one way of safety, even to make a brave fall through and away. This must we do, either by day or by night. And that doubt is soon cleared. If we look for the morrow day, what hope have we, but that the enemy will call a ditch and bank even round about us: who already as ye see lying under this little rising, have compassed it with their very bodies. Now, if so be that the night be a convenient and favourable time for irruptions and sallies, as it truly is: then, this hour of the night certainly, is of all other the fittest. At the second watches sound ye are come hither, at which time all men are in their most sound and dead sleep. Amid their bodies being fast asleep, shall ye go. Either by silence deceive them unawares, or if they perceive you, alight them with a sudden outcry. Do but follow me, as ye have done already, I will follow the same fortune that guided me hither. Now as many of you that think this good counsel, and a course like to speed well, make no more ado but pass on my right hand. So they all passed, and followed after Decius as he went through the quarters void of watchmen and warders. Now were they escaped the minds of the camp, when a soldier, as he clambered over the watchmens bodies, lying heavy asleep, chanced to stumble at a shield, which gave a sound again. Whereat the watchman being awakened, raised his next fellow

A low, and they being start up, call up other, not knowing whether they were enemies or fellows, whether the garrison of Decius on the hill was broken forth, or the Consul had surprised the camp. Decius then, seeing his souldiers could not passe clear and undeterred, commanded them to let up a shout. And therewith he amazed them with a new fright, who were already drowned in drowsiness, so as they could neither take weapons readily, nor make heed against them, nor yet pursue after them. Whiles the Samnites were thus amazed and in confusion, the Roman garrison had by this time slain the warders whom they met, & were marching towards the Consul his camp, as yet was somewhat of the night to come: but now they seemed to be safe, and past all danger. Then Decius on forward in this courage of yours, O hardy Romans; This your passage and return to and fro, all ages shall extoll and praise. But for the full sight and view of so great valour, we had need of broad day light: for ye deserve better, than that the still night should hide you in so glorious a return of yours into the camp. Let us here rest, and wait for day. His words were obeyed: and so soon as the day brake, he dispatched a messenger afore unto the Consul: and so with exceeding joy they made speed to the camp. And when it was known in the camp by the privy watchmen, that they who had put their lives in most dangerous hazard for the safety of them all, were themselves returned safe: then every one came forth to meet them as fast as they could, with praises and commendations, calling them both all & some, their saviours: praising the immortal gods, and giving thanks, yea, and extolling Decius to the skie. This was the triumph of Decius in the camp, as he marcheth through the midst thereof with his armed garrison, whiles every man cast his eyes upon him, and made him a Coronell, equal to the Consul in all kind of honour. When he was come to the Proetorium, the Consul by sound of trumpet, called all the army to an audience, and as he entered into a discourse of the deserved praises of Decius, Decius himself interrupteth him, and cutteth off his speech. Whereupon the Consul put off the Oration. Decius then perswadeth the Consul, to set aside all other things, and whiles the occasion and opportunity was offered, he urged him effectually, to give an alarm to the enemies, both while they were amazed with this scare by night, and also lay scattering about the hill, as it were in their severall iconces. Besides, he thought verily that some were sent out after him to make fresh suit, and wandered astray in the Forrest. So the Legions were commanded to arm, and being departed out of the camp, and by means of the espials better acquainted with the Forrest, they were conducted by a wider and more open way toward the enemy, whom suddenly they surprised & charged, unawares and unprovided as he was. And for as much as the Samnite souldiers were stragling abroad, and most unarmed, and could neither rally themselves and take arms, nor retire into their trench, they drave them at first with fear into their camp: after, whiles the guards about it were disordered and troubled, they were masters thereof also. The noise was heard all about the hill, and caused every man to flie out of his hold. So a great part of them took their heels before the enemy could come. But so many as for fear were driven within the trench (& those were some 30000) were all slain: and the camp rifled & spoiled. The Consul having achieved this exploit, called an assembly: and not only finished the praises of Decius, as he before began, but also amplified them with fresh commendation of this new service. And besides other military gifts, he rewarded him with a crown of gold, a hundred oxen, and one special white one, fat and fair above the rest with gilded horns. The souldiers who together with him held the hill aforesaid, had given unto them for ever after, a double proportion of corn, and for the present one ox a piece, and two single liveries. After the Consul his reward was bestowed, the Legionary souldiers themselves put upon Decius his head a wreath of green grass, in token of a delivery from siege, and with notable shouts and loud cries approved this gift. Another chaplet or garland, also, in token of like honour, did his own band and company set upon him. And thus being adorned with these ornaments of honour, he sacrificed that chosen white ox unto Mars; and bestowed his hundred oxen among those his souldiers, who had accompanied him in that exploit and service. To the same souldiers the legions gave a pound measure of wheat meal, and a sextar of wine, a piece. All these particulars were performed and done with great cheerfulness, and seconded with shouting and acclamation of the souldiers, to signifie their good liking and generall assent.

P. Decius to his souldiers.

P. Decius solemnly praised and rewarded.

The souldiers also recompensed.

* Sextarius much about our wine measure called a quart.

A third battel was fought at Suessula: wherein by M. Valerius, was put to flight the host of the Samnites. Whereupon, the whole manhood and flower of their youth that remained at home were sent for and assembled, determining to fight it out and trie their fortune once for all. Fearfull news hereof came from Suessula to Capua: and from thence carriers and posts were dispatched to Valerius the Consul, for aid. Forthwith he advanced the standards, and leaving the carriages belonging to the camp, with a strong guard, he marched forward in great hast: and not far from the enemy, took a little plot of ground to encamp in; as having besides their horses of service, no beasts at all for carriage, nor a rabble of slaves and varlets that follow the camp. The Samnites (as if without further delay they were to fight) embattelled themselves. But seeing none to encounter them, they came with banner displayed to the very camp of the enemies. And there so soon as they beheld the souldiers upon the rampier, and understood by them that were sent out of purpose to view the circuit of the camp, in how smal compass they had fortified, guessing thereby how few their enemies were; there ran a noise throughout the army, to make no more ado but to fill up the ditches, to cut through the banks, and so presently to break into the camp. And even in that rabnесс had the war been decided and dispatched, but that the captains held in the violence of the souldiers. But for as much as their own number so great, required good store of victuals, and was both by their lying before Suessula, and also by their long stay there without fight brought to scarcity well-near of all things: it was thought good, that whiles the enemies kept within their hold as affrighted, the souldiers should be sent about the country's foraging. In which mean time they supposed that the Romans likewise, would have spent all, who were thither come lightly appointed, and had brought no more corn with them then they could carry on their shoulders, besides their armour. The Consul having espied the enemies stragling over the country, and their guards slenderly manned, after a brief exhortation to his souldiers, led them forth to give an assault upon their camp. Which when they had won at the first shout and onser, and killed more of the enemies within their tents, then either upon the gates or upon the rampier: he caused the ensignes that he had taken, to be brought together into one place: and leaving there two legions, for a guard and defence, with a straight charge, that untill he came again, they should forbear to rife and make spoil, he went forward in order of battell. And when the horsemen which he made out afore, had like hunters driven the scattred Samnits, as it were, within net and toil, he fell upon them and committed an exceeding great slaughter. For frightened as they were, they knew neither at what signall they should rally themselves together, nor whether they should make speed to the camp, or flee further away. But so great was their fright and flight both, that there were brought to the Consul, 40000 shields, more indeed then there were men slain: besides 170 ensignes, together with those that were won in the camp. Then returned he unto the enemies tents, and bestowed the whole pillage there, upon the souldiers. And such was the happy successe of this war, that it both caused the Falisci being in truce, to sue unto the Senat, for a league: and also turned the Latins, who had prepared their forces already from warring with the Romans, to wage war upon the Peligni. Neither rested the fame of this so fortunate a victory within the marches of Italy: for even the Carthaginians also, sent their Embassadors to Rome, with gratulation, and a present of a golden crown weighing twenty five pounds, to be set up in Jupiter's Temple within the Capitoll. Both Consuls triumphed over the Samnits: and Dicius followed after, all goodly to be seen, with his gifts and worthy praises: whiles the souldiers, as their manner was, with merry jests and rude ditties, magnified and renowned the name of the Colonell no less than the Consuls.

A notable defeat of the Samnits.

After this the Embassadors of the Campanians and the Suessians had a day of audience: and upon their humble request it was granted, that thither should be sent a standing garrison to winter there, for to stop the excursions and invasions of the Samnits. But Capua, even then no good place for military discipline, wrought an alteration in the souldiers there: who having once got a taste, and taken a delight in a world of pleasures of all sorts, as ite forgot their own natural country. For they of the garrison, began to lay plots and devise how to get Capua from the Campanians: even by the same wicked practise, by which themselves had won it first from the ancient possessors and inhabitants, saying, "It made no matter, and they were but rightly served, in case their own precedent lewd example, should return upon their own heads. Again, why should the Campanians, not able to defend themselves, nor maintain their liberties and goods, be L.L. of the most plentiful country of Italy, and of a City answerable and correspondent therunto, rather then the victorious army, which with their sweat and blood had repelled and expelled the Samnits from them? And was it any reason, that they who had yeilded to be vassals unto them, should enjoy that fruitful and pleasant tract, while they themselves wearied with fighting, struggled still and wrestled in a pestilent air, and dry barren soil, about the City of Rome, and within that City, indured the letted, inveterat and intestine mischief & plague of usury, that surcharged them daily more and more? Whiles these projected conspiracies were contrived in secret conventicles, and as yet not broached and divulged to all mens knowledge, the new Consul, C. Martius Rutilius came in place: whose lot it was to be L. Deputy of the province Campania, leaving his fellow Q. Servilius in the City, who having intelligence by the Captains and Colonels, of all the particularities of those designs: being a wise man, both for his old age and long experience (as who was now Consul the fourth time, and withal had been Censor and Dictator) thought it best to dissemble the matter, and to make void and frustrat the present heat and outrage of the souldiers, by deferring and prolonging their hope, as if they might put in execution their plots at their best leisure, whensoever they pleased. He raiseth therefore a rumour, that the garrisons should in the same towns winter again the year following. [For divided they were into sundry Cities of Campania: & the web begun at Capua, was spread from thence through all the forces.] By means of this good respite to bethink themselves and advise of these matters, the mutiny for the present was well quieted. The Consuls then led forth the souldiers into the summer places of abode and repose, and purpose while he had the Samnits in quietness to cleanse the army by the caltheing & discharging those busie bodies and troublesome spirits: pretending colourably, and saying, That some of them had served already so long as the law required, others were well now kept in years, or waxen feeble and their strength decayed. Some had their passports limited, and were sent home: at the first one by one singled out, afterwards, certain whole cohorts or bands, as having wintered far from their dwelling places, from their goods and substance. Under a pretence and colour also of military services and imployments, whiles some were dispatched one way, some another, a great part of them were rid clean away. All this multitude, the other Consul and the Pretor kept still at Rome; devising this cause, and that, of delays and abiding behind. And verily at first, they being not aware of this delusion, were not unwilling to visit home. But after that they perceived, that

A Mutiny and conspiracy of the garrison souldiers at Capua.

The singular policy of M. Rutilius the Consul.

A neither they who were dismissed sat retired again unto their colours, nor any in a manner discharged else, but such as had been in winter garrison at Capua, and those especially, who of them were the authors of the conspiracy; first they marvelled, and afterwards feared in very deed, that their conspirators were revealed and come to light; and that now presently they should be put to examinations and tortures, abide arraignment and judgement, be executed secretly apart one by one, and suffer the insolent totalty, and cruel tyranny of Consuls and Senators over them. These and such like speeches for a while they whispered secretly; till at length in the camp, when they saw the principal authors of the mutiny, who were the sinews and strength thereof, by the wily policy of the Consul to be diminished from them. One cohort of them, being not far from Anagnin lat them down at Lanuvium, in a narrow passage of wood between the sea and the mountains, to intercept and stay, whomsoever the Consul sent about this or that pretended business as is above said. Soon were there gathered together a right strong power; and nothing wanted to make a shew of a full army, but only a head and Captain. And disordered as they were, they went robbing and spoiling, as far as the Alban country, and under the hill of Alban they encamp themselves within a trench and rampier. Which work being finished, they spend the rest of the day in consultation about choosing a Commander, little trusting any one there present in place. And who possibly (say they) could be sent for as far as from Rome? What Senator or Commoner was there, that either wittingly would venture upon so great and dangerous an enterprise: or to whom the cause of an army, engaged upon an issue received, might safely be committed? The next morning, whilst they reasoned still about this point, and sadly debated the matter, some of the wandering and vagrant foragers of the Country thereabout bring certain intelligence, that Titus Quinctius implored himself in hospitality, and held a farm in Tusculum, minding neither the City, nor dignities of State and Common weal. This man was come of noble lineage, and having served with great credit and honour in the wars by a wound received, was lame of a leg, and gave over soldiery, determining to lead the rest of his life in the country, sequestered far from all courtship and ambitious suing for civil offices. They had not so soon heard his name, but presently they took knowledge of the man, and (that which might turn to their good) agreed with one accord, he should be sent for. Small hope there was that he would willingly do any thing: they thought therefore to use force and to bring him to it by fear. So, in the dead time of the night, they D that were sent thereto, entered the farm house, and finding Quinctius found and fast asleep, they awakened him: propounded unto him either rule and honour, or else present death: and no mean between, in case he made stay and refused to go with them: and so they haled and brought him to their camp. Incontinently he was saluted L. General at his first coming. And when the man was affrighted at this sudden and wonderful occurrence, they endue him with the ornaments and ensigns to that honor belonging, and will him to lead them as their commander to the City of Rome. Thus having plucked up the standards, in this heady fit of their own, rather then upon any advice or counsel of their captain, they march in warlike manner with an army toward Rome, within eight miles of the City, upon the easie or street way, now called Appia Via: and had approached immediately in that train to the very City, but that they heard there was a power coming against them, and a Dictator created to withstand them, to wit M. Valerius Corvinus, together with L. Emilius Mamercus General of horsemen. So soon as they were come in interview E one of another, and took knowledge of the armor and ensigns: the remembrance of their native country wrought with them straightwaies a mitigation of their mood. They were not yet so far gone, nor so hardy, as to shed civil blood: neither had they knowledge of any other wars but foreign: and the uttermost rage and maddest fit that ever they proceeded unto, was counted their Secession and departure away from their own countrymen. And therefore both captains and soldiers on either side sought means to meet together, and draw to imparle. Quinctius for his part, who having had already his hands full of wars in defence of his country, could worse brook taking arms against the time: Corvinus likewise for himself, as one that with loving affection embraced all his fellow-citizens, but the soldiers especially, and above all others those of his own army that fought F under his banner, came forth to a parle. And forthwith as soon as he was once known, he had no lesse reverence done of unto him of the adverse part, than silence and audience given of his own men. The immortal gods (quoth he) O soldiers as well those which are common to you all, as mine own particular patrons, when I took my leave of the City, I adored and worshipped in this wise, craving humbly upon my knees at their hands, to vouchsafe me the honour, not of a victory over you, but of procuring concord and unity among you. Occasions there have been, and will be know else where, to win glory and warlike renown: From hence, peace onely is to be sought. And even that which among my vowes that I made I beought to devoutly of the immortal gods, it lieth in you to make me enjoy. Doe but call to minde that neither in Samnium, nor among the Volscians yee are encamped, but upon Roman ground: that those hills which yee behold, are the hills of G your native soile: this army which yee see, are of your own Countrymen and fellow Citizens: and my selfe your Consul, under whose conduct and Auspice, yee have the yeare past twice defeated the Samnite legions, twice by mere force wooon their campe, and driven them out of the field. "noblenesse yee have had triall of, not by any wrongs done, but by good turnes on "your part received. Authour have I been of no proud law, nor cruell Act of Senat "against you: a man in all my government and rule that I bare, more rigorous to my "selfe than severe to you. And if ever there were one, who might be proud either of "Noble race and gentry, or of his own vertus and valour, of majesty and high calling or "honourable dignities, of such progenitors am I descended, such proofe of prowesse have I "given: at that age attained I to Consular honour, and being three and twenty years old,
 "I was able to have been feared and dread, not of Commons onely, but also of the Sena"tors. But what deed or word hath passed from me in your knowledge, more grievous
 "and odious when I was once Consul then all the time I was but a Colonell the same course held
 "I still during my two Consulships ensuing: and such shall my carriage be, and none other,
 "whiles I am Dictator: that I will be no more mild and gracious to these here about "me that are mine and my countries souldiers, then to your selves affronting, who are,
 "I tremble to speake it forth, mine enemies. Ye shall therefore draw sword upon me, before
 "I draw upon you. The trumpets from thence shall begin sound, the shouting from thence "shall arise, the charge from thence shall be given first, if we must needs go to it and "fight. Now, find in your hearts (if you can) to do that which neither your fathers nor "grandfathers before you ever could: no, nor they who went away and departed unto
 "the mount Sacer, nor those who afterwards held and kept the Asiatine. Expect, untill
 "your mothers and wives, with their hair hanging about their ears, come forth of the City
 "to meet with you one by one, as sometimes they did to Coriolanus. Then, the Volscian "legions were quieted and pacified, because they had one Roman for their leader: will "not yee then, being a whole army, all of the Romanes, surcease this unkind and im-
 "pious warre? And thou T. Quintius, howsoever thou art come there to stand, whe"ther with or against thy will: in case there be no remedy, but fight wee must, retire thy selfe "amongst the hindermost: nay, with more honesty, lie thou shalt, and shew thy naturall coun-
 "trimen a fair paire of heeles, then fight against thy country. But stand still hardly with ho"nour and credit among the formost to make attonement: thou shalt be a truce-maker in this our "parley and conference, to all our goods. Ask and have, any reasonable and indifferent con"ditions: although in truth we were better to yeeld unto hard and unequal capitulations,
 "than wickedly and ungodly, one to fight with another. T. Quintius with teares gush-
 "ing out at his eyes, turning to his owne companies: "And even me also (quoth he)
 "O souldiers (if need there be at all of mee) yee have a much better captaine for peace than "warre. As for him who even now uttered those words in your hearing, was neither
 "Volscian nor Samnit, but a Romane, even your owne Consul sometime, souldiers, and "your own Generall heretofore: whose Auspicate conduct, you having tried for you,
 "and in your defence: doe not prove now against your selves to your perdition. Others
 "had the Senate to lend as captaines, who would have fought more maliciously with you: but "they have made choice of him who above all others, could beare with you, yes, and for"bear you that have been his souldiers: whom you of all others especially might trust, as ha"ving been your Generall. Peace, yee see, even they desire that are to get the victory. M "And what is it then we ought and should desire? Why then let we not anger and "hope aside, two false motives, two deceitfull guides and counsellors; and betake
 "our selves and all wee have to a man of approved trust and fidelity? These words being "liked well of all (as appeared by a Generall shout) T. Quintius went forth before the "ensignes in the forefront, and pronounced that the souldiers should be at the Dictatour his "devotion and pleasure: beseeching him to consider and undertake the cause of poor and "wretched citizens: and having taken it into his hands, to maintaine and protect the same, ac"cording to that faithfulness wherewith hee used to governe the Commonweale. As for "himselfe privately, he would not intend ought for his owne security: neither repoled
 "he hope in any things else but innocency. The souldiers indeed were to be capitulate, as N
 "once heretofore the Commons, and a second time the legions had done with the "Senatours: namely, that this their revolt and pety rebellion might not be laid un"to their charge, and their hurts and utter undoing. Then the Dictatour, after hee
 "had first commended Quintius, and willed the rest to be content and of good cheer, rode
 "post to the City, and by the advice of the Senatours, preferred a bill unto the people "in the grove Petelium: That the mutiny and insurrection should cause no man's fear,
 "and danger. He besought the Quirites also of this much favour besides, That nei"ther in jest nor earnest, this should be laid in no mans dish. The same time there was "proposed besides, a sacred military law under pain of death. That no souldiers name
 "once entred into the muster after his booke, should be raised out against his will. With O
 "this branch annexed over and besides, That no man who had been aforetimes a co-
 "lonell or Tribune, should after have the leading of bands, and be a Corporall. This was fol"lowed hard and urged by those of the conspiracy, in regard of one P. Salustius, who in maner
 "each other year had been either a Colonell, or a chief Centurion, whom now they call Pri-
 "mipili. Him the souldiers spighted much, and were maliciously set against, because he had alwaies
 "opposed

A posed himself against their conspiracies and innovations, and took not part with them who fled from Lanula. But when this one point could not be obtained of the Senat, for the favour they bare to Salonius: then Salonius himself besought the Senators that they would not regard his honour more than the concord of the whole City: and so at length it also was granted and enacted. As unreasonable a demand was this also, That if harfennus (and that was triple at that time) some Alles should be deducted, for that they also had withstood by conspiracy. Over and besides, I find in some writers, that L. Genucius, a Tribune of the Commons, published this Law unto the people, That Urry might be made altogether unlawfull. Likewise in other Acts of the Commons it was provided, That no man within ten years space should be capable of the same Office twice: nor in one year bear two Offices: and that both Consuls might be of the Commons. Which if they all were granted to the Commons, it appeareth that this insurrection carried some sway and force with it. In other Chronicles it is recorded, that neither Valerius was chosen Dictator, but that all this business was by the Consuls managed: nor so great a multitude of Conspirators rose, before they came to Rome, but even in Rome took up, nor yet that they came by night, in forcible manner into T. Quinctius farm house, but in the dwelling house of C. Attianus: and that he was taken up by the rebels to be their General, and from thence went as far as four miles end, and there encamped in a fortified place: that the motion of Concord arose not from the Captains, but that of a sudden when both Armies stood ranged in order of battell they fell to greeting one another: and that the souldiers began to take one another by the hands and embrace with tears: and that the Consuls seeing the souldiers so backward from fight, were forced to move the Senat for an accommodation. So as among ancient writers, there is no certainty set down, but that sedition there was, and the same appeared. But the rumor thereof, and the cruel war which the Samnites began, withdrew certainations from the Romans society and alliance: For besides the faithless and naturally League (a long time) of the Latines: the Privernates also with sudden rodes, invaded and wasted Norba and Signa, two Colonies of the Romans near bordering and adjoyning.

The Eighth Book

Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the Foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the Eighth Book.

The Latines, together with the Capuans revolted: and the Latines having sent their Embassadors to the Senat (of Rome) offered and presented peace, upon this condition only, that they would create one of their Consuls out of them. This Embaslie thus declared, Annius their Pretor, who had audience in the Capitall, in going down from thence, took such a fall, that he died in the place. T. Manlius caused his own son to lose his head, because, contrary to his expresse commandment, he had fought against the Latines, notwithstanding his good success in that combat. At what time as the Romans were greatly distressed, and like to lose the field, P. Decius then Cons. with Manlius devoted and offered himself to present death, for to save the Army: and setting spurs to his horse, rode into the midst of the enemies battell: where he was slain, and by his death recovered victory to the Romans. The Latines yielded and rendered themselves. When T. Manlius returned into the City, there was not one of all the youth came forth to meet him, and do him honour. Minutia, a professed Vestall Virgin, was condemned for her incest or incontinent life. The Ausonians being subdued, a Colony was planted in Cales, and another likewise in Fregella. Many Roman dames were detected of practising poison: and most of them were forced to drink of their own empoisoned cups first, whereof they died presently. Whereupon was the first Law then ordained against poisoning. The Privernates, when they rebelled were vanquished, and afterwards endued with the Burgesie of the City of Rome. The Palatopolitans were defeated in battell first, and after siege, surrendered upon Composition. Quintius Publilius, who blocked them within their walls, was the first man that had his Commission renewed, and continued still in government, when the ordinary time was expired: and by means of the Consuls had a triumph granted unto him. The common people were delivered from the danger of their creditors, by occasion of the filthy lust of one of them, Lu. Papirius, who would have forced, and against nature abused C. Publilius, a debtor of his. When L. Papirius the Dictator was returned from his Army into the City, for to take the Auspices anew, by reason of some error supposed in the former, Q. Fabius the General of the horsemen, having in his absence espied the opportunity and advantage of performing a worthy exploit, gave battell contrary to his Edict, and put the Samnites to the worse. For which cause, when the Dictator would seem to punish him accordingly, Fabius made an escape and fled to Rome. And when his cause would not bear him out, he had his pardon, at the earnest sute and prayers of the people. This book containeth also the fortunate exploits against the Samnites.

The Eighth Book of T. Livius.

NOW was C. Plautius Consul the second time, with L. Emilius Mamercus, when as the Setines and Norbans brought tidings to Rome of the Privernats revolt, with complaints of harms sustained at their hands. News came likewise, that an Army of Volscians, under the conduct of the Antians, were encamped at Sarricum. Both these wars fell by lot to Plautius. Who taking his journey first to Privernum, forthwith had them battel: and with no great conflict gave his enemies the overthrow. The Town was won and restored again to the Privernats, with a strong garrison therein placed; but two parts of their Lands were taken from them. The Army thus having obtained victory, was conducted thence to Sarricum against the Antians. Where was a cruel battel fought with much bloodshed on both sides: and when as the tempestuous and stormy weather parted them asunder, before that either side inclined to victory, the Romans no whit wearied with that conflict so doubtful, addressed themselves to fight against the morrow. But the Volscians having taken a view and account what men they had lost in fight, were not of like mind to adventure the hazard again: and therefore as vanquished men they dislodged by night in disorder, and fearfully took their way to Arinum, leaving behind them their wounded, and part of their baggage. Great store of armour was there found, both upon and among the slain bodies of the enemies, and also within the Camp. Which the Consul promised to dedicate to dame Luna, and so he foraged and spoiled the confines of the enemies, even as far as the sea coast. But against the other Consul Emilius, who was entred into the Sabellian land, neither were the Samnites encamped, nor their Legions opposed any where. Whiles therefore with fire and sword he wasted their Countrey, the Samnites Embassadors came unto him, craving peace: but being by him posted off to the Senate, after they had audience given, they let fall their stout stomacks, and requested peace for themselves with the Romans, and liberty to make war against the Sidicins: which petition they enforced with more reason and equity. "First, in that they had entred into amity with the people of Rome, during their prosperity, and not as the Campains in their adversity: again, they were to take arms against the Sidicines, enemies alwaies to themselves, and never freinds to the people of Rome: who also, "neither in peace (as the Samnites) sued for friendship and alliance, nor in time of war (as the Campains) sought for aid and succour: and finally, were neither under the protection of the people of Rome, nor yet their vassals and subjects. When as T. Emilius the Prætor had consulted with the Senate, about these points demanded by the Samnites, and that the LL. thought good that the league with them should be renewed; the Prætor in the name of the rest made answer to the Samnites, "That neither the fault was in the people of Rome, that the confederacy between them was not perpetual; neither gainstaid they, but so far as much as they were weary themselves first, and repented of the war commenced through their own default, the league might yet be newly made again. Touching the Sidicins, they would be no hinderance, but that the Samnite people, might use their liberty and do what they thought best, either for war or peace. The League being thus concluded and confirmed, and they returned home, presently the Roman Army was brought from thence upon receipt of a years pay, and corn for three months, according to the capitulation covenanted with the Consul, in consideration of a truce granted, untill their Embassadors were returned.

The Samnites, with the same forces which they had employed to withstand the Roman war, went forth against the Sidicins with undoubted hope, speedily to win the City of their enemies. Then, had the Sidicines before made an offer to yield themselves unto the Romans, but seeing the Nobles to reject them as coming too late, and wrested as it were perforce from them in their last extremity, they tendered the same to the Latines, who were already of their own accord risen up, and had taken arms. The Campains likewise (so ready and forward were they to bear in mind an injury of the Samnites, rather than a good turn of the Romans) forbore not to joyn in this quarrel. Thus was there raised a mighty power of so many Nations banded together, under the conduct of the Latines, and invaded the borders of the Samnites, where more hurt was received by rodes than skirmishes. And albeit the Latines in fight had the better hand, yet were they well content for avoiding so many conflicts, to depart out of the enemies country. Which gave the Samnites leisure to send Embassadors to Rome, who before the Senat complaining, that they endured the same measure still, being now associates, which they had abidden before when they were enemies: besought most humbly, "that the Romans would be satisfied with that victory of the Campains and Sidicins, their enemies, which they had got out of the Samnites hands, and not suffer them to be trodden under foot by those Nations, the most dastards and cowards of all others: requesting moreover, if so be the Latines and Campains were under the dominion of the people of Rome, that they would command them by vertue of their authority, to forbear the Samnites country: and if they refused to obey, then to chastise and keep them in by force of war. To these demands they framed a doubtful answer, as being loath and abashed of the one side to confess, that the Latines were not at their devotion, and fearing again on the other side by reproving and provoking them to turn away their hearts, and lose them for ever. And this was the answer. "As touching the Campains, their case was otherwise, who were not by covenants and conditions

A "ditions in forme of League, but by voluntary and simple submission, under their protection; and therefore they should be quiet whether they would or no: but as for the Latines, by any capitulation comprised in their accord, they were not prohibited to levy war with whom they list. Which answer, as it sent the Samnites away, in doubt what to think what the Romans would do; so it estranged and alienated the Campanians for fear: and made the Latines more stout, as supposing the Romans now would give them the head, & yield any thing unto them. And therefore under a colour of preparing war against the Samnites, they summoned and held many Councils one after another: and in all their meetings and consultations, their Princes and chief men secretly amongst themselves did nothing but plot and practise war with the Romans. In which conspiracy also, the Campanians had their hand as deep as the rest, even to bear arms against those who had been their Protectors. But although they did what they could to keep all close of purpose, and were desirous before the Romans should stir, to be secured from the Samnites, (an enemy pressing hard upon their backs) yet nevertheless this complot was discovered, and intelligence thereof given at Rome, by means of certain persons linked to the Romans in privat acquaintance and mutuall hospitality. Hereupon were the Consuls commanded to resign their Magistracy before the ordinary time, that so much the sooner there might be new created against so great a danger and preparation of war. But here rose a scruple of conscience, that the assembly for Election should be holden by them, whose government was thus shortned and abridged. Whereupon they proceeded to an Inter-reign. And two Interregents there were one after another, M. Valerius and M. Fabius: who created Consuls, T. Manlius Torquatus the third time, and P. Decius Mus.

C In that year, it is recorded for certain, that Alexander King of Epirus, arrived in Italy with a Navy: who, no doubt if he had sped well at his first entrance, would have proceeded farther and warred upon the Romans. In this age flourished Alexander the Great in glorious conquests, who being this man his sisters son, and a warrior invincible, whiles he atchieved feats of arms in another part of the world, hapned to die in his best time and prime of his youth. But to proceed forward. The Romans although there was no doubt but that their associats, and namely, the Latines were revolted: yet, as though they were carefully busied about the Samnites only, and nothing intended them; they sent for to Rome ten of their chief Peets, pretending to give them in charge what their pleasure was to have done. At that time the Latines had two Prators or Provosts, L. Annius of Seia, and L. Numitius of Circeia, both Roman Colonies. By whose means, besides Signina and Velutre, being also Colonies of Rome, the Volscians were solicited likewise to take arms. And thought good it was, that those Latine Prators by name, should be cited with the rest. No man was ignorant for what intent they were sent for. The Prators therefore, called a Council before they went, and there declared how they were convented by the Senat of Rome, demanding their advice what answer to make as touching those matters, wherewith, as they supposed, they should be charged. When some were of this opinion, some of that; then Annius spake and said:

D "Although I my self have moved you to resolve upon an answer, yet I think, it concerneth us more in our main estate, to determine what to do, than what to say. And when we are grown to a resolution once of our affairs, and what course to take, an easie matter will it be to frame words fit for the purpose. For if even now already under a shadow and pretence of an indifferent league, we can abide and find in our hearts to endure bondage, what standeth in the way, but that having abandoned and betrayed the Sidicines, we be obedient not only to the Romans commandment, but also to the Samnites? and answer the Romans in these plain terms, That at their beck only, and if they do but nod their head, we will presently lay down all arms? But if at length, the desire and longing after liberty do touch our hearts, and give an edge unto our spirits: if there be a league between us: and if confederacy ought to be nothing else but a society and equal fruition of liberty and priviledges: if, I say, we may now glory and vaunt, whereof sometimes we were ashamed, that we are of kin to the Romans, and of their blood: if they have an Army of associats, by the addition whereof they redouble their forces, and which the Consuls in leaving or levying their proper wats, will not part and sever from their own: why is there not equality in all things else? Why is not one of the Consuls a Latine? Look where is part of power and forces, there also is part of rule and command. And certainly even this in it self is not a matter of so great honour unto us, as who have granted and confessed Rome to be the head of Latium: yet by long patience and continual sufferance only, we have brought to pass that it might seem honourable. But if ever ye wished to see the day wherein ye might participate in government and recover your liberties again, lo, that time is now come presented unto you by your own valour, and the gracious goodness of the immortal gods. Tried their patience ye have in denying souldiers: who doubted not but that they were in a great choler and angry at the heart, when we brake a custome of two hundred years prescription and above: yet nevertheless this grief have they put up, and given us not one foul word. We warred upon the Pelignians in our own name and quarrel: and they, who aforesometimes allowed not us the liberty so much as to defend our own marches of our selves, nothing gainsaid and crossed it. That the Sidicines were taken to our mercy and protection, that the Campanians revolted from them and sided with us, that we levied an army against the Samnites their confederats, they heard and knew well enough: and yet they stirred not once forth of their City. How come they to be so calm and quiet, but upon a privy and knowledge, both of our puissance and of their own weakness? I am able to avouch by the report of men of good credit, that when the Samnites complained themselves of us, they had such an answer

Alexander the Great.

The speech of Annus in the Council of Latium.

The Oration
of Annias in the Senat of Rome.

The Oration
of T. Manlius.

"I swear again of the Senat of Rome, that it plainly appeared that they themselves pretended not to "require that Latium should be under the Roman Empire. Do ye but take upon you, and lay "claim unto that which they secretly yield unto you themselves, and repossess it at your pleasure.
"Now if any man be afraid to be the speaker, Lo, here am I, who profess to be the man, and to "say thus much, not only in the audience of the people and Senat of Rome, but also of Jupiter him"self, who is resident in the Capitol, namely, That if they will have us to be of the League and con"federacy, they shall admit from among us one of the Consuls, yea, and a part of the Senat. As he
"with great spirit and boldness, not only advised this, but promised also thus to do; all that were "present with a general applause and assent permitted him to do and say whatsoever he thought "expedient for the common good of the Latine nation, according to that trust which they re"posed in him. So soon as he was come to Rome (with other Embassadors) he was admitted into the "Senat, and audience given him in the Capitol. Where when T. Manlius the Consul, by the autho"rity and direction of the Senators, had dealt with him and the rest, not to make war upon the "Samnites their confederats: Annias raging like a conqueror, as if he had won by force and arms
"the Capitol; and not as an Embassador, who was to deliver his mind and message safely, by the "protection of the Law of Nations, began in this sort: "The time required (quoth he) now at "length, O T. Manlius and ye Senators of Rome, not to treat and deal with us in any affairs by "way of authority and commandment, namely, when you saw Latium by the favour of the gods
"to flourish exceedingly both in men and munition, as having subdued the Samnites, confederate
"with the Sidicins and Campains, and now also combined with the Volscians: and besides, even "your own Colonies and townships too, have made choice to submit themselves to the Latines "rather than the Romans. But forasmuch as you cannot find in your hearts of your selves, nor see "how to make an end of your proud and outrageous Lordship and tyranny; We, albeit we are a"ble to restore Latium unto her ancient freedom by force of arms, yet for kindred sake will be con"tent to offer indifferent articles and equal conditions of peace, forasmuch as it hath pleased
"the immortal gods, that we are equal unto you in power and puissance, Imprimis, there is no re"medy now, but your two Consuls, must be one a Roman, and the other a Latine: Item, that the "number of Senators be elected as well out of the one nation as the other, Item, that we become "one people incorporate, and one Common-wealth. And to the end that there may be one im"perial seat, and one name of all, and therefore we or you, must needs yield, we are content a Gods
"name (and to the good of both nations may it prove) that this City and State of yours be coun"tered the better and more noble: and let us be called all by the name of Romans. By good hap it "so fell out, that the Romans also had for their Consul T. Manlius to match him, one as stout and
"hot as the other: who could not contain his anger no longer, but openly said, "That if the Sena"tors were so far overseen and besides themselves, as to take conditions of a Setine, he would "come with his sword by his side into the Senate house, and what Latine soever he saw there in "council, he would not fail but slay him with his own hand in the place. And therewith turning "to the Image of Jupiter: Harken (quoth he) O good god Jupiter, Hear this wickedness and in"dignity: hear O Justice: and piety to Godward. Wilt thou abide to see, O Jupiter, in this thy ho"ly and sacred temple, wilt thou endure, as taken captive and troden under foot, to see Consuls of "aliens & a Senat of foreigners? Are these the covenants, O ye Latines, which Tullus King of Rome
"made with the Albans your forefathers? or which L. Tarquinus after him, concluded with you?
"Remember ye not the battel at the lake Regillus? Have ye so forgotten indeed, both your "own calamities and overthrows of old, and also the good turns and benefits received at our "hands? When this speech of the Consul was seconded with the indignation also of the Senators,
"it is recorded, that when they called upon the gods, witnesses of those covenants, and reiterated
"their names oftentimes, Annias in mockery of those protestations, was over-heard to despise and "scorn the power and godhead of the Roman Jupiter. But this is certain, that as he in heat of anger "stepped hastily to the entry or porch of the temple, and went apace, he fell down the stairs, and so "hurt his head that dashed against the bottom stair, that he swooned withall, and lay for dead. But "because all writers agree not, that he yielded up his last breath thereupon, I also will leave it doubt"ful, as I find it: as also this, that in the very charging of him with breach of covenants, there pou"red down a tempestuous storm, with many mighty thunderclaps. For, as these and such like things
"may be very true, so they may be prettily devised and invented on set purpose to represent & shew
"the wrath and vengeance of God, Torquatus being sent by the Senat to give the Embassadors their "dispatch, seeing Annias there to lie along, cried out aloud, in the hearing both of the Senat and the "people, and said, "No force, it is well, and as it should be; thus begin and bless, O ye immortal
"gods, our just and rightful war, Surely there is a God above, there is a power divine and deity
"in heaven, thou art no feigned and imaginary god, O mighty Jupiter & not in vain have we hal"lowed thee in this place, as the father both of gods and men. Why stay ye then, O Roman Qui-"rites, ye likewise my L.L. of the Senat, to take arms in the name of the gods, having them already "as you see to be your Leaders? I for my part shall soon so overthrow and lay the Legions of the "Latines along on the earth, as ye now see their Embassador, lying here at the stairs foot. The "words of the Consul, received with so great applause of the people, animated and enkindled them
"in such sort, that had not the careful diligence of the Magistrates been more (who by command"ment of the Consul accompanied the Embassadors as they went) than the ordinary safe conduct "of the Law of Nations, they had not escaped the rage and fury of the multitude.

A The Senat also gave their assent to this war, and the Consuls having levied two armies, and passed through the country of the Marfians and Pelignians, and joynted unto them the Samnites power, encamped themselves before Capua, whither the Latines with their associates, were already come together. There, as the report goeth, the Consuls both of them in their sleep had a vision: and there appeared unto them one and the same shape of a mans personage, much greater and more stately than the ordinary port of men, who should deliver these words unto them, "That of the two armies embattelled and affronting one another, the one was appointed as a due tribute to the infernal spirits, and to Mother Earth: and of the other, the chief General only. And look of whether army the said sovereign General should devote and offer unto those infernal spirits, and to mother Earth, the Legions of the enemies, and his own person withall; that part and that Nation shall have the victory. When the Consuls had imparted one to the other these night-visions, it was thought good and agreed (for to divert and appease Gods anger) that certain sacrifices should be slain, and also if the same shewed in their inwards, as appeared in their sleep, then one or other of the Consuls should fulfil the destinies, and accomplish fatal appointment. When as the answers of the Soothsaiers agreed also to that secret religion which was now entered and settled already in their minds, then the Consuls calling together the Lieutenants and Colonels to a Council, and openly declaring before them all the pleasure of the gods, (to the end, that the wilful and voluntary death of one of the Consuls, might not fright his army in the field) they agree between themselves, that of whether side the Roman battallions began first to give back and retreat, the Consul of that Army, should devote and betake himself to die for the people of Rome and the Quintiles. It was debated also in that assembly, that if ever at any time before there had been war managed by severe rule and government, the military discipline should now be revived, and reduced to the old manner and ancient rigour: their care in that behalf was the greater and more redoubled, for that they were to fight against the Latines, suting altogether to them in language, fashions, armour, and especially above all, in the orders and laws of warfare. For, many a time, in these two armies souldier with souldier, Centurion with Centurion, Colonel with Colonel, had sorted and conversed together, as collegues and compeers in the same garrisons, yea, and under the same colours and ensigns. By reason whereof, to the end, that by no error the souldiers should be mistaken or deceived, the Consuls made proclamation through the Camp, That no man should fight with his enemy out of his own rank, and place appointed unto him. It fortuned now, that among other Captains and Cornets of horsemen, which were sent out every way as scouts and espials to discover the coasts, T. Manlius the Consul his son together with the rest of his Cornet and Troop, was passed above the enemies Camp, so near, as he was within an arrow shot of their next Corps de guard. In which was quartered the cavalry of Tusculum, under the leading of Geminus Metius a Knight, both for birth, and also for his noble feats of arms highly esteemed in his country. He espying the Roman horie, and knowing the Consuls son, advancing before them, and of especial mark above the rest (for all Noblemen and of quality were well enough known one to another,) What, will ye Romans (quoth he) with one Cornet of horse fight with the Latines and their confederats? What shall your Consuls, what shall two Consular armies do the mean while? Marry (quoth Manlius) they will be here time enough for you, and with them Jupiter himself, a witness of league and covenants by you broken. Jupiter I say, who only can do more than all mens forces in the world. And we who at the pool Ragillus, have given you fighting, your bellies full, will here also quit our selves so, that never after ye shall have any great joy and pleasure to encounter and joyn battel with us again. With that, Geminus, riding forth as he was on horseback, a little from his company, Wilt thou then (quoth he) till that day come wherein ye mean with so great a do to set forward your armies to a general set field, break a staff with me in the mean time; that by the proof and event of us twain, it may henceforth appear, how far the Latine men of arms, surpasses the Roman? The young man his bloud and courage was soon up either upon anger and choler, or for very shame to refuse the combat, or because God would so have it, and it was his destiny that could not be avoided. Forgetting therefore his fathers commandment, and the express Edict of the Consuls, he returneth on head and rashly, to a single fight; wherein it skilled not much, whether he had the better or the worse, for any great odds thereby in the main trial of the quarrel. Thus when the rest of the horsemen of both parts were retired aside (as it were) to behold some spectacle or running at tilt: in the void place of the plain field, that lay between, they ran their horses in full carreer one against the other, with sharp and deadly spear in rest. Manlius with his lance aloft, gaid over and raised the Motion of his enemy, and Metius with his spear lightly touched, and passed by the horse neck. Then having turned about their horses, Manlius came upon him first with a second charge, and so redoubled the push, that he thrust the others horse in between the ears. At the smart of which wound the horse reared and mounted with his forefeet, and with great force shaking his head cast his rider. And as he bare his spear and shield, to raise himself from his grievous fall, Manlius ran him through at the throat, so that the spear-head came forth at his ribs, and nailed him fast to the ground. And having disarmed & depolled him rode back to his own troop: and both together with exceeding joy halined to the Camp, and so to the Generals Pavilion, even to his father: full little knowing his fatal destiny, and what was to befall unto him, whether he had deserved praise, or incurred danger of punishment. That all the world, quoth he, (O father) may be perswaded and report truly that I am defended indeed of your bloud, and your undoubted son. Lo here I am, who being defied and challenged to fight man to man, have killed mine enemy a man of arms: see here the spoils of him slain and dead. Which so soon as the Cos. heard, presently he could not abide to look on his son, but turned away, and by sound of trumpet, commanded the host to a publick audience, which being assembled in great number, Forasmuch (quoth he) as thou, T. Manlius, without regard of Cos. authority, or dread of thy fathers majesty and power over thee, against our Edict and expresse commandment, hast fought with the enemy, and that without thy rank and place; and as much as lay in thee, hast broken the discipline of war, whereby to this day the State of Rome hath stood maintained, and hast brought me thy father to this hard point, that I must forget either the Common-weal, or else mine own self and mine, we will abide rather the punishment and smart for our own misdeeds, than the whole state, to her so great prejudice and damage, should pay for our folly and transgression. A fearful and dolorous example will we afford: but good & profitable to all youth for ever hereafter. As for me verily, both the inbred love and affection of all fathers to their children, and also this shew and proof of thy valour and knight-hood (although seduced with deceitful apparance and vain resemblance of honour) moveth me not a little: but since that, either by thy death the Cos. commands must be established, or by impunity of thy disobedience, for ever disannulled, I would not wish thee to refuse (if there be any of my blood in thee) but by thy punishment to restore and set up again the military discipline which this day by thy default is faine down and ruinate. Go serjeant, and bind him to a stake. At this so cruel a sentence, they were all amazed and in an extasie, that were present: and as if they had seen the edge bent against themselves, for fear more than for any modesty or reverence, they were quiet. So when they were come again to themselves, as if their spirits had been recovered after some deep impression of a wonder which had attended them, they stood still with silence: but so soon as the poor wretch his head was chopt off, and his blood seen to gush and spin out, then began they all of a sudden to speak freely and complain with open mouth, so as they forbore neither lamentations nor curses: they covered the youth his body with his own victorious spoils, they erected a funeral pile of wood over his corps without the trench and rampiers, set it on fire, and burnt him accordingly; and so with as great love and affection as souldiers could shew, performed their last duty unto him, and solemnized his obsequies. Thus the commandments of Manlius were not only dreadful for the present, but gave an heavy and fearful precedent for the future, to all sovereign Commanders of an Army. Howbeit, the rigour of this punishment made the souldiers more dutiful to their Captains and Leaders: and besides that, the rounds and sentinels, and the set corps de guard, were every where more carefully looked unto and observed: even in the very hazard and extremity also of the battel afterward, that austere severity did much good. For their fight was much like unto a civil war, so little, or nothing at all in a manner, differed the Latines from the Romans Common-wealth, but only in heart and courage.

Aforetime they used Roman long large shields, covering their whole bodies; but in processe of time, after that they became Stipendiaries and to take pay, they bare shorter targets. And whereas aforetime they had their battallions thick and close together, like to the Macedonian Phalanges, afterwards they began to range their battel into bands more loosely and distinctly, and last of all, they were divided into thinner orders and squadrons: every such order or squadron contained threescore souldiers, two Centurions, and one Port ensign. The forefront of the vanguard were javelineers called Hastati, in fifteen squadrons, distant some little way one from another: such a squadron had twenty souldiers lightly armed, and all the rest a sort of Targeteers. And those were called light-armed, who carried only a spear or javelin to fight with at hand, and other darts to lance from them aloof. This forefront contained the flower of youths, that grew up as apprentices to war-service. Then followed after them of stronger and riper age, as many bands or squadrons, which were called Principes; whom there followed hard at heels, thirty squadrons, all targeteers or shield-bearers, with brave armour above all others. And this battallion of thirty companies they called Antepilani [avant-darters] for that the other fifteen orders or bands were placed hard behind the ensigns. And of these, every band consisted of three parts: and each of them they called Primum pilum, and it was composed of three banners or pannounces; and every such banner contained 186 men. The first Pannounce or banner conducted the Triarii, who were old souldiers of approved valour: the second, those that were called Rorarii, of less valiance both for age and prowess: the third, such as were named Accensi, who were of least account and trust, and therefore they were cast behind unto the tail of the battallion. When the Army was thus ordered in battel array into these bands & squadrons, the javelineers foremost of all began the fight: if they were not able to discomfit the enemies, than they with steady footing and slow pace retired back into the void places between the squadrons of the Principes, who received them: then began the Principes to enter into the battel and to maintain fight, and were seconded by the Hastati or Javelineers. The Triarii remained standing all this whiles firmly, about their ensigns, setting out their left legs afore them at length, with their Targets on their shoulders, and their pikes or javelins sticking on the ground, with their heads somewhat bending forward, much like as if their battel were fortified with a Pallisado or rampier of pales and sharp stakes. Now if those Principes had not good success in fight, they retired themselves by little and little from the forefront, to the Triarii. And hereupon grew the proverb, that when a thing was at a dead list and in distress, they would say, We are come to the Triarii. Then the Triarii standing up right, so soon as they had received the Principes and Hastati, into the void place between their files, presently drew in their ranks

A ranks and files close together, and shut up as it were all waies of passage and entrance, and with one main joint and close battallion (as if now there were no more hope behind) advanced toward the enemy. And this most of all feared and terrified the enemies, when thinking to chase those that they seemed to have vanquished, they saw a new battel of fresh men standing up, and the same increased in number.

Now were there commonly four Legions enrolled, consisting of five thousand foot, and three hundred horse to every legion. As many more were added unto them, and those mustered out of the Latines, who at that time were enemies to the Romans, and had ordered their battallions after the same manner in all respects. And they knew well enough that not only ensign with ensign, all pikes and javelins with pikes and javelins, Principes with Principes, but one Centurion with another, if the arraies were not broken, were to encounter. Two Principes or chief Centurions, there were amongst the Triarii in the one army and the other. The Roman of body not so strong and well set, howbeit a good souldier otherwise, skillfull and of great experience: the Latine, exceeding mighty, and a notable fighter of all others. Well known they were one unto the other, because at all times they had the same conduct and equal place of charge. The Roman not greatly trusting to his own strength, was permitted even at Rome by the Col. to chuse unto him an under-Centurion whom he would: who might protect and defend him safe from an enemy that should hap to deal with him hand to hand. And it fortuned that the yong man by him elected, fought in the throng and got the victory of the Latine Centurion. As for the battel, it was fought not far from the foot of the hill Velutius, in the very way that leadeth to Vesuvius. The Roman Consuls before they came into the field killed their beasts for sacrifice. And the bowel-prying Soothsayer (as it is reported) shewed to Decius the head of the Liver on the inner side wounded (as it were) and cut off: otherwise in all respects, his sacrifice was acceptable to the gods. As for Manlius, he had as good signs of Gods favour in his, and all as well as might be. That is well yet (quoth Decius) if my colleague speed well, and have good succels by his sacrifice. Their battels being so arranged, as I said before, they marched into the field, Manlius led the right wing, Decius the left. At the first they fought on both sides with equal forces and like courage and heat of stomach. But afterwards on the left wing, the Roman Hastati, not able to sustain the violent charge of the Latines, retired to the Principes, in which trouble and fearful disorder, Decius the Col. called aloud to M. Valerius. "We have need of Gods help (quoth he) O Valerius, Where art thou, the publike high Priest of the people of Rome? Come and say afore me that form of words, whereby I may devote and betake my self for the Legions. The Priest commanded him to put on his long purple robe embroidered before, called Prætexta, to cover his head, and to put forth his hand under the said robe at his chin, and standing upon his javelin, with both his feet, to pronounce these words after him, as follow: O Janus, Jupiter, father Mars, Quirinus, Bellona, O ye Lares and domesticall gods, the gods Novensiles and Indigetes; ye gods likewise, whose power extendeth over us and our enemies, and O Manes the infernal gods, you I invoke, you I worship and adore, your pardon I beseech and favour crave, that ye would prosper all power and victory unto the people of Rome and Quirites; and put to fear, fright, and death, the enemies of the people of Rome and Quirites. And just as I pronounce in these words, so for the weal publike of the Quirites, the Army, Legions and aids of the people of Rome, I betake with me unto Manes the infernal spirits, and dame Tellus, the Legions and aids of the enemies, and my self after them." Having made this praier, he willed the Serjeants or Lictors to go to Manlius, and with all speed to tell him, that his colleague was devoted for the army. Himself girded after the Sabine fashion, and armed at all pieces, mounted on horseback and so rode into the midst of his enemies. Of both armies he was seen, to carry with him much more stately and venerable port than a man as sent from heaven to be a satisfaction of all gods wrath, and to turn away all plague and mischief from his owne people upon the enemies. All terrour and fear he carried with him as he went, and first disordered the ensigns of the Latines in the edge and border of the battallions, and afterwards entred within into the whole army. This was noted and seen most evidently, that by which way so ere he rode the enemies were smitten with fear, as if they had been blasted and struck with some untoward aspect and influence of a planet. But so soon as he was faine and overcharged with shot of darts, presently from that place all about, the cohorts of the Latines (out of all question) as amazed men, fled away and avoided. And therewithal likewise the Romans, as if they had been discharged and freed from their religious fear and scruple of conscience, and as if they had but then and not before heard the sound of the trumpet to battel, began to charge and fight afresh. For both the Rorarii advanced forward and ran among the ranks of the Antepilani, and thereby re-enforced the Hastati and Principes, and caused them to fight more stoutly: and the Triarii kneeling on their right knee, waited till the Col. gave them some token to arise. Afterwards in process of fight when in other parts the Latines in their number prevailed, Manlius the Consul, having heard of the final end of his companion, and (and right as piety would) accompanied as well with plaints and tears as with due praises so worthy and memorable a death, for a while doubted, whether it were yet time for the Triarii to arise. Afterwards thinking it better that they should be relieved in heart and fresh, unto the last push of extremity, he biddeth the Accensi from the hindmost tail of the reereward to come forth before the standards. Who so soon as they were come in place, forthwith the Latines, supposing the enemies had done the like, raised their Triarii. Who having for a good while fought fiercely and wearied themselves, and either broken their javelins or dulled their points, and yet by meer force repulst their enemies: thinking now all had been done and the victory achieved, as being come as far as to the utmost skirts of the battallions: "Then, H

 "quoth the Consul to the Triarii, rise now fresh and lusty as ye are, against the wearied, mindful
 "of your country, parents, wives and children, mindful of the Consul, who for your victory hath "taken his death. The Triarii all hearty & unfoiled, were not so soon risen up, shewing themselves in their bright and glittering armour, but there began on a sudden & unlooked for, a new skirmish and conflict. For they receiving the Antepilani between their files, set up a shout and outcry troubled & disordered the Principes of the Latines, gored their faces with their javelins, slew the principal flower and strength of their best & formost men and passed untouched in a manner through the other bands, as if they had been disarmed: yea, and brake through their pointed and close bat-tallions, with so great a murder, that scarcely they left behind them a fourth part of their enemies alive. The Samnites also under the foot of the hill, being seen a far off in battel array, smote a terror among the Latines. But among all either Citizens or Allies, the especial commendation of that service rested in the Consuls: of whom, the one turned all the threats and dangers from the gods both above and beneath, upon himself alone; the other in that battel shewed such valour and policy, that it is confessed both of Romans and Latines, who have written of that journey and commended it to posterity, that of whether army T. Manlius had the conduct, that way doubtless would the victory go. The Latines after their defeat and flight retired to Minturnæ: their camp presently upon the battel was won, and many a man there surprised alive and cut in pieces, but the Campains especially. That day could not the corps of Decius be seen, for that the night came upon them as they fought for it: the morrow after it was found amongst a mighty company of slain enemies, overwhelmed with swords, darts and javelins: and with all honour and solemnity according to his death, performed by his brother Consul were his funerals.

This also amongst the rest, seemeth worth the remembrance and to be inserted in this place, namely, That it was lawfull for Consul, Dictator, and Prator, whensoever they sacrificed and betook to the Devil the Legions of their enemies, for to vow and offer withall, not themselves in any case, but any Citizen whom they would: provided alwaies that he were one of the enrolled legion of the Romans. [And if the man who is thus addicted and destined to death, hap to die, all is well, and as it ought to be: But if he die not, then was the image of him slain fast high or above buried in the ground, and a purging or propitiatory sacrifice was slain in his stead: but wheresoever it chanced that Image to be so interred, thither was it not lawfull for any Roman Magistrate to set foot and come. But if a man would needs offer and vow himself to death, as Decius did, and die not, he shall not purely perform any sacred duty, or do sacrifice, either for himself or the City, that hath once thus betokened himself. If he will bequeath and offer his armour to Vulcan, or to some saint whomsoever he list, he is permitted and lawfull for him so to do, either by way of sacrifice or other offering as he pleaseth. As for the weapon or spear over which the Consul standing on both his feet, made his prayers and invocations, it is not lawfull the enemy to seize thereon: but if he fortune to win the same, a propitiatory sacrifice must be offered to appease Mars, so wit, a swine, a sheep, and a Bull.] And albeit the records both of all divine and humane customs and traditions, make no mention hereof, and are now grown out of use and remembrance, by reason that we prefer new and forrein ceremonies, before the old ancient rites of our own country and ancestors, yet I thought not amiss to make report hereof, even in those very words and terms as they were used, delivered, and pronounced.

In some writers I find, that the Samnites having waited to see the event of this battel, came to aid the Romans when all was done and past. Also, that there was succour a coming from Latinum unto the Latines, but not before they had the overthrow: by reason that they spent a great time in deliberation. And when as now the formost ensignes and some part of the army was gone forth of the gates, and news came of the defeat and slaughter of the Latines; as they turned their banners and returned into the City, it is said, That their Prator or Provost, named Numisus, spake these words, "That so small a way as they had gone, must cost them dear, and fall sweetly
 "would the Romans be paid therefore. Such as were remaining of the Latines after the battel, and were scattered asunder in many and divers waies, when they were rallied together, shrowded themselves for safety in the City Vesica. Where in their Councils and assemblies, Numisus, their Generall, averred, and assured them, that Mars indeed was common, and the hazard indifferent to both parties, as having made an equal massacre in the one army and the other; and that the bare name only of victory went with the Romans: for otherwise, they carried away with them the fortune of men vanquished, and sped no better than they. For (saith he) The two royal pavilions of their Cos are polluted and defiled: the one with the parricide of his own son, the other for the death of the Cos, who had vowed himself to die: all their forces in manner slain: their Javelincers and principals killed: a bloody slaughter committed both before and behind the Standards: and only the Triarii at the last upshot renewed the fight and set all upright. And albeit (quoth he) the power of the Latines also be shrewdly abated, yet for a fresh supply, either Latinum or Vesica are nearer than Rome. And therefore if they so thought good, he would with all speed raise the lusty flower and choicest manhood both out of the Latines and the Volscians, and return again with a fresh army to Capua: and with his sudden coming unlooked for, surprise and defeat the Romans, expecting as then for nothing less, than a second battel. So by dispatching his cautelous and deceitful letters into all parts of Latium and the Volscian nation (by reason that they who had not been present at the battel were sooner induced to give rash credit) there was a tumultuary army in great haste levied, enrolled, and assembled together out of all quarters.

This

A This host as it marched, Torgatus the Consul met at Tifanum, a place between Sinnessa and Minturnae. And before they could chuse out a plot of ground to encamp in, they bestowed their carriages and baggage on heaps of either side: fell to a battel presently and made a final end and conclusion of all the war. For the enemies were brought so low, that as the Consul led his victorious Army to waste their Country, all the Latines yielded themselves to him: and this their rendring the Campains likewise followed. Thus Lutium and Capua forfeited and lost part of their Territories. The lands of the Latines with the Privernats laid thereto, and the Territory of Falerii, which belonged to the people of Capua, even as far as the river Vulsurinus, was divided amongst the Commons of Rome. Two acres in the Latine Country, with a supplement of three four parts out of the Privernats land to make up the whole: and three acres in the Territory of Falerii, with addition of a fourth part to boot for amends, because it was so far off, were assigned for a man. The Laurentins only, of all Lutium, and the horsemen of the Campains escaped this punishment and were exempted from the rest, because they had not revolted. And a decree passed, that the League with the Laurents should be renewed: and from that time usually every year, is it renewed, after the tenth day of the Latine holidays. Those Campain horsemen were made free denizens of Rome: and for a monument and memorial thereof, they set up and fastned a brazen table at Rome in the Temple of Castor. The people of Capua were enjoined to pay yearly to every one of them, (and they were a thousand and six hundred in all) 45. Deniers.

Thus after the war fully determined, and both rewards dealt, and punishment inflicted according to each mans desert, T. Manlius returned home: whom the elders only [for certain] went forth to meet on the way: the youth, not only then, but ever after, during his life abhorred, and with curses detested him. The Antiats made certain rodes into the Territories of Hostia, Ardea, and Solona. And for that Manlius the Consul was not able himself in person to intend and manage that war, by reason of sickness, he nominated for Dictator L. Papirius Crassus, who as it happened was at that time Prætor: by whom was named for General of the horsemen L. Papirius Cursor. This Dictator, albeit he kept the field, and lay encamped certain months within the Confines, yet achieved no worthy and memorable exploit. After this year thus renowned for the victory of so many and so puissant nations, and withall, for the noble and famous death of the one Consul, and for the government of the other, albeit stern and rigorous, yet notable and renowned; there succeeded Consuls, T. Amylius Mamercus, and Q. Publilius Philo, who met not with the like subject and matter of great affairs: and they themselves were more mindful either of their own private business, and studious to maintain a side and faction in the Common-weal, than to advance the State of their Country. Howbeit, the Latines (who rebelled for anger that they lost their lands) they discomfited in the plain of Feneſſa, drave them both out of their Camp, and forced them to leave the field. Where, whiles Publilius (by whose governance and conduct that victory was achieved) received surrender of the Latines, the flower of whose youth was there all slain and killed up. Amylius led his Army against Pedum. As for the Pedans they had maintenance from Tybur, Preneſte, and Velitern, who took their parts: there came also aid from Lanuſium and Antium. Where the Roman Consul, albeit he had the better hand in skirmish, yet for that there remained behind a new piece of service about the City it self Pedum, and the Camp of their Confederats which was adjoynd close to the Town: all of a sudden he gave over the war unfinished, because he heard that triumph was decreed unto his brother Consul. He also himself returned to Rome, and called earnestly for triumph before victory. At which untimely and covetous desire of his, the Nobles being offended, denied flatly; that unless he either forced Pedum by assault, or won it by composition he should not triumph. Hereupon Amylius being discontented and alienated from the Senat, bare his Consulship afterward like to the seditious Tribunes: For so long as he was Consul he ceased not to charge and accuse the Nobles before the people; and his Colleague no whit gainsaid him as being himself one of the Commoners. He took occasion of these accusations upon this, that the lands in the Latine and Falern Countries, were divided in pinching and scant measure among the Commons. And after that the Senat, desirous to abridge the time of the Consuls government, had decreed that a Dictator should be declared against the Latine rebels; Amylius (whose turn it was at that time to govern) nominated his own companion in office to be Dictator, by whom Junius Brutus was named General of the horse. This Dictatorship was popular and altogether framed to the humour of the common people: both by reason of slanderous and accusatory Inveſtives made against the Nobles: and for that it enacted three Statutes, most favorable and pleasing to the Commons, and as cross and adverse to the Nobility: first, That the Acts devised and enacted by the Commons, should bind all the Quirites or Citizens of Rome: secondly, That all laws which were proposed and to pass by the suffrages of the Centuries, before the Scrutiny began, and their voices gathered, the Nobles should allow and approve: thirdly, That forasmuch as they were come thus far already, that both the Censors might be of the Commons, now one Censor at the least should be a Commoner of necessity. Inſomuch as the Nobles thought verily that there was more lost at home this year by these Consuls and Dictator, than gained to the Empire abroad, by their victories and warlike exploits.

In the year following when C. Furius Camillus and Q. Manius were Consuls, to the end that Amylius the Consul of the former year, might be more notably reproached for the quitting and letting slip of a victory that should have been achieved in his year, the Senat began to mutter in their speeches, that Pedum by force of arms, by valour of men, & all possible means whatsoever, it should be destroyed and raised to the ground. Whereupon the new Consuls being forced to lay aside all other affairs, and to go in hand with that service, first took their journey thither. Now was Latium grown to those terms, as they could neither abide war nor endure peace. To maintain the wars they wanted means: and peace they could not away with nor abide to hear of, never since the loss of their lands. So they thought best to hold a middle course: to stand upon their guard, and to keep themselves within their towns: that the Romans being not provoked, should make no quarrel of war: and if there were tidings brought of any town beleaguered, there might be aid sent from all parts to the besieged. And yet for all this, were the Pedans succoured but of very few. The Tiburtins and Prænestins, whose country lay nearest came to Pedum. But for the Aricins, Lanuvins, and Veliternes, who joined their forces with the Antians and Volsicians, were suddenly assailed and set upon near the river Astura by Menius, and vanquished. Camillus fought before Pedum with the Tiburtins, who came into the field with a right puissant army, and put him to much trouble and hazard: howbeit, he had as good success in the end as Menius. The greatest tumult and trouble was caused especially by occasion of a sudden fall of the townsmen in the very time of the conflict. Against whom, after that Camillus had opposed part of his forces to make head, he not only drove them within the walls, but the same day also, when he had discomfited both them and their succours, he scaled the town and was Master thereof. Then it was thought good, with greater preparation of power and courageous resolution, after the winning of that one City, to go about with the victorious army from one to another, and so to subdue and tame for ever the whole nation and name of Latium. Neither rested they, until partly by main force, and partly by taking one City after another by way of surrender, they had brought all Latium under their subjection. After this, having disposed and placed garrisons in every town which they had got, they departed to Rome for triumph: which was to them by a general consent of all men granted. Besides their triumph, this honour was to them done, that two statues of horsemen (a rare thing in those daies) should be erected for them in the Grand place, called Forum.

The Oration
of Camillus to the Senat of
Rome.

But before that they gathered the suffrages of the people, in the assembly for Election of Coss. against the year following, Camillus in this wise made a speech to the Senat, touching the Latine nations. "My LL. and Senators of Rome, That which by war and force of arms was to be done in "Latium, is now by God his goodness and the valour of our souldiers brought to good pass. The L
"Armies of our enemies slain before Pedum and Astura: The Latine towns all, and Antium a Ci"ty of the Volsicians either by force won, or rendred by composition, are now held and kept to "your behoof, by your own garrisons. It remaineth now to consult (so far as they trouble us "oft by rebellion) and to devise some means how to keep them quiet in continual peace. In this "consultation, the immortal gods have given you thus much power to resolve upon, that it lieth
"wholly in your hands, to chuse whether Latium shall continue still a nation or no: and therefore "may ye for ever procure your selves repose and security from thence either by rigour & punish"ment, or by clemency and pardon, chuse you whether. Are ye minded to proceed by way of cru"elty against those that have yielded themselves, and are vanquished? Ye may, indeed, destroy all
" Latium, and make all wast and a desert wilderness, from whence oftentimes in sundry and dan- M
"gerous wars of yours, ye have had the help of an army of Allies, & found them fast and valorous.
"But wil ye (as your ancestors have done before you) enlarge the Roman Empire by receiving un"to your City those whom ye have conquered? Then have ye matter & means to grow up still and "wax mighty, to your great honour and glory. Surely, that government & dominion is of all other
"most strong and sure, wherein the subjects take joy in their obedience. But whatsoever you mean "to determine in this behalf, ye had need to make speed and resolve betimes. So many nations ye
"hold in suspence of mind between fear and hope: and therefore behoofeful it is, that you both
"rid and deliver your selves (as soon as you can) of the care they put you to; and also whiles their "heads are buffed and minds unresolved (standing as they do amazed in doubtful expectation)
"either by punishment or by benefit, to forestall and prevent them before they take heart again. N
"For our part, it was hitherto our endeavour to effect and bring about, that ye might be able to "dispose of all at your pleasure, and as you would your selves: now your duty it is to determine "what is best for your selves and the Common-weal. The Lords and chief of the Senat praised this "motion of the Coss. and deemed good in general. But so far as the condition of the parties
"was divers, and their cause not all one, they said that they might resolve and determine best, accord"ing to the desert of each state, if they were specified by name, and the opinions asked in particu"lar. So they fell to consultation of them severally as they were propounded: and set down this or"der and decree, Imprimis, that the Lanuvins be enfranchised Citizens of Rome, and enjoy again "their own religion and sacred ceremonies, with this proviso, that the chappel and grove of Juno
" Sospita should be common to the Burgesses of Lanuvium and the people of Rome. Item, that the " Aricins, Nomentans, and Pedans, shall be made denizens of Rome, and endued with the liberties "and privileges of the Lanuvins. Item, that the Tusculans retain still that freedom of their "City safe, which as then they enjoyed: and the crime and attainder of rebellion, to be charged up"on a few of the chief to save the common state from danger. Item, that there should be grievous "punishment inflicted upon the Veliternes, who being ancient Roman Citizens, had notwithstanding
"so often taken arms and rebelled: that their walls should be dismantled and rased: their Sen"ators from thence translated, and confined beyond Tyberis, there to dwell, upon pain, that

A whosoever were found on this side the water, it might be lawfull for any man to take him as his prisoner, and to ransom him at a 1000 Asles. Provided alwaies, that he should not enlarge him, nor releale him of his Irons, untill the money were fully satisfied and paid. Into the possessions and lands of those Senators, were tenants and Coloners sent to inhabit: who being once enroled, Vulturne seemed again as populous as beforetime. At Antium was there a new Colony planted, with this proviso, that the ancient inhabitants of the Antians should be permitted (if they themselves would) to be enroled there, and remain still. From thence were their long Gallies and war-ships had away, and the people of Antium wholly forbidden the sea: but the freedom of Roman Citizens to them was granted. The Tyburts and Preneftins forfeited their lands, not for their late trespasses of rebellion, common with other Latines, but because they repining and envying the good estate of the Romans had in times past joyned arms with the Frenchmen, a savage and unfociable nation. From the other Latines Cities and States, they took away the priviledge of marriage, the commerce of traffick, and entercourte of mutual intelligences, and holding counsels themselves, for ever after. To the Campain Gentlemen that served with horse aforesaid, for that they would not give consent to revolt with the Latines: to the Fundans also and Formans, through whole country they had alwaies had free, safe, and quiet passage to and fro, this honour was done, as to be made Citizens of Rome: but without the liberty of giving voices. Item, it was decreed, that the Comans and Suesulanans, should be of the same condition and state that Capua was: The Ships of the Antians were part of them transported to the Arsenal at Rome, and the rest set on fire and burned. With the items, beakheads, and brazen pikes whereof it was thought good, that the pulpit of common pleas and Orations in the grand place of Rome, should be beautified and adorned: which pulpit was thereupon called Rostra.

Whiles C. Sulpitius Longus, and P. Atilius Patrus were Consuls, when as the Romans held peaceably under their dominion, all the countries, as well through the favour which they won by bountiful dealing as by might and strong hand, there arose war between the Sidicins and Auruncians. The Aurunci, who had yielded afore to T. Manlius Consul, and were taken into protection afterwards, rebelled not: whereby they had a more just cause to request and seek for aid at the Romans hands. But before that the Consuls had led forth their power out of the City (for the Senate had commanded, that the Aurunci should be defended) tidings came, that the Aurunci for fear had quit their town: and being fled with their wives and children, had fortified Sinnessa, which now at this day is called Auruncea: and that the ancient wals, with the town it self, were by the Sidicins destroyed. Hereat the Senate offended with the Consuls, by whose delay and lingering their allies had been betrayed in time of their necessity, ordained a Dictator to be chosen. So there was elected C. Claudius Regillensis, who appointed for General of horsemen C. Claudius Horator. But hereupon rose a scruple of conscience about the creation of the Dictator. And when the Angurs had pronounced, that they thought him not rightly created, both Dictator and General of horsemen gave over their rooms. The same year Minutia, a Vestal Nun, was first suspected of inconcency, for going in her apparel more trim than was decent for one of her calling and profession: and after that, brought in question and accused by a bond-servant, that informed against her to the High Priests. First, by a decree of theirs she was awarded to abstain from divine service, to keep her house, and not to manuprise and set free any of her bond-slaves, but to have them forth coming, whensoever they were called for: and after farther examination and judgement passed, was buried quick under the ground, at the gate Collina, in the paved causey on the right hand, within the plain or field called Sceleratus, i. e. Execrable or polluted. I suppose that place took the name of such * incest of filthy whoredom. The same year, Q. Publius Philo was elected Prator, the first that ever was of the Commons, notwithstanding the mind of Sulpitius the Consul, who said, That he would not take his name to propound it for Election nor admit him among other competitors. But the Senat strived the less in impeaching this Pratorship, seeing they could not have their will in the highest rooms and dignities.

F The year next ensuing, under the Consulship of L. Papirius Crassus and Caeso Duellius, was notable and famous for the war of the Ausonians, in regard rather of the novelty, than the greatness, and danger thereof. They were a people that inhabited a town called Cales, and had joyned their power with the Sidicins their next neighbours. The whole power of which two nations being discomfited in one battel, and the same not so memorable, was for the nearness of their Cities more ready to flee, and in their flight more late and secured. Yet the Nobles of Rome omitted not the care of that war: for that the Sidicins so often, either had themselves moved war, or aided those, that began, or else were the cause of all troubles. Whereupon they endeavoured all that they could to make Consul the fourth time, the noblest warrior in those daies, M. Valerius Corvinus, who had for his brother in government M. Atilius Regulus. And lest haply some error by chance should be committed, but was made to the Consuls, that extraordinarily, and without casting lot, that province might fall to Corvinus: who having received the Army (after the victory at Cales), of the former Consuls, went forth. And when at the first shout and onset he had discomfited his enemies, who in remembrance of their former late overthrow were affrighted, he assailed to assault their very wals: and so eager and hotly bent (I assure you) were the souldiers, that even at the first they would have set ladders to, as making full account to scale up to the top, and enter the town. But Corvinus, because that was an hard adventure, was desirous to accomplish that enterprife by the long toil of his souldiers, rather than their present perill: he raised therefore therefore a countermure, and platforms, and rolling frames, mounted against the walls: but as good hap was by an opportunity that fell out they had no life of their munitions and fabricks. For M. Fabius a Roman prisoner, taking vantage of the negligence of his keepers upon a festival holiday, and making means to break his bonds, let himself down by a long cord, fastned at one end to a pinnacle or battlement of the wall, and slid by the arms, among the munitions and fabricks of the Romans: who so perswaded and prevailed with the General, that he caused him to give an assault upon the enemies, now being fast asleep, as having filled their bellies with wine and good meats. So that with as little ado were the Ausonians and their City surpris'd, as they were more vanquish'd in fight. A great booty of pillage was there got: and after a garrison placed at Cales, the Legions were brought back to Rome. The Consul by decree of the Senate triumphed: and that Artilius should not be without his glory too, both Consuls were appointed to lead forth an Army against the Sidicins: but before they went, they appointed by a decree of the Senat, D. Emilius Mamercus to be Dictator, to hold the election of Consuls. Who named Q. Publius Philo for his General of horsemen.

In this Election holden by this Dictator, there were created Consuls, T. Veturius, and Sp. Posthumius. Who albeit there remained some part behind of the Sidicins war yet to the intent they might gratifie the Commons by some good turn, and prevent their longing before they spake themselves: propos'd an Act concerning the bringing of a Colony to Cales: and when as the Senate had ordain'd that two thousand and five hundred men should be enrolled and assign'd thither: they created Triumvirs for to bring them thither, and to divide the lands, namely, C. Duellius, T. Quimius, and M. Fabius. After this, the new Consuls having received the army of the old, entred into the enemies confines, waiting all before until they came to the very walls of their City. Now, for that the Sidicins had assembled a puissant army, and seem'd themselves fully reioiure and bent upon utter despair to put all unto the last adventure, and to fight it out to the last man. Moreover, because it was noised that all Samnium was risen up in arms: by authority from the Senate, the Consuls appointed P. Cornelius Rufinus Dictator, and M. Antonius was nominated General of the horse. But hereupon grew again another scruple, that there was some errour escap'd in the creation: so they reign'd up their places, and because there ensued also a plague hereupon (as if all their Auspices for Elections of Magistrates had been touch'd and infected with that errour and default) the managing of all affairs fell to an Interregent. Which being now entred upon by the fifth Interregent, M. Valerius Corvinus, then Consuls were created, L. Cornelius the second time and Cn. Domitius.

* The rumour of the Gauls war, was ever taken for a Tumult (quasi timor multus) and supposed more dangerous than another ordinary war.

When all things else were at quiet, the rumour of the Gauls war was so rise and hot, that it was taken for a very Tumult. Whereupon it was thought good, that a Dictator should be created. And M. Papirius Crassus was nominated, who had P. Valerius Publicola for General of the horsemen. When they had mustred the soldiers more streightly and with greater regard than would have been for wars near hand the espials who were sent out, brought word that all was well and quiet among the Gauls. But suspected it was that Samnium now the second year was ready to drop out of their allegiance and seek a change. Whereupon the Roman army was not withdrawn out of the Sidicin country. Howbeit the war of Alexander King of Epirus, drew the Samnites into the Lucans country, which two nations uniting their forces, gave the King a battel, as he made rodes from Pestus. In which confli& Alexander having got the upper hand, entred into a League and amity with the Romans: although it was much doubted, with what faithfulness he would observe the same, if all his affairs prospered as well. The same year was a solemn Levy or Numbring of the people of Rome held, and the new Citizens were matriculated and enrolled. And therefore two Tribes were annexed, Melia and Capia: the Leviers that ordain'd them, were Publ. Philo, and Sp. Posthumius. The Acerans became Roman Citizens, by an act propos'd by L. Papirius the Prator: by vertue whereof they were enfranchis'd Denizens: but without the privilege of giving voices. These were the acts for this year both at home and abroad.

The year next following (were it through the unkind distemperature of the air, or by some wicked practise of man) was infamous, when M. Claudius Marcellus and T. Valerius were Consuls. I find the surname of this Consul to vary in divers Chronicles, in some Flaccus, in others Potius. But it matters not much whether be true. This rather I could willingly have wish'd (and yet all Authors do not record it) that it had been falsely recorded, That those persons by sorcery and poison were made away, whose death hath defamed that year with the note of a pestilence. But yet as the thing is left in writing, I purpose to deliver it, lest that I should seem to derogate ought from the credence of any writer. When as the chief personages of the City died upon like diseases, and after one and the same manner of symptoms a certain chamber-maid presented her self to Q. Fabius Maximus (being for the time an Edile of State) and profess'd to bewray the cause of that publike and contagious malady, if she might be assured by faithfull promise from him, that by the utterance thereof she should not come to harm nor trouble. Forthwith Fabius deliver'd this matter to the Consuls: and the Consuls made relation thereof to the Senate: by the consent of which State assurance was made accordingly unto the party aforesaid, to reveal the matter. Then she declared that by the lewd and mischievous wickedness of women the City was thus afflicted: and namely, That certain Dames of Rome, even their own wives, boiled and tempered rank poisons, (to kill their husbands) and if they would follow it presently they might be taken in the manner. So they went straight waies with the wench, and found some women as they were seething

A seething and preparing venomous drugs, yea and some poysoned confections already put up. Which were brought into the market place, and about 20. of those dames, with whom the poysons were found, were sent for by a Sergeant. Two of them Cornelias and Sergia, both noble women born, stoutly standing upon these tearms, and stiffly avouching, That they were soveraign medicines and wholsom for the body of man, were by the chamber-maid aforesaid confuted, and enjoined to drink thereof, that they might disprove her, and make her a liar, and to have devised of her own fingers ends this false slander. Who took a time to commune and confer together, that the people were avoided aside to make them way. Now when as in sight of all the World, these two Dames had propounded the matter to the rest there in place, they also refused not: and so having drunk the poysoned potion, they all perished by their own mischievous practise. Then presently were their complices apprehended, who detected and discovered a great number of other Wives: of which 170. were condemned. Never afore that day was there any inquisition nor process at Rome, about poysoning and forcery. So as the thing was taken for a prodigious wonder, and imputed rather to their minds, besotted and bewitched, then to any felonious intent of theirs. Whereupon the Magistrates of the City, calling to mind and searching the old Chronicles, found, that in times past, at what time as the Commons in a mad fit withdrew themselves and departed the City, there was a spike or great nail driven and fixed by the Dictator: and that the minds of the people, which by discord had been distracted and out of their right wits, were by that ceremonial satisfaction, brought again in good tune: and therefore it was thought good, C that for the fastning or sticking up of such a nail, there should a Dictator be created. So Cn. Quinctilius was nominated, who named L. Valerius General of horsemen, who so soon as the nail was fastned, gave over their places.

Consuls then were created, L. Papirius Crassus the second time, and L. Plantius Vindex. In the beginning of which year, there came from the country of the Volscians as Embassadors to Rome, the Fabraterni and Lincani, making request that they would take them into their protection, promising that if by them they were defended from the forces of the Samnites, they would become loyal and obedient subjects to the people of Rome: Then were Embassadors sent from the Senat, to give commandment to the Samnites, to forbear doing any violence upon the borders of those nations. Which embassage sped well and took place; not so much for that the Samnites desired D peace, as because they were not as yet ready prepared for war. The same year began the Privernat war. The confederates whereof, were the Fundani, and their Leader likewise a Fundan, one Vitruvius Vaccus, a man of great name and reputation, not only in his own country, but also at Rome. His dwelling house stood sometime in mount Palatine, even the very same, which after the building was pulled down, and the ground forfeit and confiscate, was called Vacci Prata. Against whom as he waited and spoiled far and neer the Setin, Norban and Coran countries, L. Papirius went forth with a power, and rested not far from his very camp. But Vitruvius neither had the wit to keep himself within his trench against a mightier enemy, nor yet the heart to encounter far from his fort. But having put his souldiers in battel array, before they were all well out of the gate of the camp, whiles the souldiers had more mind to flie backward, then march forward E and encounter the enemy: without either advise or confident courage he fought: and with a little ado, and without any question of the matter he was vanquished: so by reason of the shortness of the way, and the easie retire into the camp so neer, he found no great trouble to save his souldiers from much slaughter. For in the very conflict, few or none in a manner were slain, and not many in the press of the rout and tail of the flight, at what time as they rushed into their camp. And in the beginning of the night, the army thus discomfited, made haste to Privernum, there to defend themselves within a wall rather then a trench. Plantius the other Coss. having from Privernum, overrun and forraged the territory, and driven booties away, conducted his army into the Fundan country. The Senat of the Fundani as he entred into their confines met him, saying: "They were not come as Orators to entreat either for Vitruvius, or for those F that took his part: but for the people of the Fundani: who that they were innocent and not culpable for this war, Vitruvius himself hath plainly proved and declared, in that he chose Privernum to be his place of retreat and refuge, and not the City Fundi, the very place of his nativity. And therefore at Privernum the enemies of the people of Rome were to be fought for and pursued, who unmindful of both their own countries, had revolted as well from the Fundani as the Romans. As for the Citizens of Fundi, they were at peace with Rome, nay, they were Romans in heart, and carried thankful remembrance of a benefit received: they entreated therefore and besought the Consul to forbear hostility with a guiltless people: assuring him that their Lands, their City, their own Bodies, their Wives and Children were and should be at the devotion of the people of Rome. The Consul after that he had commended the Fundani, and sent G letters to Rome that they remained firm and fast in their allegiance, turned his way to Privernum. But before he dislodged (as Cladius writeth) the Consul executed those that were the heads of the conspiracy, and three hundred and fifty of those rebellious conspirators were sent prisoners to Rome. But the Senat accepted not, and were not content with that submission, as judging the Fundan people, desirous to be excused and discharged, with the punishment of the needy and base sort of people. Now when as Privernum was besieged and invested with two Consular Armies, the one of the Consuls was called home, to hold the Election of Magistrates. That year were erected in the great race called Circus, the Barriers from whence the horses and their charriots are let let forth, when their prizes. But before they were well past the care of the Privernats war, there arrived a terrible and fearful brute of the Gauls war, which never was regarded slightly of the Nobles of Rome. Incontinently therefore the new Consuls, L. Aemilius Mamercus, and Cn. Plautius, on that very day, namely, on the * Calends of July, wherein they entred their offices, were commanded to determin and agree between themselves upon their Provinces: and Mamercus, who had the charge of the Gauls war, levied and enrolled an army without allowing any immunity and exemption from warfare. Moreover and besides, even the poor handicrafts men and artificers, such as keep their shops, and live by sedentary occupations, a sort far unmeet for martial service, are said to have been called forth, and prest to the wars: and a mighty army was assembled and met together at Veii, that from thence they might march to encounter the Gauls: For it was thought good that they should now go farther forward, for fear lest the enemy taking another way, might deceive them and march directly to the City of Rome. But a few days after, when it was known for certain that all the trouble and fear for that time was overblown, they diverted their forces from the Gauls, and bent all against Privernum. But the issue hereof is reported two manner of ways, some write that the City was forced by assault, and that Vitruvius came alive into their hands: others, that before the utmost extremity of assault was used, they of their own accords, carrying before them white wands in token of peace, yielded themselves unto the Consul: and that Vitruvius by his own Country men was rendered and delivered unto him. The Senat being moved, and their opinion asked concerning Vitruvius and the Privernats; sent for the Consul Plautius to triumph, after that he had dismantled the walls of Privernum, and there placed a strong garrison: and they gave order in the mean time that Vitruvius should be kept fast in prison until the Consuls return, then to be whipped and put to death. They appointed also that his habitation in Palatium should be pulled down, and his goods consecrated to their Idol Semon Sangus. And look what money [of brass] was raised thereof, it served to make brazen round Plates, which were offered and set up in the Chappel of Sangus towards the temple of Quirinus. Touching the Senat of the Privernats, thus it was decreed, that every one of the Senators calling, who remained at Privernum after their revolting from the Romans, should in the same condition and state as the Veliterns, be confined beyond Tybris, and there dwell. These Acts being thus set down, there was no more talk of the Privernats until the triumph of Plautius. After the triumph, the Consul having executed Vitruvius and his complices, supposing now that he might safely propound the cause of the Privernats, to the LL. of the Senat, whiles they were newly satisfied with the execution of the guilty offenders: "Since that (quoth he) my LL. of the Senat, the principal authors of this revolt and rebellion, have both at the hands of the immortal gods, and at yours, suffered now already condigne punishment: what is your further pleasure, and what shall be done with the innocent and harmless multitude? For my part verily, although I be rather to demand your opinions then deliver mine own: yet seeing the Privernats neer neighbors unto the Samnits, with whom we now at this time entertain a most uncertain and slippery peace, I would have as little grudge and rancor left as may be, between us and them. As the question in it self was doubtful and ambiguous, whiles men gave advice some to proceed cruelly, others to deal gently, according to each man his nature and inclination: so, there was one of the Privernat Embassadors that made it more doubtful, and put all out of square: a man mindful of that state wherein he was born, more than of his present need and extremity. Who being demanded of one (that had spoken to the point, and delivered some sharp censure and heavy sentence against them) What punishment he judged the Privernats deserved? Marry (quoth he) that which they deserve, who deem themselves worthy of liberty and freedom. At whose stout and arrogant answer, when the Consul saw those to be more eagerly and bitterly bent, who before impugned the cause of the Privernats: to the end that he himself by some mild and gentle demand might draw from the party more modest language: What (quoth he) if we should remit and pardon your punishment: what kind of peace might we hope to have at your hands? If (quoth he) ye offer us good peace, ye shall find it on our part loyal and perpetual: but if ye tender hard conditions of peace, ye shall have it last but a small while. But then one gave out, that the Privernat began to threaten plainly: and said moreover, that such speeches were enough to stir up any peaceable and quiet people to war, that never thought to have fought. But the better part of the Senat drew these his answers to a better sense, and said that it was the speech of a man, and of a man free born. For, was it credible (quoth they) that any state, nay, any particular person, would longer abide (than needs he must) that condition which he misliketh and goeth against his stomach? There only is peace sure and like to hold, where men are contented and willing to keep themselves in peace: and never let men look or hope to find faithful loyalty, where they will impose thralldom and servitude. And to this purpose the Consul himself especially moved and enclined their hearts, reiterating these words to the Senators that were first to give their opinions, and that so loud, as he might of many more be overheard, That they above all other, and none but they indeed were worthy to be made Roman Citizens, who minded and esteemed nothing in the world, but their freedom. Whereupon, both in the Senat they obtained their suit: and also by the authority of the LL. a Bill was exhibited to the people, That the Privernats might be enfranchised Romans.

The same year were three hundred sent as a Colony, to inhabit Anxur: and had two Acres of ground a peece allowed them. The year following was memorable in no respect, either of home

A home affairs or foreign, in the time of T. Plautius Proculus, and P. Cornelius Scipio Cons. Only this fell out that year, that in Fregella (which sometime was in the territory of the Sidicini, and after, of the Volscians) there was a Colony planted; and unto the people there was given a dole, or distribution of raw flesh amongst them; by Marcus Plautius, at the funeral of his mother. Some there were that thought, how under a colour of honoring his mother, he defrayed and paid unto the people a deserved hire as reward; in that when he was by the Ediles arrested & brought to his answer for adultery committed with a Dame or married Wife in the City, the people had by their voices acquit him. This done given for a favour paid at his trial, was the occasion also of a dignity following for in the next Election, not without that he were absent, he was preferred to the Tribunship of the Commons, even before those Competitors that were present in place.

There stood sometime the City Palapoli, now far from thence where as now Naples standeth. In thoe two Cities, one and the same people inhabited, descended and deriving their beginning from Cumae, and the Commons fetch their off spring from Chalcis in Eubaea. With that fleet where in they sailed from their own Country, they were able to do much at sea, and were mighty upon those coasts where they dwelt. And first landing in the Islands Enaria and Pubecula, afterwards they adventured to seat themselves in the main and continent. This City relying and trusting in their own power, as well as presuming upon the faithless and disloyal society of the Samnits with the Romans, or bearing themselves bold upon the rumor that ran of a pestilence that reigned in in the City of Rome, wrought much mischief and hostility against such Romans as inhabited the Campain and Favern Countries. Whereupon when as (in the time of Lucius Cornelius Lentulus, and Quintus Rubrius Philo Consuls, the second time) there were Facials sent to Palapoli, for to demand restitution again, and a proud answer returned back from the Greeks, a Nation more stout and valiant in tongue then in deed and execution; by the authority of the Senat, the people decreed, that there should be war made upon the Palapoli. And when as the Consuls had divided their provinces between themselves, it fell to Publius his turn to war upon thoe Greeks. Cornelius with another army was opposed against the Samnits, if they should hap to stir any way. For the report went, that they looking and expecting assuredly the revolt of the Campains, would encamp nearer and join with them. There, Cornelius thought it best to keep a standing camp. The Senat was certified from both Consuls, That they had small hope of peace with the Samnits.

Publius gave intelligence, that two thousand Nolan souldiers, and four thousand Samnits, were rather by the compulsion and importunity of the Nolans, than with the good will of the Greeks, received at Palapoli. At Rome it was for certain known, that in Samnium there were new numbers taken by the Magistrates direction, and that the whole country, and the people adjoining, were raised, and out in arms. Moreover, That the Privernats, Fundans, and Formians were without all dissimulation solicited and moved to rebel. Upon which comes, it was advised by the Senat, first to send Embassadors to the Samnits, before they made war; and from them they had an insolent answer. And they themselves made quarrel, and charged the Romans with wrongs offered first; and nevertheless they justified themselves for any thing by them done, and answered all objections that were laid against them full stoutly. "Namely, that the Greeks were not aided by any publick counsel or order of theirs, nor yet were the Fundans and Formians by them solicited, as who need not be ashamed of their own power, but thought themselves sufficient enough to war if they listed. Thus much moreover, they could not dissimble, but speak out in plain terms, That the Nation and Senat of the Samnits take it as ill sparry, that the people of Rome had re-edified and repaired Fregella, a town by them conquered, and won from the Volscians, and by them laid waste; and not only so, but they had placed a Colony also in the Samnite Country, which the inhabitants called Fregella. Which countenanced and reproachful injury, unless they did were the anchors thereof would do their best to abolish and cancel, they would with all their might and main repel it from them. And when as the Roman Embassadors made a motion, and would have had them to put the matter far to be decided unto the common Confederates and friends of both parties: What double and indirect dealing is this (quoth the Samnites)? What manner is here to no purpose? As for the quarrels and difference between us (O ye Romans) neither the babling words of Embassadors, nor yet a bydays man or a distastor, but the very Campain field, wherein we must encounter in earnest, extending off sword, and the spears point, and the doubtful chance of battel shall determine. And therefore encamp we between Capua and Canusium, in the sight one of another, and let us then try the issue, whether Samnite or Roman shall be Lord of Italy. The Embassadors of Rome made answer, that they were not to go whether the enemy called them, but whither their General and Campain led them. In this mean while Publius had already got a convenient piece of ground between Ardea and Capua, and thereby encompassed the enemies of the mutual intercourse of succours from the one to the other, which they had used reciprocally, as either place had need, and was distressed. Therefore, when as the time of Election of Magistrates at Rome drew on apace, and expedient it was not for the Common weal, that Publius (now approaching near the enemies walls, and ready to assault) should be called away from the hope which daily he had of winning the City: the Tribuns were dealt withal, to propose an Act unto the people. That when the time of Pub. Philo his Consulship should be expired, he might in quality and name of Proconsul, remain in government, until the war with the Greeks were fully ended. And unto P. Cornelius were letters sent, implying thus much, That whereas it was not thought good, that he he now being entred into Samnium, should be called away from the chief push of the war; he should nominate a Dictator to be President of the Election of Magistrates; Who named M. Claudius Marcellus, and by him was appointed for General of horse Sp. Posthumius. Yet for all this, was no assembly for the said election, holden by the Dictator. For it came in question, Whether he were rightly created or no. And the Augurs being hereabout consulted with, pronounced, That the Dictator seemed not created anight. But the Tribuns discredited and made insipious and infamous, by their accusatory speeches, this their sentence and declaration, saying, That neither it was easie to know the fault and error in the creation, seeing that the Consul nominated the Dictator in the beginning of the still night, neither had the Consul writen so by any man publicly or privately thereof, nor yet was there any person could come forth and say, that he either saw or heard ought, that might mar and interrupt the Auspices; nor yet could the Augurs sitting at Rome, guess and divine, what error had hapned to the Consul in the camp so far off. And who saw not (say they) that the Augurs found fault herewith, because the Dictator Elect, was a Commoner? These and other such allegations were (to no purpose) by the Tribuns given out. For the matter grew to an Interreign, and the foresaid Election being stil put off and adjourned for one cause or other; at length the fourteenth Interreign, L. Emilius created Consuls, C. Petilius, and L. Papirius, surnamed Mugillanus or Curjor, as I find in other Chronicles.

In that year it was recorded, that the City Alexandria in Egypt was founded: and that Alexander the King of Epirus was murdered by a certain Lucan, a banished person, to verifie the Oracle of Jupiter Dodoneus, which had foretold his death. For when he was sent for into Italy by the Tarentines, he had warning given him, [To take heed of the Acherusian Water, and the City Pandusia, for there it was his destiny to end his days:] and therefore, with more speed he passed over into Italy, to be as far off as might be, from the City Pandusia in Epirus, and the river Acheron, which issuing out of Molossis into the lower Meers and Lakes, dischargeth it self, and falleth into the Thesprotian Gulf. Howbeit (as commonly it is seen when men seek most to flie and avoid their fatal death, they run headlong and plunge themselves into it,) he, having oftentimes vanquished and overthrown the legions of the Brutians and Lucans; won by force Heraclea a Colony of the Tarentines, and Consentia in Lucania, and Sipontum, and also Astrina a Colony of the Brutians, and other Cities afterwards of the Medapians and Lucans: sent into Epirus three hundred Noble houses and families, whom he meant to keep as hostages: he encamped not far from Pandusia, a City situate neer to the Confines of the Lucans and Brutians. And there he held three hills somewhat distant asunder, from whence he might make excursions and rodes into every part of his enemies country: and he had in ordinary about him almost 200. banished men of the Lucians, for his sure trusty guard: who notwithstanding (as the natures are of such for the most part) changed with every wind, and carried mutable minds according to the variety of fortune. Now it fell out so, that the continual rains which overflowed all the fields, had foreclosed and stopped the passages three ways between his armies, so as they could not help one another: whereby those two garrisons where the King was not in person, were surprized by the unexpected coming of the enemies: who having put them all to the sword, turned their whole forces to besiege the King. From whence, there were by the Lucan exiles, messengers sent to their own countreimen: who in the name of the rest capitulated, that if they might be restored again they would deliver the King either dead or alive into their hands. Howbeit he himself with an elect number of men, made a noble and hardy adventure, and brake through the midst of the enemies: and encountering the chief Commander of the Lucans hand to hand, killed him outright: and having rallied his men near together, who were scattered aunder in flight, he came at length to a river, which by the fresh ruins of a broken bridge, that the violence of that water had born down, shewed passage. Which as the army passed over at an unknown and blind ford, one soldier wearied with fear and travel, cursing and detesting the unlucky and abominable name of the River, forsook to say, Thou hast not thy name Acheron for naught: which word when it came once to the King's ear, he presently began to think and muse of his final end: and there stayed still in a deep suspense whether he shall pass over or no. Then Sotimus, one of the Kings servants and liegemen, asked him why he lingered and made delay, being in so great a peril and jeopardy as he was and threatened him withal, how the Lucans intended to play false with him, and sought opportunity to forsake him and do him a mischief. With that the King looked behind him, and espied them afar off in a troop coming against him: whereupon he drew his sword, put his horse to it, took the River, and rode through the midst thereof; and when he was now so far passed that he was ready to take the land, one of those banished Lucans lanced a dart aloof at him; and struck him quite through. Whereupon he fell down dead with the dart sticking in his body, and the stream carried it down as far as to the corps de guard of the enemies. Where his breathless corps was shamefully misused and mangled. For they having cut it cross the middler sent the one half to Consentia, and kept the other with themselves still, to practise a thousand villanies upon it. And as they shote and flung stones at it afar off, a certain woman being amongst this outrageous multitude (rising beyond all measure of anger and malice that mans heart can devise or believe) after she had besought them to forbear a while, with her eyes gushing out tears said unto them, That her husband and children were prisoners, and in the hands of the enemies: but she hoped with the Kings body, howsoever it were abused and martyred, to redeem them again. This stayed

* A river of anguish and pain.

* Consentia.

A stayed them from farther mangling thereof: Thus all that was left of the Kings body, by the means of one only woman, was burnt at Consentia: and his bones sent back afterwards to the enemies unto * Metapontum, and from thence conveyed to Epirus, unto Cleopatra his wife, and his sister Olympias, whereof the one was sister, the other Mother to Alexander the Great. Thus much concerning the woful and unhappy end of Alexander the King of * Epirus: Whose fortune albeit was such, that he came short, and was cut off before he intermeddled in the Roman war, yet because he warred in Italy, let it suffice that briefly by the way I have touched his story.

The same year was there a Leſttern at Rome, (which was the fiſt after the foundation and Building of that City) for the pacifying of the ſame gods as heretofore. Afterwards, the new Conſuls by the ordinance and direction of the people, ſent defiance and proclaimed war againſt the Samnites: And as they themſelves made greater preparation every way than againſt the Greeks, ſo they had beſides new aids, whereof (as then) they leaſt thought of: The Lucans and the Apulians (nations which to that day had no dealing nor commerce at all with the Romans) became their liege and loyal Allies, offering men and munition toward that war. Whereupon they were by form of Covenant and league entertained and received into their amity. At the ſame time alſo the Romans had good ſucceſs in the Samnites quarters: for three towns there yeilded unto them, and they became Maſters thereof, to wit, Alife, Callife, Ruffinum: all the territory beſides at the fiſt coming of the Conſul, was pilld and ſpoiled far and near. Theſe exploits thus proſperouſly C achieved, the other enterprize alſo of beſieging the Greeks; was well followed and at the point of an end. For over and beſides, that by certain ſconces and bloccuzes between the enemies forts and forces, one part was cut from the other; they endured alſo within their own walls, much more miſery and calamity, than the enemy menared and threatned without: and as if they had been captives to their own gariſon ſouldiers, whom they had called to them for their defence, they ſuffered infinite villanies, and indignities in the perſons as well of their wives as of their children, and even the hardeſt extremities, that follow upon Cities forced by the enemy. And therefore when it was noiſed abroad, that there were new ſuccours coming from Tarentum and the Samnites: they ſuppoſed that for Samnites, there were already within their walls more of them than they would marry, as for Tarentins they looked willingly for their help, as Greeks both the one & D the other, hoping by their means that they might as well withſtand the outrages of the Samnites and Nolans, as the Romans their open and profeſſed enemies. Laſt of all, of many inconveniences that they were driven unto, the leaſt and eaſieſt was thought, to yeeld ſimply unto the Romans. Charilaus and Nymphius two great men and the chiefeſt perſonages of the City, having laid their heads and plotted one with the other, ſo parted the matter between themſelves, that the one ſhould flie unto the Roman General, and the other ſtay behind, to find ſome opportunity, and miniſter ready means to render the City according to their deſignment, Charilaus was the man who preſented himſelf unto Philo, and ſaid unto him, "To the good and happy fortune be it E ſaid and done of the Palæopolitans and the people of Rome, I am determin'd to deliver and ſurrender the City into your hands: in which Aſſion, whether I may be thought to have betrayed or ſaved my country, it reſteth only in the truſt and fidelity of the Romans. As for my ſelfe privately, I am come neither to indent, nor yet to crave ought at all: but publickly in the behalf of the City, I would rather by way of petition requeſt, than article and capitulate, thus much, That if this enterprize intended, ſpeed well and take effect, the people of Rome would think and conſider, in what affection, endeavour and jeopardy, our City returneth again into their amity, rather than upon what folly and raſhneſs, it brake their allegiance and revolted. Then, after he had been bidden welcom by the General, entertained with good and gracious words, and highly commended, he received 3000 ſouldiers, to keep, ſurprize, and to ſeize that quarter of the City, where the Samnites were lodged, and which they held: of this regiment and gariſon, L. Quintus a Colonel had the conduct. During this time, Nymphius alſo did his part, F and dealt ſo craftily under hand with the Pretor of the Samnites, that he induc'd and wrought him to this point, That for as much as all forces, were either about Palæopolis or in Samnium, he would permit him with the fleet to caſt about to the Roman coaſts, for that he intended to forrage and waſte, not only the maritime parts, but the territories alſo adjoining to the City: and the better to deceive the enemy (quoth he) I had need to go by night, and therefore the Ships preſently muſt lanch forth, and be ſet aſſay: And to effect this more ſpeedily, all the youth of the Samnites beſides the neceſſary gariſon of the City, was ſent to the ſhoar, where whiles Nymphius in the dark, and amongſt the multitude that thrud one another purpoſely, ſpent time in ſetting confuſedly, ſome to this and others to that, Charilaus, according to the complot ſet before, was by his affociates received into the City, and having filled the higheſt places of the town G with Roman ſouldiers, commanded to ſet up a ſhout, whereat the Greeks upon a ſecret token given them by their Captains, kept themſelves ſtill and quiet. The Nolans then, at the backſide of the town, eſcaped and fled by the high way, that leadeth to Nolæ. And the Samnites being excluded out of the town, as they had a more ready mean to flie for the preſent, ſo they found it, after they were paſt danger, a more ſhameful diſgrace. For, they were diſarmed and naked men, they had left all the good they had amongſt the enemies, and returned home ſpoiled, poor and needy, and ſerved for a laughing ſtock and deriſion, not only to other nations, but alſo to their own neighbors and countrymen. Albeit I am not ignorant that there is another opinion opinion, whereby it is given out that Palapolis was by the Samnits betrayed: yet as I have credited and followed herein such authors, as me thinks it were hard if they should not deliver a truth; for so I am induced the rather to believe that the Neapolitans returned into amity with the Romans, because of the league extant in their name (for unto them afterwards the State and chief seat of the Greeks was translated.) Unto Publius was decreed a triumph, for that it appeared clearly and was believed constantly, that by his siege the enemies were tamed, and so contrained to come to a composition and surrender. Two special favours hapned to this man above all others before him, namely, the prorogation of his government, not granted to any man aforesaid, and triumph after his Magistracy was expired.

Upon the tail of this war, arose another with the Greeks of the other tract or coast. For the Tarentins having born the Palapolitans in hand a good while, and fed them with a vain hope of help, when they heard once that the Romans were possessed of their City, complained themselves like men forsaken, and not as those who had forsaken others, much blaming the Palapolitans, and with anger and envy raging against the Romans. Disquieted also they were, for that news came that the Lucans and Apulians (for both these nations that year began to contract alliances) were under the protection of the Romans. For now (say they) they are well near come unto us, and shortly we shall grow to this pass, that we must acknowledge the Romans for our Lords, or have them our heavy friends. And verily the trial and hazzard of our estate, dependeth only upon the Samnits war, and the event thereof, which nation alone, and the same nothing mighty, remaineth now: since that the Lucans are gone and revolted to the Romans: who yet might be reclaimed and moved to shake off the society with the Romans, if any feat were wrought and practised to sow some discord and dissention between them. These devices and overtures took place and prevailed with such, as were desirous of change and novelty: in so much as certain of the Lucan youth (better known, than trusted and reputed honest, amongst their countrymen and fellow Citizens, hired also for a sum of money) whipped one another with rods, came naked into the assembly of the Citizens, and with open mouth cried out aloud and said, that for presuming only to come into the Roman camp, they were by the Coss, thus scourged, & escaped narrowly the losing of their heads. The thing it self pitious and unieemly to behold, as bearing a shew rather of wrong done unto them, than of any malicious & subtil practice by them intended, stirred the people up, to force their Magistrates with their incessant outcries to assemble a Council. Some standing round about the Senat in council, call hard for war against the Romans: others run up and down to raise the multitude of Peazants to take arms: and in this stir and uproar, which was able to disquiet and amaze even those that were well minded, a decree passed, that the league with Samnits should be renewed, and Embassadors dispatched forthwith, to the same purpose. This was a sudden change: and as it had no colour of cause, so it carried smal credit with it amongst the Samnits, who forced the Lucanians to give hostages, and to take garrisons into their fortresses: and they, blinded with anger, and inveigled with flattery, refused nothing. But shortly after began the fraud to appear and shew it self, namely, after that the authors and devisers of these false surmises and slanders, were retired to Tarentum: but having put themselves out of all, and being not at liberty to dispose of their own affairs, they had nothing else left them, but like fools to repent in vain.

That year hapned to the Commons of Rome another beginning of their liberty, in that they were no more either bound in chains, or held in thralldom by their creditors. Which priviledge against poor debtors, was altered, by occasion of the filthy lust and notorious cruelty of one Usurer. And L. Papirius was the man unto whom C. Publius for his fathers debt, became bound, and consigned himself his prisoner: whose tender age and lovely favor which might and should have moved pity, inflamed the mind of this Usurer to unkind lust and shameful contumely: for making full account, that the prime and flower of his youth should satisfie and pay for the interest of the debt, he first began to allure and entice unto him the youth with wanton & unchast speeches: afterwards seeing that his ears abhorred to hear such filthines, he set to minatory words, & ever and anon put him in mind of his present condition wherein he stood: but last of all, perceiving by him, that he stood more upon his honor and freedom by birth, then respected his hard estate by fortune, he caused him to be stripped naked, and whipping chear to be presented unto him. The poor stripling thus pitiously rent and torn, ran forth into the open street, complained of the filthy lust & cruelty of his creditor. Whereupon, a number of people, enkindled as well with pity and commiseration of the stripling, and indignity of the injury, as also in regard of their own case, and of their children: came running into the Forum or common place, and so from thence in a long train to the court of the Council. The Consuls upon this sudden uproar were forced to call a Senat, and as the Senators entred into the Council chamber, they lay all prostrate at their feet, as they passed by, one after another, & shewed unto them the young mans back and sides in what taking they were. And that one day, by occasion of the outrageous enormity of one person, brake the neck of that mighty bond, whereby, to that day, the creditors had their debtors, in danger unto them. For the Consul, had in charge, to propose unto the people, that from thence forward, no person whatsoever, unless he had committed some heinous fact, and until he wereto suffer therefore, should be either kept in fetters and givies, or stretched upon the rack. Item: that for lent money, the goods of the debtor and not the body should be obliged. So they that were in bondage, became released and enlarged: and order was taken for the time to come, that none should be imprisoned by their creditors again.

The same year, whiles the Samnits war of it self alone, besides the sudden revolt of the Lucans, together

A together with the Tarentines the hatches thereof, held the Senators of Rome in care and perplexity enough: behold over and above all these, the Vestin people, as a surcrease to their troubles, joined and banded with the Samnites. Which new occurrent, as for that year it rather maintained this discourse amongst men in their ordinary talk every where, than ministered cause of serious debating in publick Council: so the Consuls of the year following, L. Furius Camillus the second time, and Jun. Brutus Scaeva, thought no one thing more important than it, and needful to be treated of in the Senat, with the first. And albeit the thing were but new, and a breeding, yet so greatly were the LL. hereabout troubled, that they feared no leis to begin to take in hand, then to neglect it altogether, and not to see it: doubting, lest if they were let go unpunished, the

B neighbor nations would grow too lusty and proud: and again, if they seemed to chastise them by war, the rest for fear of the like measure, might be provoked to anger, take arms, and enter into a general rebellion. And all, and every one of them, namely, the Maritians, the Pelignians and Marucians, were in feats of arms comparable and equal to the Samnites every way: which nations they might be sure to have their enemies, if they medled with the Vestins, and touched them once never so little. Howbeit, that part prevailed and took place, which for the present seemed to carry more courage and valor, then sage advice and wisdom: but the issue and event shewed, that, Fortune favoured Fortitude. So the people by authority and direction of the Nobles, decreed war against the Vestins: the charge whereof light by lot upon Brutus, and Samnium fell to Camillus. To both places were the armies conducted: and by the care and industry employed in the defence

C of the marches and frontiers the enemies were impeached for joining their forces together. Howbeit the Consul Furius Camillus, who had the greater and weightier charge laid upon him, fortunately to fall grievously sick, and thereby could not follow the wars: who being commanded to nominate a Dictator, for to manage and conduct his affairs, declared the noblest warrior in those days, L. Papirius Cursor: by whom Q. Fabius Rutilianus was named General of horsemen, a couple surely of great name and highly renowned for their worthy acts, atchieved in this their government: but yet more famous and voiced abroad, by reason of variance and discord which fell between them: whereby they grew well near to the utmost tears of contesting one another in all extremity. The other Consul warred with the Vestins many and sundry ways, but evermore with like fortune and happy success. For he foraged and wasted their country: and

D by pilling, rising, and burning their houses and corn, forced them against their wills into the field: and in one battel so enfeebled and abated the forces of the Vestins (but not without bloodshed of his own men) that his enemies not only fled into their camp: but also as not trusting now to their ramparts and trenches, they were constrained to steal away into their towns, minding for to save themselves, as well by the natural situation of the places, as the strength of their good walls. In the end, he made assault upon those walled Cities, purposing by force to win them, And first he gained Cusina by scaling, either through the exceeding courage of his souldiers, or their anger, being so chafed as they were at their hurts received: for that scarcely one escaped out of the throng and skirmish, clear & not wounded. Then he likewise took Cingilia: and gave the pillage of both Cities to his souldiers. Neither gates nor walls could stand in their way and keep

E them out. But into Samnium the journey was undertaken by the Dictator with doubtful Auspices and uncertain knowledge of the will of the gods. The default and terror whereof took not effect in the main event and issue of the war, (for it was prosperous and fortunate) but turned to the rage and anger of the chief leaders, who fell out deadly one with another. For Papirius the Dictator, advised by the Pullarius [that had the custody and charge of the sacred Pullers] went back to Rome to take the Auspicium [or the presage by the bird-flight] again: and straightly charged his General of horse to keep himself close within his hold, and in no wise to give the enemies battel during his absence. But Fabius after the Dictators departure, advertised by the espials, that the enemies were even as careless, as loose and disordered, as if there had been no Roman in Samnium: whether it were, that being a stout and lusty young Gentleman, he took foul scorn and thought it

F an indignity, that all should seem to rest in the Dictator only: of that he was induced with the good opportunity of doing some brave exploit (I wot not:) but he went forth with an army in order of battel, to Imbrinium, (that was the places name) & there fought a field with the Samnites. But such was the happy issue of this battel, that if the Dictator himself had been there in person, it could not have been better managed. For neither Captain failed his souldiers, nor souldiers their Captain. The horsemen also under the leading of L. Cominius a Colonel by his place, (who sundry times charged and recharged again, and could not with force break the enemies arrays) unbridled their horses, and so ran them all on the spur: that no strength was able to abide them: such an havock, such a lane made they all about over armour and men. The footmen seconding this hot charge of the horse, advanced the ensigns against the enemies thus put in disarray: and

G twenty thousand men (by report) were that day slain. In some authors I find, that twice in the Dictators absence he fought, and twice had the upper hand. But in the most ancient writers I read but of one battel. In some Chronicles the whole matter is passed over and left out clean. The General of the horse, having gained a mighty mass of spoil, as otherwise he could not chuse, upon so great a slaughter & massacre: gathered together into one heap all the enemies armor made a fire under, & burned them: were it that he had made some such vow to one of the gods: or (as I list rather to believe, it was a motive of Fabius himself, that the Dicta. should not reap the fruit of his glory, and entitle his name thereto: or in pomp carry those spoils before him at his triumph.

T: Oration
of Q. Fabius to his fellow souldiers.

Interrogatories rendered by the Dictator to Q. Fabius.

Moreover, the letters of this victory by him sent to the Senat, and not a word thereof to the Dictator, were some proof, that he was not willing to impart and communicate his praises with him. But certainly, the Dictator took the matter in so ill part, that when every man else was joyful for this noble victory achieved, he only shewed anger and sadness in his very countenance. Whereupon suddenly he dissolved the Senat, and departed in great hast out of the court, giving out and often iterating these words; Then hath the master of horsemen in deed as well overted and overthrown, both Dictators Majesty and military discipline, as defeated the Samnits legions, if he can so go clear away and escape unpunished, with so manifest contempt of my expresse commandment. Whereupon, full of threats and indignation, he hastned to the camp, and took long journeys: yet could he not prevent the bruit of his coming. For, there were Vantecarriers that posted from the City before, to bring word that the Dictator was coming, full of revenge, and set upon punishment, and at every second word almost, commending the late exemplary justice of T. Manlius. Then Fabius immediatly calling an audience, besought the souldiers, that with what valour and vertue they had defended the Common-wealth from most deadly and mortal enemies, with the same they would protect him from the outrageous cruelty of the Dictator, himselfe (I say) by whose conduct and fortune they had gotten so glorious a victory. "For now, coming he is (quoth he) for envy out of his right wits, and beside himself: for anger at another mans manhood and felicity, furious and horn-mad: and all is no more but this, that in his absence, forsooth, we have iped well; who wisheth rather in his heart, if he could change the course of fortune, that the Samnits had won the victory than the Romans: and nothing is so rise in his mouth, as, That his commandment was contemned; as who would say, he forbade not battel with the same mind, wherein he now grieveth that we have fought. For as then his will was good, even for very envy to hinder and suppress the prowels of another, and went about to take weapons away from most forward souldiers, desirous of fight, that in his absence they might not lay hand to their sword: so now, see how he fretteth and fumeth in great choller at this, that without L. Papirius the souldiers were not disarmed, dismembred as it were, and maimed: and for that Q. Fabius forgot not his place, but bare himself as General of the Cavalry, and not as a Servant and follower of the Dictator, standing at receipt, and waiting at an inch when some under Captainship would fall, that he might step into the place. What would this man (think ye) have done, how would he have fretted, if (as the fortune and doubtful chance of war oftentimes goeth) we had been put to the worse and lost the day: who now that the enemies be vanquished, the field so well fought, the State so well served, as by the most singular Captain in the world, better it might not be, thus menaceth execution to me the General of the horse, even in the honour of my conquest? Neither is he (my masters) cruelly bent and set upon mischief against the General of the horse more then against the Colonels, the Centiners and common Souldiers: nay, he would (be ye sure) if he had been able, have ragged and fared as bitterly, yea, and executed his ire and furious rage upon all. But because he cannot, now he dischargeth his gall upon me alone. For even as envy, like a flaming fire, seareth and mounteth up to the highest, so runneth he upon the chief Captain, and aimeth at the head of this worthy exploit. If he had once extinguished him, together with the glory of this brave service, then like a Conqueror and Lord over a poor captive army, whatsoever he might by law execute against a General of the Cavalry, he would attempt and extend, upon the simple souldiers. Make reckoning therefore, that in standing fast to me and in defence of my cause, ye uphold the liberty of all. For in case he shall perceive once, the same agreement of the army in the maintenance of the victory, which was well seen in the battel, and that ye all have a care and regard of the life and safety of one, his stomach will come down, his heart will relent and incline to clemency, and a milder sentence. To conclude, I recommend my life, and whole estate to your vertue and faithful protection. Then from all parts of the audience they cried unto him aloud & bade him take a good heart: for so long as the Legions of the Romans were safe, there should no person do him harm or injury. Soon after came the Dictator, and presently by sound of trumpet summoned a general assembly. And the publick Crier after an Oieze made, called by name for Q. Fabius General of the horse. Who so soon as he was come from a lower place where he was, and approached neer the Tribunal, (then quoth the Dictator) "I demand of thee Q. Fabius, since that the rule of the Dictator is soveraign and highest above all others, whereunto the Consuls, endued with kingly puissance and government, do obey, yea, & Prators created with the same authority that Consuls are; whether thou esteem it meet and right, that a General of horse should be obedient to his commandment or no? I demand likewise, whether I my self, knowing that I took my journey and went from home, with doubtful and uncertain auspices, ought to have put the mainstate of the Common-weal in hazzard against the order and religious observation in that behalf; and not rather, to go again to take new Auspices, that I might adventure & attempt nothing so long as I stood in doubt of the grace & favor of the gods? And withal, this I demand, whether the General of the horsemen could be freed, exempt, & discharged of that scruple of conscience, which checked and stayed the Dictator from execution of his charge? But what mean I to make these demands? seeing that if he had departed without saying one word, yet thou shouldst have framed thy opinion and applied thy mind according to the interpretation of my wil and pleasure? Why sayest thou nothing? Answer me I say, Forbad I thee not expressely, to do any thing in my absence? Forbad I not thee to fight with the enemies? How

A "How durst thou in contempt of my commandment, whiles our Auspicia were uncertaine, whiles our consciences were unresolv'd and with scruples troubled, against Military customs and statutes, against the disciplin of our ancestors, and against the will and direction of the gods: how durst thou, I say, be so hardy as to encounter with the enemy? To their interrogatories make answer directly. Answer I charge thee, to all these points, and nothing but these, and at the peril of thy life, not a word besides. Now come Serjeant and do thine office the while. To which severall Articles, when Fabius could not readily answer point by point, one while complaining that he had him for his accuser, who was the judge of his life and death: otherwhiles crying out aloud, that sooner might his life be taken from him, than the glory and honor of his Acts: and as he justified and excused his own self, so he began again to challenge and accuse [the Dictator]. Then Papirius being in more heat of choler than before, commanded the General of the horsemen to be stripped out of his cloaths and uncased, and the rods and axes to be brought forth ready. With that, Fabius calling earnestly for the help of the souldiers, whiles the officers were a tearing and rentng his cloaths from his back, made means to retire himself into the ranks of the Triarii, who began already to make a mutiny and uproar in the assembly. From whence there arose an outcry over all the audience. Some were heard to intreat, others to threat. They who fortun'd to stand next to the Tribunal, because that being within the view and eye of the Dictator, they might be known and noted, besought his Majesty to spare and pardon the General of the hories, and not with him to condemn the whole army. They that were farthest off in the skirt of the assembly, and especially that troop and company about Fabius, rated and cried out upon such a rigorous and merciless Dictator. And a little thing more would have made them mutiny: nay, within the very compalls of the Tribunal all was not clear and quier. The Lieutenants or Colonels of whole legions, standing about his seat or chair of state intreated him to put off the matter until the morrow: to give his choler some time to cool, and allow space and respit to confide of it with advice and counsel: saying, "That if Fabius had plaid a youthful part, he had paid sufficiently for it already, and his victory had received disgrace and dishonour enough. Beseeching him not to proceed to their extremities of utmost execution, nor to set such a brand and note of ignominy and shame upon the young Gentleman himself, so rare and gallant a Knight; or on his father, a most honourable and excellent personage, nor yet upon the noble house and name of the Fabii. But when they saw how little they prevailed by their prayers, and so little by any reason they could alledge: then, they admonished him to have a regard to the furious assembly of the souldiers: and that it was nor for a man of his years and wisdom, thus to put more fire to the hot stomach of Souldiers enkindled already, nor to administer more matter of mutiny: and if such a thing should happen, no man would impute the blame to Q. Fabius, who sought and humbly craved pardon of punishment, but to the Dictator; if he overcome with choler, should blindly so far push himselfe in wilful peevishness, as to provoke the outrageous multitude against himself. Finally, that he should not think, how they laboured thus for any affectionate favour they bare to Q. Fabius: but were ready to take an oath, that they thought it not safe for the State and Common weal that he should proceed at such a time, to execute the rigor of Justice upon Q. Fabius. By these and such like remonstrances, when as the Liburnians had stirred up the Dictator his blood against themselves, rather then pacified his mood against Fabius; they were commanded to go down from the Tribunal. And when as the Crier had assaid to make silence all in vain, for that by reason of the noise and tumult, neither the Dictator his voice, nor any of his apparitors and halberds about him, could be heard, the night came upon them and ended the contention, as if it had been a battel in field. The General of the horse was commanded to appear on the morrow. Now when as every man gave it out and avouched unto him, that Papirius would proceed more vehemently, for that contesting of the Lieutenants, and that the more he was dealt with at the worse he was, Fabius privily stole out of the camp and fled to Rome. And by the means of his father M. Fabius, a man who had been already thrice Consul and Dictator, the Senat was called together immediately. And as he was in the midst of his grievous complaints before the Lords, touching the violence and wrong of the Dictator, all of a sudden there was heard before the Council House door, a great noise and hurrying of the Lacertæ, whiles they made way and voided the press. And no marvel; for the Dictator himselfe was come with a revenging mind. For to soon as he had heard how Fabius was departed out of the camp, he followed after with his lightest men. Then began the broil to be renewed afresh, and Papirius caused Fabius to be attached. Whereupon the chief of the Nobility, and the whole body of the Senat began to entrepoise themselves by way of mediation: but all their intreaty notwithstanding, he persisted still in his irreparable anger. Then step forth M. Fabius the father, "For as much as God the neither the authority of the Senat nor mine old age whom you seek to make children, nor yet the valor & noble courage of the General of horse by your own self chosen and nominated, can prevail nor any humble prayers which are able to appeale the fury of the enemy, nor yet, and to pacifie the wrath and indignation of the gods: I implore the lawfull help of the Tribuns and to the whole body of the people I appeal. And since that you challenge and except against the judgement of your own army, and of the Senat, I offer and present unto you that judge, who only is of more force and puissance, I am sure, than your Dictatorship. I will see whether you will yeeld to this appeal, wherunto the Roman King Tull. Hostilius give place. Then out of the Council house they went straight to the Common place of audience: and

and when the Dictator, attended with some few, was ascended up, and the General of the Cavalry accompanied with all the whole troop of the chief of the City, Papirius commanded that he should come down or else be fetched from the Rostra, unto the lower ground. The father followed after him. "Well done (quoth he) in commanding us to be brought hither, from whence we may be allowed to speak our minds, if we were no better then privat persons. At the first there passed no continued speeches so much, as wrangling and altercation. But afterwards the voice and indignation of old Fabius, surmounted and drowned the other noise: who greatly blamed and cried out upon the pride and cruelty of Papirius. "What man (quoth he) I have been also a Dictator of Rome my self, and yet was there never so much as a poor Commoner, no Centurion, nor Souldier hardly entreated or misused by me. But Papirius seeketh victory and triumph over a Roman Grand Captain and General, as over the Leaders and Commanders of his enemies. See, see, what difference there is between the government in old time, and this new pride & cruelty of late days. Quintius Cincinnatus a Dictator for the time, proceeded no farther in punishment against Minutius, when he was faine to deliver him lying enclosed & besieged within his own camp, but to leave him as a Lieutenant instead of Consul in the army whereof he had charge. M. Furius Camillus, not only for the present tempered his choler toward L. Furius, who in contempt of his old age and authority, had sought most untowardly and with dishonor in the end: and wrote nothing to the people or the Senat but well, of his Colleague: but also being returned, made a special reckoning of him above all the Tribuns consular, whom also of all his colleagues, when as he had the choice granted him by the Senat, he elected to be his coadjutor in the charge of his government. Neither the people verily, whose power is Sovereign over all, were ever more angry against those, that through rashness and want of skill lost whole armies, than to fine them at a sum of money. For the loss and miscarriage of any battel, that a General should be brought into question and answer for his life, was never heard of to this day. And now, rods and axes, whipping and beheading, are prepared for the Commanders under the people of Rome, and those, who are conquerors and have deserved most justly triumphs; which by no law can be offered to those that have been vanquished. What else I pray you) should my son have endured, if he had really suffered the field to be lost and his army withal? If he had been discomfited, put to flight, and driven clean out of the field, how far forth further would the Dictator his ire and violence have proceeded; than to scourge and kill? And see how fit and seemly a thing it is that the City for the victory of Q. Fabius, should be in joy, in processions to the gods, and thanksgivings, with congratulation and feasting one another: and he himself by whose means the Temples stand open, the Altars smole with incense and sacrifice, and are heaped up again with vows, oblations, and offerings, to be stripped naked, to be whipped and torn in the sight of the people of Rome, looking up to the Capitol and the Castle, lifting up his eyes to the gods, upon whom in two such noble battels he called and invoked, not in vain nor without good and happy success? With what heart will the army take this, which under his leading and conduct, and under his fortune, achieved victory? What lamentation will there be in the Roman camp, and what joying on the other side amongst the enemies? Thus fared this good old father, thus pleaded he by way of expostulation and complaint, calling upon God and man for help, and withal embraced his son in his arms, and shed many a tear. On the one side, there made with young Fabius, and took his part, the majesty and countenance of the Senat, the favour and love of the people, the assistance of the Tribuns, and their remembrance of the army absent. On the other side were alledged against him by Papirius, the invincible government and Empire of the people of Rome, the discipline of warfare, the Dictators commandment (observed and revered at all times, no less then the Oracle & wil of the gods), the severe edicts of Manlius, whose fatherly love and affection to his dear son was set behind the service and common good of the State. Also it was alledged, that the same exemplary justice, as Brutus the first founder of the Roman liberty, executed in his two sons: and now might and kind fathers, indulgent and fond, old men in the case of contempt of other mens commandment, give liberty to youth, and pardon as a small matter, the overthrow of military discipline. Howbeit, he for his part would persist in his purpose still, nor remit one jot of condigne punishment to him, who contrary to his commandment and notwithstanding the trouble and confusion of religion, and the doubtful Aspicia, had given battel, saying, That as it was not in his power to abridge any jot the majesty of that State and Empire for being everlasting to L. Papirius, would diminish naught of the authority thereof, withing, That neither the Tribuns puissance sacred and inviolable in it self, should by their opposition & interposing of their negative voice, violate the Empire of Rome: nor that the people of Rome, should in him above all others abolish and extinguish both Dictator and Dictatorship. Which if it did, the posterity hereafter should lay the weight and blame (although in vain) not in Papirius, but in the Tribuns, and in the perverse judgement of the people: when as the military discipline being once polluted and stained, neither souldier would obey the Centurions commandment, nor the Centurion the Colonels, nor Colonel the Lieutenant, nor Lieutenant the Consul, nor yet General of horse, the Dictator: whiles no man hath regard and reverence either of men or of gods; no Edicts of Dictator, no flight of Birds observed; but that without passport, the souldiers may wander and rove, either in their own ground or the enemies land, and unmindful of their sacred military oath, may cashier and discharge themselves from soldiery, through a licentious liberty of their own, whensoever they list, leaving

A "leaving their ensigns and colours not attended, nor meeting at summons, not repairing to the Rendezvous, according to proclamation: without all discretion, making no difference whether they skirmish by day or night, on even ground or uneven, with advantage or disadvantage, with direction, or without; observing no signals and watchword no array. In sum, the whole course of military service henceforth, blind, rash, and inconsiderate, after the guise of robbing, to stand and go currant for solemn and sacred warfare. With these crimes and absurd inconveniences (O ye Tribuns) charged you must be to the worlds end: lay down you must, and gage your own lives for the audacious disobedience of Q. Fabius, for whom ye are now answerable. The Trib. were astonished hereat, and for themselves now, rather careful and perplexed, than for him who had recourse unto them for refuge and succor. But the general content of the people of Rome, turning to prayer and intreaty, eased them of this heavy load and burden: and with one voice humbly besought the Dictator, to remit the punishment of the General of horse, for their sake. The Tribuns also, seeing that was the way, and all enclining and growing to Petition, followed after, and did the like: earnestly beseeching the Dictator to forgive this human fragility, and youthful folly of Q. Fabius, saying, That he had suffered chastisement enough. Then the young man himself, then his father M. Fabius, forgetting all strife, and laying aside debate, fell down at the Dictator his feet, and besought him to appease his wrathful displeasure. Hereupon the Dictator after silence made, "Yea marry (quoth he) O Quirites, this I like well, and thus it should be; now hath military discipline got the victory, now hath the majesty of your Empire prevailed indeed, which lay both a bleeding, and were in hazzard to have been abolished and overthrown for ever, after this day. Q. Fabius is not acquit of his offence, in that he fought against his sovereigns commandment: but being thereof convicted and cast, is forgiven, nay, is given rather to the people of Rome and the Tribuns power, whose assistance and help is granted for their instant prayers, and not of duty. Well, Rise up Q. Fabius and live, a more happy man for this agreement of the City in thy defence, than for that victory, upon which erewhile thou barest thy self so bravely. Live (I say) thou that hast been so bold to commit that fact, which thine own father here, if he had been in L. Papirius his place, would never have pardoned. And as for me, into my grace and favour thou mayst come again, at thine own will and pleasure: But to the people of Rome, to whom thou art beholden and obliged for thy life, thou shalt perform no greater duty and service than that the example of this days work may be a teaching and warning to thee for ever, to obey, as well in war as in peace, all lawful commands of superiour Magistrates. After that he had pronounced the pardon of the General of horse, and discharged him of the Court, and was departed himself out of the common place of audience, the Senat joyful and highly contented, and the people much more, came all about them, and on the one side bidding joy to the General of the horse aforesaid, and on the other side giving thanks to the Dictator, followed after, and accompanied them both: and it was generally thought, that military government was no less confirmed and established by this peril and danger only of young Q. Fabius, then by the late piteous execution of young Manlius.

By chance that year so fell out, that as often as the Dictator absented himself from the Army, E so often the enemies rose and raised troubles in Samnium. Howbeit, the fresh example of Q. Fabius was ever in the eye of M. Valerius, Lieutenant General and Governor of the camp, who feared as well the dread wrath of the Dictator, as any violent attempts of his enemies whatsoever. Inasmuch, as when purveyours for corn being entrapped by an ambush were slain, in a place of disadvantage; commonly it was thought and beleaved, that they might have been by the Lieutenant rescued and saved, but for fear of these rigorous and terrible edicts. For anger hereof, the Dictator lost the hearts of the souldiers, who were already malecontent, for that he was so inexorable in the cause of Q. Fabius, and had denied them that, at their instant intreaty, which afterwards he yielded unto and pardoned, at the suit and request of the people of Rome. The Dictator, after that he had left for the government of the City L. Papirius Crassus the General of horse, discharged F Q. Fabius, and forbidden him to administer any thing by virtue of that office, returned into the camp. Whose coming was neither very welcome and joyful to his own countrimen the souldiers, nor yet struck any terror in his enemies the Samnits. For, the next morrow, were it, that they knew not that the Dictator was come, or little cared and weighed whether he were present or absent, they approached the camp in order of battel. Howbeit, that one man, L. Papirius the Dictator, was of such valor and importance, that if the love of the souldiers had seconded the policy and sage conduct of their Commander, the war with Samnits had that day been quite dispatched and ended, past all peradventure; so skilfully set he the battel in array, so warily chose he his ground of advantage, so strengthened he the same with supplies out of the reregard, in all warlike skil and singular policy. But the souldiers failed for their parts, and went coldly to G their business, even of purpose, that the valiant and commendable parts of the Captain might be discredited and deprived; and so the victory was much hindered and impeached. Howbeit, many of the Samnits were slain; and in exchange as many of the Romans hurt. But he like a wise and expert Captain, soon perceived, what was the cause that stayed the victory. He saw well enough, that he was to temper his own nature and to allay that severity of his, within mildness and courtesie. And therefore, taking with him the Lieutenants himself in person went about to visit the wounded souldiers, putting his head into their tents & cabins asking each one how they did; harged the Lieutenants, Colonels, Provost-Marshal, and other officers of the camp, to tend and look unto unto the sick souldiers, recommending their care unto them particularly by name. This being a thing in it self popular, he handled and ordered with such dexterity: that by curing their bodies, their minds also and hearts were much sooner gained and reconciled to their General. And nothing made more for the speedy recovery of their health, than their thankful acceptance of that care and diligence of his. When he had thus refreshed and repaired his army, he encountered once again the enemy with assured hope of himself and his souldiers, to obtain a final victory; and so discomfited and put them to flight, that the Samnits after that day, durst never fight again with the Dictator. Then the victorious army marched, as any hope of booty and pillage guided and directed them: and as they overran their enemies country, they found no force nor resistance, either in open shew, or covert ambush. This also encouraged them the more, and cheered their hearts, for that the Dictator had by proclamation given away the whole spoil among the souldiers: so that their privat gain wher them on against their enemy, no less then the common anger and publick quarrel. The Samnits tamed and subdued by these losses and overthrows, sued to the Dictator for peace: with whom they capitulated, and made offer to allow unto every souldier one livery, and the full wages of one year. But being commanded to go to the Senat, they made answer, That they would accompany the Dictator, recommending and putting their cause and whole estate to his faithful protection, to his vertue and goodness only. Thus the Army was withdrawn from the Samnits, the Dictator with triumph entered the City: and when he would have resigned up the Dictatorship, the Senat ordained, That before he gave over, he should create Consuls. So, C. Sulpitius Longus the second time, and Q. Aemilius Carcanus were elected.

The Samnits not having concluded peace, (for that they varied about the conditions, and were to treat farther thereupon) yet brought with them from the City of Rome, truce for a year. Which they observed not faithfully: so soon were their stomacks up again to make war, after they had intelligence, that Papirius was out of government. Whiles C. Sulpitius, and Q. Aemilius (or Aulius as some Chronicles have) were Consuls, besides the revolting of the Samnits, there arose a new war also from the Apulians. Both ways was there a power sent. Sulpitius his lot was to go against the Samnits, and Aemilius against the Apulians. Some write, that upon the Apulians themselves no war was made, but contrariwise, that the confederate States of that Nation were defended from the violence and wrongs of the Samnits. Howbeit, the low estate of the Samnits, at that time, hardly able to maintain and defend themselves, maketh it more likely and credible, that the Apulians, were not warred upon by them, but that the Romans made war with both Nations at once. But no memorable act or exploit was there performed: only the Apulian countrey, and Samnium was wasted: and the enemies no where at all to be found, but at Rome there hapned a scare by night, which raised every man so suddenly out of their first sleep, and so affrighted the City, that presently at one instant the Capitol and the Castle, the Walls and Gates were full of armed men. And when as from all places there was running, and crying alarm, the morrow morning at the break of day, there appeared neither author, nor cause of this fear.

The same year the Tusculans were judicially convened before the people of Rome by process, and that, by a law that Flavius preferred. This M. Flavius, Tribun of the Commons, exhibited a bill of Endictment to the people that some punishment might be inflicted upon the Tusculans; For that through their assistance and Counsel, the Veliterns and Privernats had taken arms against the people of Rome. The Tusculans with their wives and children resorted to Rome. Which multitude having changed their apparel, and clad in poor array and habit, as prisoners at the bar, went about from Tribe to Tribe, falling down upon their knees to every man. Whereupon, pity prevailed more to obtain pardon of punishment, then the goodness of their cause to the purging of their guilt. So all the Tribes except Pollia, disannulled and made void the Endictment aforesaid. But the sentence of the Tribe Pollia was, That as many as were of age and undergrown, to wit, fourteen year old and upward, should be scourged and put to death. Item, that their wives and children, by martial law, should be sold in open port-sale. And for certain it is reported, that the Tusculans took so deep an anger against the authors of so hard a censure and cruel doom, that they have carried it in mind even to our fathers days. For in despite thereof no Candidate, or Competitor for an office of the Tribe Pollia, was ever wont to get the voices of the Tribe Papiria. The year following, whiles Q. Fabius and L. Fulvius were Consuls, A. Cornelius Arvinus Dictator, and M. Fabius Ambustus General of horse, having taken a straighter levy of souldiers then ordinary, for fear of a greater war in Samnium (for it was reported that the whole manhood and flower of the youth were taken up and waged out of the countries adjoining) lead forth a goodly and puissant army against the Samnits. But they pitched their camp so carelessly in the enemies ground, as if the enemy had been far off: and the Samnit legions came on a sudden so proudly, that they set forward the trench and rampart, and encamped close to the Corps de gard of the Romans. Howbeit the night approached so fast, that they were hindered for assailing the Camp: but they gave it out plainly, they would do it the morrow after by day light. The Dictator seeing that he must fight neerer than he expected or hoped; for fear left the straightness and disadvantage of the ground, might prejudice and hinder the valour of his souldiers, leaving fires thick burning in the camp, for to disappoint the sight of the enemies, in the still night with silence leadeth forth his legions: but yet could he not for the nearness of their camp escape, but be espied of them. The horsemen forthwith followed upon them in the tail, and

A and pressed hard upon the army in their march, yet in such sort, that before it was day, they would not fight, nay, the very footmen were not all issued out of the camp before day light. At length when it was broad day, the Horsemen adventured to charge upon the Romans, and partly by playing upon the tail of the hindmost, and partly by skirmishing in places that were hard to be passed over, they hindered their march and kept them behind. In the mean while, their Infantry also overtook the Cavalry, so as now the Samnites with all their forces came upon them. The Dictator seeing he could not go farther without his great loss and disadvantage, commanded his men to fortify even in that very place where he stood: but forasmuch as the light Horsemen of his enemies were overtopped all about, they could not possibly go to provide stakes to make a parapet or rampier, nor begin to cast a trench. When he perceived therefore that he neither could go forward, nor stay and fortifie, he removed all his baggage out of the ranges, and let his men in battel array. The enemies do the like, and were not behind either in courage or in forces. But this most of all heartened and encouraged them, for that they being ignorant that the location of the enemies retreat was the disadvantage and straightness of the place, presumed that they did it upon fear: and therefore they in terrible manner followed after them, as if the Romans had fled and been affrighted. And even that for a good while held the fight in doubtful ballance, albeit the Samnites now a long time had not been used to abide so much as the first shut of the Roman army when they give the charge. But verily that day, from the third hour unto the eight, it is said that the battail stood so equal and indifferent, that neither the shout and cry was redoubled, nor heard the second time, after it was once set up at the first buckling: nor the ensignes were set forward, or withdrawn backward, but remained where they first were: nor yet of any part were they seen to retire or go back, but every man in his degree and place, bending forward and pressing with his shield, without breathing or looking back, still fought a-front: the same noise, one resolution to die or fight it out, and not to give over before utter weariness or dark night. Now began the strength of men to fail, now the spear point and edge of the sword, began to turn and lose their force, and now the Captains themselves were to seek for counsel and what to do: By what time all at once the Samnites Horsemen, hearing that the carriages of the Romans with one only Corner were gone a good way off from the armed soldiers, without any other guard and fortification: for greediness of spoil set upon them. Which when a messenger in great hast and fear reported to the Dictator: Let them alone (quoth he) let them encumber themselves with the spoil, and spare not. Then came others one after another, windles with running, crying out and saying, that all was gone: and that every where the soldiers goods were rifled, ransacked and carried clean away. Whereupon he sent for the General of Horsemen, Seiye not (quoth he) O M. Fabius, the battel abandoned of our enemies Cavalry? They stand still and are encumbered and pestred with our carriages. Now therefore charge upon them, disbanded as they are, (which usually hapneth to any multitude, busy in pillage) find them you shall (no doubt) few on Horseback, and as few with weapon in hand: and while they are loading their Horses with spoil, kill them unarmed, and make it a bloody booty to them, and let them buy it full dearly: as for me, let me alone with the charge of the legions and footmen: have you the honour of the Horsemens service. Then the Cavalry ranged into a Squadron, as exquisitely and skilfully as possibly might be, ran forcibly upon the enemies disarmed and clogged with carriage, beating them down, and making a miserable massacre of them in every place. For being (as they were) among packs and fardels which they cast from them suddenly, and now lay against their feet to stumble on as they fled, and in the Horses way, that were amazed and afraid, they were not able well, either to flie or to fight, and so were slain. When as the enemies Cavalry were thus defeated and welnear all come to naught, then M. Fabius wheeling about his wings of Horsemen, forth to fetch a compass, set upon the Infantry at their backs: Whereupon arose a new fearful cry, which caused the hearts of the Samnites to tremble and quake. The Dictator withal, seeing the formost of the enemies fighting in the front, looking back ever and anon, their ensignes out of order, and all their battailons waving and floting to and fro: called hard upon his souldiers, and exhorted them to fight lustily: cried unto the Colonels, the Sergeants of Bands and Corporals severally by name, to re-engage and renew the battel again with him. Thus with a fresh and new shout, they advance the Standards, and set forward the ensignes: and the farther they march on, the more perceived they the enemies to be troubled, and in dilaray. And now by this time, the Horsemen also were within the sight of the formost in the vanguard: and Cornelius looking back to the bands and companies of his footmen, making sign with hand and with voyce as well as he could, shewed and made demonstration unto them, that they saw the colours and targets of their own fellow Horsemen. Which when they once heard, and saw withal: presently as if they had forgot the battel which they endured almost a whole day, and felt no smart of their wounds, they befriended themselves against the enemy as lustily, as if they had newly come out of their tents, fresh and in heart, and seen but now the signal, and heard the sound of trumpet, to a battel. Now were the Samnites no longer able to sustain the terror of the Horsemen behind, and the violence of the footmen before: but were either slain in the mids between, or scattered abroad in flight. Such as stayed and were environed about, the footmen slew: those who fled, were trodden under the Horse feet and killed: among whom the General himself left his body on the earth. This battel above all other, so quelled and daunted the hearts of the Samnites and crushed their forces, that in all their Diets and Councils they muttered and gave out, That it was no marvel that they

they sped so ill, in all their affairs of arms, the quarrel was so bad and ungodly, and the war begun so contrary to a covenant of truce, and having the very Gods, and that justly, more against them and greater enemies than men: and that such a war must needs cost some great overthrow, and might not be expiated without some notable satisfaction. Here only was the difficulty and difference, whether vengeance and punishment should be taken of the guilty blood of some few, or the guiltless blood of all. And even then, some there were, that durst nominate the very authors of this war. And one specially, to wit, Brutus Papianus, whose name was by the common voice and consent heard above all the rest. A noble and mighty man he was, and without question, the principal breaker of this last truce. The Pretors being enforced therefore, to determine as touching him what was to be done: at length decreed, that Brutus Papianus should be delivered to the Romans, and that together with him, all the Roman pillage and their prisoners should be sent to Rome: and that of all the goods, unto which according to the covenant and composition, the Fetials laid claim, there should, according to right and equity, restitution be made. Then were the Heralds, by vertue of the decree, sent to Rome, together with the deads corps of Brutus: for he to avoid shame and punishment, wilfully killed himself. It was thought good, that with his body all his goods also, should be delivered. Howbeit none of all these things but only the captives, and whatsoever could justly be owned out of the booty, was received: all the rest were offered, but in vain, for nothing was accepted. The Dictator by vertue of an act of the Senat, triumphed. Some write that this war was fought by the Consuls, and that they triumphed over the Samnites: and that Fabius also went forward into Apulia, and from thence brought away great and rich prizes. But without all controversie A. Cornelius, was Dictator that year: this only was the doubt, whether he were created for the conduct of this war, or at the Roman games [Circenses], (because L. Caninius hapned to be grievously sick) to give the signal when the chariots and steeds should be let out of the Barriers to run the race for their prize: and that having done that function of a charge (I wis not worth the remembrance) he should leave his Dictators place. It is not an easy thing to prefer either one matter, or one author before another. I suppose rather for my part, that the record and memorial of these matters hath been depraved and corrupted, by these funeral Orations of praises, and by these counterfeit and false titles of images: whiles every house and family draweth to it, the honour and renown of noble exploits, martial fears, and dignities, by any untruth and lie, so it be colourable. And hereupon, surely it is, that both the deeds of particular persons, and the publick records and monuments of Acts, are confounded: neither is there extant any one writer, who lived in those dayes, upon whom, as a true and certain author, we might ground, and rest our selves.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the Ninth Book.

Thus Veturius and Sp. Posthumius Consuls, having engaged their army so far, within the Gallies streight of Caudium, into a place of great disadvantage, that they had no means nor hope to get forth again, fell to capitulation with the Samnites, and compounded with them: and after they had delivered unto them 600 Roman Horsemen for hostages, they went away with the rest of the army, but so, as they were forced all of them to pass shamefully under the gallows. The same Consuls (even by the motion of one of them, Sp. Posthumius, who perswaded the Senat, that by rendering of those into the enemies hands, through whose default so shameful and ignominious a covenant was concluded, the City might be delivered and discharged of the promise given in the name thereof) with two Tribuns of the Commons, and as many besides as had subscribed to the foresaid accord and agreement, were sent and yielded to the Samnites: but they might not be received. Not long after, Papirius surnamed Cursor, defeated the Samnites, and put them likewise under the gallows: and recovered again those 600 Roman Horsemen aforesaid, that were left for hostages. By which means, the shame and disgrace of the former beastly Act was cancelled and abolished. Two Tribes were added to the rest, Ufentina and Falerina. New inhabitants were sent to people Suessa and Pontiz. Ap. Claudius being Censor, brought a chanel of water to the City, called of his name Claudia: and paved the high way, named after him likewise, Appia. He admitted also into the range of Senators the sons of Libertins. But forasmuch as this state and degree of Citizens, seemed as it were polluted with these unworthy persons among them, the Consuls of the year following, in the review of the Senators, and chusing new, held themselves to the order that other Censors next before had observed. This book conteineth moreover the prosperous wars against the Apulians, Tuscanians, Umbrians, Marsians, Pelignians, Equians, and Samnites: with whom was renewed the ancient league and amity. Flavius the scribe or notary, the son of a Libertin or enfranchised Roman, was made Edile Curule, by the faction of the base common people. Which faction, because it troubled and dis-

A quieted all the assemblies for Elections, the whole Court in Mars field, wherein they take a great stroke and ruled all by means of might and strong hand, were by Q. Fabius the Censor, reduced into four Tribes by themselves: Which was the thing that purchased Fabius the surname of Maximus [i. right Great.]

The Ninth Book of T. Livius.

After this year, immediately followed the peace made at Caudium, so memorable for the Romans foil and misfortune, which hapned in the Consulship of T. Veturius Calvinus, and Sp. Posthumius. During which, the Samnites had for their General Conductor, C. Pontius, the son of Herennius, a most prudent and politick father, and was himself a worthy warrior, and a most excellent Captain. This Pontius, after the Embassadors aforesaid (who had been sent to yeeld and deliver the goods) were returned home without peace concluded, spake thus in a frequent assembly of the Samnites, and said: "Masters and friends, think never, but good there hath been done in this voyage, and our Embassy hath taken some effect. For look what wrath the Gods in Heaven conceived against us, by our breach of covenant and truce, is thereby wholly satisfied, and fully done away. This I know assuredly, that the Gods above (whose pleasure it was, that we should be driven to this neer point and hard exigent, as to render the goods claimed of us, by virtue of an accord and covenant) were nothing contented and pleased, that this our satisfaction and recompence for the breach thereof was so proudly and disdainfully despised and rejected of the Romans. For what could possibly have been done more, either to pacify the Gods, or to appeale men, than that which we offered and performed? Whatsoever we won by way of hostility and spoil, from our enemies, and which by right of war seemed to be ours, we sent back again: the counsellors and perswaders of taking arms, because we could not send alive, we delivered dead as they were: and their very goods also (because nothing might remain with us, to bring us within the compass of their guiltiness) we brought to Rome. What ow I more to thee O Roman? what am I bound to perform besides, in regard either of covenant, or of the Gods, the judges of the covenant? Whom shall I chuse and take for an indifferent arbitrator between thine anger and my punishment? No State and body of people in general, no private person in particular do I refuse: and if no equity and reason for the poor and needy, be reserved amongst men against the greater and more mighty, yet she will I, and have recourse to the Gods, the Revengers of such intolerable pride: and I will pray them to turn their anger upon those, whom neither restitution of their own goods, nor the tending of other mens wital to boot, will serve and content: whose fell cruelty, neither the death of the guilty persons, nor the delivery of dead bodies, neither the owners themselves yeelded, nor all they had in the World rendered with them, can satisfie: briefly, who may not possibly be appealed, without we should part with our heart bloud unto them, for to drink, and give our bowels and entrails to be torn in pieces. The war (O Samnites) is just and right on their behalf, who have no way and means to avoid it: and ever lawfully take they arms, who have no other hope, but in force of arms. Since then, in all the affairs of this World, nothing is of more importance than this, That men weigh and consider, whether the Gods be gracious or adverse unto their enterprises: be sure of this, that as we made our former war not to much against men as the Gods; so, we shall fight that which is now in hand, in the name of the Gods, and under their conduct and guidance. Having spoken by way of Prophecie these words, (which as they were right pleasant and plausible in the hearing, so they proved as true and were verified in the success ensuing) he led forth an army into the field and about Caudium he encamped himself, as covertly as he could. From thence, he sendeth to Calatia (where he heard that the Roman Consuls and their forces lay in camp) ten souldiers disguised in the habit of Herdmen, and commanded them to keep their cattel grazing apart, some in one place and some in another, but never far from the Romans forts and guards: with this instruction, That when they hapned upon any of the Roman foragers and vancurriers, they should agree all in one tale, and say, That the Samnite legions were in Apulia, besieging Luceria with all their forces, and were at the point of winning it by assault. This rumour also was on purpose by others before, for abroad and spread yea, and came to the Romans ears: but these captives made it sound more credible and like to be true, for this especially, that all their words agreed one with another. No man doubted but that the Romans would aid the Lucerns, their good and faithful Allies, and the rather for fear lest Apulia would upon this occasion be troubled and fearful example revolt, and band with the Samnites: and the only thing they thought upon was this, Which way to go unto them. For twain there were leading to Luceria: the one broad and open, along the coast of the Adriatick Sea: but as it was the safer, so it was the farther about. Another shorter cut there was through the freights or gullet of Caudium called Furcula Caudina. But the natural situation of the place is thus: There are two deep, narrow, and woldy passes, or dales, one in the tail of the other, with continual crests and ridges of hills round about them: between them lieth enclosed in the midst, a good large plain or meadow, green of grass and full of waters, through the midst whereof, there lieth a direct passage. But before ye come to that green, ye must enter into that first freight aforesaid, and return again either the same way that ye went in, or if ye proceed to go forward, ye must pass through another such pass or freight, but narrower and more cumber some than the other. Into that plain aforesaid the Romans marched down with their army another way, through and hollow rock; but when they went on forth to the other freight valley, they found it stopped and made up with the fall of trees, one cross over another, and likewise with an huge heap of mighty stones, laid full against them in the way. And they had not so soon discovered this guilful practise of their enemies, but they might descry withal, a power of them also on the top of the Hill. Then with all speed they seek to go back again the same way they came; but it they found also dammed up in like sort, and beset with armed men. Whereupon they made a stand, without any mans commandment: and as their minds were all amazed and astonied, so their bodies also were possessed as it were with a strange and extraordinary nummedness in their limmes: and whiles they looked one upon another, each man thinking his fellow to be more witty, and have better understanding than himself; for a good while they stood still, and said not a word. But afterwards, when as they saw the two Consuls pavilions setting up, and some making ready things necessary to fortification; although they saw well enough, that in this desperate case, past all hope of recovery, for all the defences they could devise, they should but lose their time and travel and prove fools in the end: yet nevertheless, because they would not seem to encrease their distressed fortune, and double it with their own default and negligence, every man what he could, to his power, without the direction of any leader, settled himself to work, and to fortify along the water side their camp, with a trench and rampier. And besides the insolent and proud scoffing and derision of their enemies, every man with pitiful confession scorned and checked his own work and travel, as vain, and to no purpose. As the Consuls then were pensive and discomforted, and called none about them to counsel, (for that indeed they supposed they were past all advice and help) the Lieutenants and Colonels came unto them of their selves unient for, and the souldiers turning to the Prætorium or Consul's Quarter, cryed to their Captains for help and succour, which hardly the very immortal Gods could afford and give them. But they, rather made their moans and complaints one to another of their misfortune, than sat in sage counsel to give or take advise, until the night came upon them: whiles each man according to his natural humour and fancy, muttered diversly. "One said, let us break through the stoppages opposed against us in the way: another, let us pass over the mountains and woods before us, what way soever we may be able to cary armour: for so we get to the enemy once, whom we have almost for these thirty years vanquished and chased before us; all will be plain, even and easy unto us Romans fighting against these faithless, perjured, and disloyal Samnits. Tush, saith another, whither should we go, or which way? What? Are we about to remove mountains out of their places? So long as these tops of Hills are over our heads, how will you possibly come to the enemy? Armed or unarmed, courageous or cowards, all is one, we are trapped we are and undone every one. Our enemy will not to much as offer us the sword, whereon we may dye like men with honor: he will sit still and end this war. Thus passed words to and fro, and thus passed the night away: unmindful were they of taking repast, never thought they of taking repose and sleep. The Samnits on the other side, in this so fortunat and happy opportunity presented unto them, were as much to seek what to do, and what course to chuse and follow. Whereupon, they all in general were to dispatch letters to Herennius Pontius, the father of their General, and to know his opinion. Now this man beforetime, by reason of his great age, had given over not only Military affairs, but also all civil businesses: howbeit in that old crasy and spent body of his, he bare the fresh vigour of mind and a pregnant wit to give counsel. When he undertood that the Romans army was shut up fast within the two forrests, at the Caudine Gulleys, and that his advise was asked by his sons messenger: he gave presently this counsel, That with all speed they should be let go from thence every one, without any harm at all done unto them. Which opinion of his being rejected [of his son and the army] his mind was demanded a second time, by the same carrier sent again unto him of purpose. And then he gave advise, that they should be all killed, and not one left alive. Upon which answers so far disagreeing, and thus delivered, as it were out of a doubtful Oracle: albeit his son himself imagined, of all others most, that his fathers wit was in the wane, and aged as well as his feeble wasted body: yet by a general consent of all he was overcome, to send for him in person for to declare his meaning by word of mouth. Neither thought the old man much thereof, but was brought (by report) to the camp in a chariot: and being called to counsel, he was in the same tale still, so as he nothing changed of his former advise, but alleged only causes and reasons thereof. "Namely, that in his former resolution (which he took to be simply the best) his meaning was, by a singular benefit and good turn; to confirm peace and amity for ever, with a most mighty and puissant people: in the second his purpose was, by the utter losse of two armies, whereby the State of Rome would not easily recover their strength again, to defer the wars for many a year. And as for a third counsel, he had none at all. When his son and other chief Captains, by questioning inquired of him, what if a middle course between both were taken, namely, to diminish them safe, and according to the Law of arms and conquest to impose upon them, hard Laws and Conditions? "Marry (quoth he) this is the way indeed, that neither winneth you friends; nor yet riddeth you of your foes: save them whom ye have provoked with shame and disgrace; and see what ye get thereby. The Romans are of this nature, that they cannot be still and quiet so long as they have the worke; it will never dye in their hearts, but wil be alwayes fresh whatsoever shame this present extremity shal brand them with: "and

- A "and never will it give them any rest, before they have been by manifold and sundry wayes revenged, of you. So his advise was not accepted; neither the one nor the other, and old Herennius was carried home again from the camp. The Romans likewise in the camp, after many attempts (but all in vain) for to break forth and escape away, being now in great penury and scarcity of all things, for very necessity were driven to send Embassadors unto the enemies: who first should crave an equal and indifferent peace: and if they might not obtain it, then to bid defiance and challenge them to a battell. Pontius made answer, that there was no talking of battels: for that the field was won already: and because they being vanquished, and as good as taken captive, knew not how to come down and confess their poore estate: he gave them to understand, That he would put them under the gallows, depailed of their armour, and stript into their shirts: and as
- B for other conditions of peace, they should be such, as were meet to pass between men conquered, and conquerours: namely, if they would depart out of the Samnits country, withdraw their colonies, and so both Samnits and Roman in equal alliance live under their own laws and customs: upon these Articles and Capitulations, he was content to come to some point of accord with the Consuls. If any of these covenants disliked them, then he forbade the Embassadors to repair again to him any more, but at their peril. When relation of this answer was made in the camp, there arose suddenly such a sighing and groaning amongst them all, and so great penitiveness and anguish of heart seized upon them, that it seemed they could not have taken it more heavily, and to the heart, if word had been brought that they must all have died in the place. After long silence, when as the Consuls wist not how to open their mouth, either for the accord and composition
- C so shameful, or against it so necessary, then Leontulus, who as well in regard of his vertue, as of his dignities, was chief of all the Lieutenants, said: "I have heard my father (quoth he) O ye Consuls, oftentimes make report, that he was the only man in the Capitol, who perswaded the Senate, not to ransom and redeem with gold; the City from the hands of the Gauls; at what time as they were not inclosed either with trench or rampier by their enemies. (a Nation to say a truth, of all others most idle in such works, and fortifications) but might have broken through them, if not without great danger, yet without evident ruin, and assured destruction. Were the case so now, that as they then, being armed might have run down out of the Capitol upon their enemies under them (in which sort oftentimes the besieged have sallied out upon them that lay in siege) so we might but fight with our enemies in any place (it skilleth not)
- D good or bad, even or uneven: I would not in giving counsel, be any jot behind my father in courage and valor. For I confess, verily, that to die for our country is a brave death: and for my own part, ready am I even to offer my body as a sacrifice to present death, yea, and it were, to engage my self among the thickest of my enemies; thereby to save the people of Rome and the legions: But alas, here I see my country, here I see all the Roman Regiments and Legions that are, who unless for their own selves they will run upon their death, what have they else to save by their death? Why, will some man say, the houses and buildings of the City, the walls, and that multitude that inhabit the City. Nay rather, if this army fortune here to miscarry, they are all clean betrayed into the enemies hand and not saved. For who shall defend them? Peradventure, the weak and unarmed multitude: even as well surely as they defended it against the violence of the
- E Gauls: Or, will they send for an army from Vell; and beseech the help again of Captain Camillus? Even the one as well as the other. But here in this place is our whole hope, here is all our power and puissance: in saving it, we preserve our country; in offering it to die, we abandon and betray our country. To yeeld and render our selves, is a foul and shameful thing; true, but such is the love of our Country, that we ought to preserve it, as well with our utter shame, if need require, as by our death. Let us undergo then, and abide this shameful indignity whatsoever, and obey that fatal necessity, which the very Gods themselves cannot overcome. Go to then, Consuls, a Gods name, redeem the City with your armor and weapons; which your forefathers ransomed with their gold. Then went the Consuls to Pontius for to parley. And when as he began like a conqueror to debate about the capitulations of Covenants, they denied plainly
- F that any league could be made, without the privacy, will and authority of the whole people: nor without the Feclals, and other solemn and usual Ceremonies. So that this Caudine accord was not (as commonly it is believed, and as Claudius also writeth) concluded by form of absolute covenant, but by way of stipulation and promise. For what needed either sureties in a perfect agreement and league, or hostages to be given when the matter is passed by this form of prayer; By whose default it hapned that the conditions agreed were not observed, that people Jupiter would so smite, as the swine there was by the feclal smitten? The Coss. Lieutenants, Treasurers, and Colonels, who undertook as sureties, subscribed and signed: and the names yet are extant of them all: where, if the matter had passed by way of an absolute league, there should have been subscribed no more but the names of two Feclals only. Moreover, by reason that the conclusion of
- G this accord was of necessity deferred, there were required also 600 Horsemen hostages, who should lose their heads, in case the covenants of the agreement were not observed. And thereupon was the time appointed and set down of delivering the said hostages, and yeelding the army without their armor. Now the coming of the Consuls renewed again the sorrow in the camp: that hardly they could hold their hands from those, through whose rash conduct they were come to that place of disadvantage: and through whose cowardie they were to depart from thence more shamefully, than they came: complaining that they had not so much as a guide to direct them, nor an especial to discover the coast: but like beasts were driven blinded into a trap or pitfall: and one looked upon another beholding the armor that within a while they were to deliver up, viewing their right hands, which anon should be unarmed, their naked bodies exposed to the mercy and devotion of the enemy. They set before their eyes, the gallows prepared by the enemy for them to pass under, the scorn and reproachful taunts of the victor, his proud and disdainful looks, and how they (disarmed) should pass in a long train and go through the armed enemies: then afterwards, the piteous spectacle of the way which they must go, and the shameful dismarch of their disgraced army: briefly, their foul and dishonourable return through the Cities of their allies unto their country and parents, whither they themselves and their ancestors oftentimes had gone in triumph. They were the only enemy which without wound, without dint of weapon, without battle fought, were discomfited and vanquished: who might not so much as draw their sword, and never came to joyn or encounter with their enemy; having armor, having strength of lim, having hearts given them in vain. As they brayed out with great discontentment and anguish, these words, the fatal hour of their reproach and shame was come: which by proof and sensible experience, was to make all matters more heavy and woful, than they conceived and imagined in their minds aforehand. First and foremost were they commanded all to go forth without the trench disarmed, and in their single garments: then were the hostages presently delivered, and had to ward: after this, were the Sergeants and Officers willed to depart from the Consuls: whose rich coats of arms, when they were plucked from their shoulders, moved such pity and compassion even in them, who a while before with all crying and bawling, judged them worthy to be delivered bound hand and foot into their enemies hands, for to be mangled despiteously and cut in pieces: that every man forgetting his own estate, wherein he stood, turned away his eyes, as it were from an abominable spectacle, and could not endure to behold that disgraceful and disgracing of so great state and Majesty. The first that were put under the gallows, were the Coll, well-near half naked: and according to their degree and place; so was every one in order put to the shame: and afterward, the legions one after another. The enemies in their armor stood all the while about them, scorning, mocking, and making a game of them: many had swords and daggers set against their hearts, in menacing wise, some were hurt and stabbed to death; namely, such as with stern countenance and grim looks above the rest, for the indignity of these things, offended the conqueror. Thus were they sent with shame enough under the gallows, and (that which was more grievous than the thing) even in the sight and view of their enemies, they were not so soon got out of the Forrest, but although they seemed but then as plucked out of dark hel to see the day, yet the very light it self was worse than all kind of deaths, when they beheld so illfavoured an army and unseemly. And therefore, albeit they might have reached to Capua before night, yet being doubtful of the faithfulness and protection of their allies, bese dismissed for very shame, they cast their poor and silly bodies upon the ground, about the high wayes no far from Capua. Whereof, when news came to Capua, the just and due pity which they took of their allies, overcame the inbred arrogancy and pride of that people by kind. Immediately they sent unto the Coll, the ensignes and ornaments belonging to their place of authority, the Victors and Sergeants with their rods, they sent armor and Horses, apparel and victual also for the souldiers bountifully, and as they came near to Capua, the whole Senat and people went out to meet them, and performed all duties of kindness and hospitality, both privat and publick; that could be devised, and as meet was and requisite. And yet neither the courteous usage, nor the pleasant countenances and lightsome speeches of their allies, could draw from them any words, no, nor so much as make them to hold up their heads and eyes, and to look again upon their friends, when they yielded them all these comforts they could. So as, besides their grief and sorrow of heart, a certain bashfulness and shame forced them to shun all communication and conversing with men. The morrow after, when as certain young Gentlemen of the Nobility were returned, who had been sent in convoy from Capua, to accompany them and bring them on their way, as far as their liberties and confines: they were sent for into the Senat-house, and being demanded by the ancients and elders, what news: they reported, that they seemed unto them much more heavy and cast down than before, so silent and in manner dumb, they marched along: that noble mind and courage of the Romans was now mute and dumb, their hearts clean done and gone, together with their armor, not able to greet again, no, nor to give a word to those that saluted them, not one of them for fear able to open his mouth, as if still they bare that yoke and gallows upon their necks, under which they went. That the Samnites had indeed not only a brave victory, but also a perpetual over them, and the hand of them for ever: and had now won not Rome, as the Gauls aforetime, but also (which was a more hardy and warlike exploit) had conquered the Romans courage, stoutness, and valour. As these news were reported, and audience given thereto, with such assent, that every man lamented how the Roman name, as desperat; and concluded generally it was in the counsel of these their faithful confederats, that they were past recovery: one Offilius Calpurnius, the son of Octavius, a man right nobly born, renowned for his valiant Acts, and besides, very grave and reverend for his age, spake by report in this manner and said, That he took the matter far otherwise than they all did: for that stubborn and resolute silence, (qd. he) those eyes fastened so wistly on the earth, those deaf ears to admit all solace and comfort, that shame of theirs to look up and behold the light, were expresse and certain tokens of them that tossed and rolled from the very root and bottom of their hearts, a huge heap and mass of anger & despite, Either (qd. he) I know not the nature of the Romans, or else that silence & silence will

A will shortly cost the Samnites, woful cries and doleful groans: and the remembrance of this Omnium accord, will be more heavy and dolorous a good deal to the Samnites than to the Romans: for as for them, they will every man find their hearts and courages again, wherefore they shall hap to encounter; but the Samnites shall not meet every where with the Caudine flight: for their purpose. And now by this time was this shameful overthrow and disgrace known at Rome. Intelligence they had before, how they were beset and enclosed about: but afterwards arrived a messenger with news more heavy and sorrowful for that ignominious peace, than for any peril and danger (otherwise). At the first noise and bruit that they were besieged, they began to mutter; but after they heard that they had so shamefully yielded themselves, all that preparation of aid and succor was discharged and sent away: and presently without any order from publick authority, they gave themselves every one to all manner of mourning and lamentation. The shops all about the marketplace were shut up. A general vacation began of it self, and pleading in all courts ceased, before Proclamation made: the purple and scarlet robes were left off, the golden rings laid away, and the whole City in a manner more sorrowful and heavy, than the very army. Neither were they angry and offended with the Captains only, with the authors of the peace, with the cautious and inforties for the same; but hated also the guiltless soldiers, denying freely, that they were worthy to be received into City or house. Which hear of stomach and wrathful indignation, the first arrival of the army, utterly allayed: which even to angry persons was pitiful and lamentable. For they returned not as men that escaped safe, alive, and unlooked for into their country, but like captives in habit and countenance: they entered late into the Town, and hid their heads, every man within own house: so as the morrow after, and for certain dayes following, none of them would come into the market place, nor put his head out at dores to look into the streets. The Consuls likewise for their part, kept in, as privat men, and would exercise no function pertaining to their charge, but only that which they were forced unto by an act of the Senat: namely, to nominate a Dictator for to be President at the Election of Consuls. So, they decreed Q. Fabius Ambustus for Dictator, and P. Valerius General of Horse. Who being wrong created, and without the approbation of the Auspices, there were chosen in their room, M. Aemilius Papirius for Dictator, and L. Valerius Flaccus General of the Horsemen, and yet by them was not the assembly holden for the Election above said. And for as much as the people were even weary again of all that years Magistracy, as unlucky and unfortunate, it grew at length to an Interregnum. So Interregents there were, Q. Fabius Maximus, and M. Valerius Corvinus, who created Consuls, Q. Publius Philo, and L. Papirius Cursor for the second time: with the whole consent, no doubt, of the City for that in those dayes there were not two more noble and renowned Captains so to be found.

These same day they were created, they entered their Magistracy (for so the LL. of the Council had decreed:) and after certain solemn and ordinary acts of the Senat passed, they went in hand to confult about the treaty of the Caudine peace. And Publius, whose countie it was then to have the sovereignty of rule, "Speak (quoth he) Sp. Posthumius, to the matter propounded, and let us hear your opinion, and what you can say. Who after he was risen and stood up,

E "with the very same countenance and cheer that he went under the gallows: I am not, (quoth he) "O ye Consuls, ignorant, that I am first called forth, not for honour, but to my disgrace: and "commanded to speak, not as a Senator and Counciller, but as a man culpable and accused, both "for an unfortunate war administrated, and a shameful peace concluded. Howbeit, seeing that "ye have not propounded and touched ought, concerning either our trespass or our punishment, "setting apart all kind of excuse and defence, which would be no very hard matter to maintain, "before men that are not ignorant of humane fortune, and of necessities, whereto men may be "driven. I will in brief deliver my mind concerning that, which you have moved and propounded. Which sentence of mine may sufficiently witness and testify, whether I meant to spare mine "own life, or save your legions, when as I became bound to that dishonest or necessary stipulation and promise, call it whether ye will. And yet, seeing it was made without the peoples pri-

F "vacy and grant, the State of Rome is not obliged thereto, and thereby nothing due to the Samnites, but only our bare bodies. Let us therefore be rendered by the hands of the Feciales and "literally, in our shirts, and fast bound: let us deliver and rid the people of all scruple and trouble "and conscience, if we have entangled them with any; that there be no let in Law of God or man, "but that both justly and lawfully ye may begin the war anew. In the mean while my mind and "advice is, that the Consuls levy, enroll, arme, and lead forth an army: but not to enter within "the enemies marches, before all things duly belonging to the delivery of us into their hands, "be fully accomplished. Now, I pray and beseech ye, O immortal Gods, that seeing it was not "your good will and pleasure, that Sp. Posthumius and T. Veturius Consuls, should with fortunate

G "conduct fight against the Samnites, yet ye would be satisfied herewith, That ye beheld us put under the gallows: that ye saw us obliged in an infamous and shameful bond of covenant: that "ye now view us naked and delivered bound into the enemies hands, ready to receive upon our "heads even with the loss of our lives, all their anger, malice, and despight: and that it would please "you, that the new Consuls and Legions of the Romans, may in that sort war with the Samnites, "as even more the wars before us Consuls have been conducted, managed, and performed. When he had spoken these words, all men both so wondred at this man and pitied him too, that one while they would not believe he was the same Sp. Posthumius, who had moved and perswaded so foul and dishonest treaty of peace: otherwhiles they lamented that so brave and noble a personage should suffer any especial torment above others, at the enemies hands, for anger and despite of reverting and breach of that accord. Where as now they all after singular praises of the man, condescended to his opinion: the Tribuns of the Com. L. Livius and Q. Mucius, attempted for a while to oppose themselves against this proceeding: saying, "That neither the people could be acquit and absolved in conscience, by their delivery, unless every thing were again restored to the Samnites, in the same estate wherein they stood at Caudium: nor they themselves (in that they subscribed and became bound for the accord of peace, to save the holt of the people of Rome) had deserved any punishment: nor yet, last of all, ought they being sacred Magistrats and inviolable, to be yielded to the enemies, and exposed to any outrage and violence. Then (quoth Postumius) in the mean while deliver us up that are but lay and profane men, whom with safe conscience and without offence ye may. And as for these, so sacred as they now be, ye shall hereafter render them likewise, so soon as they are out of their charge. But if ye will be ruled by me, let them before they be thus yielded, here in this common Hall be whipped and scourged for the hurt and interest of their punishment, which they would seem to defer and put off so long. For whereas they alledge and say, That by the delivery and yielding of us, the peoples consciences cannot be cleared and absolved: who is so ignorant in the Fediales and Heralds law, that knoweth not that these men spake this, for this end rather, that they themselves might not be rendered, than for that the truth requireth so. Neither do I deny my Lords, that bare promises and stipulations are unviolable, and to be kept as well as covenants and obligations with these men, among whom both Religion to Godward, and faithfulness to men is in regard and estimation: but I deny again, that without the peoples assent and grant, any thing can be established good and effectual, to bind the people thereunto. What! if the Samnites, in the same pride and insolency, wherein they obruded and forced upon us this stipulation, yea, and wrung it from us, would also have urged us to utter and speak the solemn form of words, which they me to do that surrender up Cities: would ye (my Masters that are Tribuns) infer and say, that by vertue thereof the people of Rome is surrendered into their hands? and that this City, with the Temples, Chappels, Limits and Waters, by strength thereof, are the Samnites possession? Well, I let pass to speak of dedition: because the matter in question is touching only a stipulation. What, I pray you, if we had promised and undertook, that the people of Rome should forsake and abandon this City? or set fire on it? or not have Magistrats, Senat, or laws any longer? or to be governed again by Kings? God forbid and deny that, say you. Well, it is not the indignity of things, that easeth the bond or Stipulation. If there be any one case, wherein the people may be obliged, then in truth may they be in all as well: neither skilleth it any whit, (whereat haply some will make a stay, and think it is material) whether Consul, Dictator, or Pretor, enter into bond and become surety. And even this was, that the Samnites themselves judged so to be, and stood upon: thinking it not sufficient, that the Consuls became bound, but they put the Lieutenants, the Treasurers, and the Colonels there, to the same. And now, let no man demand of me, why I entered so into stipulation, being a thing not incident to the Consul his charge and right, neither was I to undertake unto them peace, which was not in my power to effect: nor in your name to promise it, from whom I had no commission and warrant. Certainly my Lords M and Senators, there was nothing at Caudium done at all by mans policy and counsel. The immortal Gods bereft both your Generals and the enemies too, of all their sense and understanding: for neither we, in the conduct and ordering of our service, stood warily enough upon our good guard: and they again, as they gat the victory full badly, so they lost it as lewdly: whiles they hardly trusted the strength of those places, by means of which they had gained the vantage and better hand of us: and while they made such haste, upon what agreement they cared not, to disarm men that are born martial, and naturally made for wars. For, if they had been in their right wits, what an hard matter was it for them, in the time that they sent for old aged men from their home, to come to Councel, for to have dispatched their Embassadors to Rome? and so to have dealt and treated with the Senat and people, about a perfect peace and final league indeed? It had been but three dayes journey for men not encumbered, but lightly appointed. All that mean while there might have been truce, until the Embassadors from Rome, had brought them either certain victory or assured peace. For that had been a covenant and stipulation good in law, the which we should have agreed unto, by warrant of the peoples will and approbation. But ye would never have granted and allowed it: no more should we have entered into any such stipulation. Neither was it Gods will and providence, that there should be any other issue and end of things, than this: that both they should vainly be deluded, and feed themselves as it were, with the fancy of a more joyful dream than their minds could well conceive and apprehend: and also that the same fortune, which had entangled, snared and brought into danger our army, should relieve the same, and rid it again out of perill, that as their victory was frivolous and vain, so a vainer and more frivolous peace, should make it frustrat and worth nothing: and that such a stipulation and promise should be interposed and come between, which might oblige and bind no person, but the very makers themselves. For what dealing hath there been with you my Lords of the Senat? or with the people of Rome? Who can challenge you? Who can call you into question? Who can come forth and complain that he is by you deceived? Enemy, or Citizen? To enemy ye have passed no promise: Citizen to undertake for you and in your name, ye commanded

A "commanded none. Therefore ye have nothing to do to meddle with us, to whom ye gave "nought in charge: and with the Samnits as little, with whom ye had no treaty at all. To the "Samnits, we are sufficient pledges enough, and answerable to perform that which is our own:
"for that, I say, which we are able to make good and yeeld: even our bodies and lives: upon
"these let them exercise their rage, upon these let them whet their swords and their spiteful "malice. And as for the Tribuns of Commons, consult ye together, whether they may be fet"tered presently, or ought to be reserved and put off to another day: let us in the mean time (O
"Voturnus, and ye that are the rest) offer these wretched heads and lives of ours, like captives to "discharge our bond, and by our punishment and execution, deliver and set free the Roman B "army.

Both the cause it self, and the Advocate also, moved the Lords of the Senat: and wrought so much not only with the rest, but also with the Tribuns themselves [of Commons] that they promised to be at the Consuls ordering and appointment. Whereupon immediately they gave up their offices, and were delivered into the Fecials hands with the other, to be led all, to Caudium.
There was not so soon an act of the Senat passed hereof, but it seemed that the very light and rayes of the Sun shone upon the City again. Posthumius was in every man his mouth, him they praised and extolled to the heavens: comparing him with the voluntary offering of P. Decius the Consul, for the safety of the army, and other worthy and noble acts of others: Saying, that by his overture, by his means and travel, the City was delivered from a servile, dishonourable and un-

C honest peace: He (say they) hath offered himself to all the torments, anger, and vengeance of the enemies, and made full satisfaction thereby for the people of Rome. Nothing now but war, war: Alarm, now cryed every man: and, oh, that ever they might see the day to encounter once again with the Samnits, in their armour and with weapon in hand. So, while the City was thus inflamed and boiled with hateful ire and indignation, there was an army levied, well near all of Voluntaries. New legions were mustred and enrolled again out of the same souldiers, and a puissant army set forth to Caudium. The Fecials marched before, and when they were come to the gate of the City, commanded the Sureties, such as had subscribed and signed the accord aforesaid, to be despoiled and stript out of their cloths, and their hands to be pinioned behind him. And when the Licor or Serjeant, for very reverence of Majesty in Posthumius his person, bound him

D at large and at ease, Why doest not thou (quoth he) draw and pull the cord-streighter, that the rending and delivery of us may be according to law and as it ought to be, and no fault to be found withal? Afterwards, when they were come into the assembly of the Samnits, and before the Tribunal judgment seat of Pontius: A. Cornelius Arvina one of the Fecials or Heralds thus spake: Forasmuch as these persons, without commandment and commission from the Quirites and people of Rome, have undertaken by stipulation, That there shall a league and peace be made with you: and in so doing have offended and trespassed against the State, therefore, to the end, that the people of Rome might be freed and absolved from a detestable and heinous offence, Here I deliver and yeeld unto you, the self same men: No sooner had he uttered these words, but Post- humius with his knee smote the Fecial his high, with all the might he could: and with a loud

E voyce said, That he being now a Samnit citizen, and the other an Ambassador and an Herald of the people of Rome: had against the Law of Nations injured him and offered him the abuse:
whereby the Romans might more justly make war. Then quoth Pontius, "This delivery nei"ther will I accept of and admit, neither shall the Samnits hold it good and lawful. But why "doest not thou Sp. Posthumius, if thou believe there be any Gods, either undo and cancel all, or "stand to thy bargain and covenant? For by right either are they all due unto the Samnits, whom "they once had in their power: or else peace, in lieu of them. But why speak I thus, and chal"lenger thee, who doest yeeld thy self again prisoner to the conqueror as faithfully and loyally as "thou canst? The people of Rome I challenge, who, if they repent of the promise and bargain
"made at the streights of Caudium, let them bring again the Legions into that gullet, wherein F "they were environed, enclosed, and compassed. Let no man deceive and delude other. Let all "be undone again, and every thing as it was: let them take again their armour, which by cove"nant they yeelded up: let them return into their own camp, and have whatsoever they had the "day before the Parle. Then let them please themselves with war, with valiant and magnanimous

"deeds: refuse they then, and spare not all covenant: reject they then all treaty of peace: Let us
"have the same fortune, the same opportunity and vantage of the places, which we had before "the mention of peace: and to make war, and trie the issue. So shall neither the people of "Rome, blame the Consuls stipulation, nor we find any lack and default in the faithfulness of the "people of Rome. And will ye never have done, but alwayes find shifts and excuses, and not "stand to your covenants, when ye are overcome, and have the worse of your enemies? We gave G "sometimes hostages to King Porfenna: and when ye had done, afterwards stole them away. For "a sum of gold you bought again your City of the Gauls: and as they were receiving the same

"gold, murdered they were by you and beyn in pieces. Peace ye have covenanted with us upon "condition that we should restore again your legions unto you: that peace you cancel and make "void, and evermore ye set some colour of right upon your cautelous and fraudulent dealing. Well,
"alloweth not the people of Rome of the saving of their Legions, by a dishonorable and shameful
"peace? Say it is so. Let peace go whether it will: but give you again to the Victor your Legions "captivat. Is this your faithful dealing? are these your covenants, & ceremonies of Fecials & He"ralds?

“ralls? that thou, according to the agreement and accord, shouldst have that desire of shine, H “even to many citizens lives saved? and I not have the peace (which by letting mine hold go un“to thee an enemy) bargained for? What Justice is this, that thou, O Cornelius, and ye that are “heralds, prescribe to Nations abroad? Nay verily, I neither will accept of those perions whom “ye make a shew to deliver, neither can I believe, that they are yeccided in verity and good earnest.
 “Nay, I pass not at all, whether they return again into that City, which is obliged by a covenant “made, attended upon with the wrath and displeasure of all the Gods, whose heavenly power “and deity is thus deided. Now go and make war, seeing that Sp. Posthumius ere while thrust “and pushed an Embassador herald with his knee; and so the Gods will believe no doubt, that “Posthumius is a Samnit citizen, and no Roman; and that by a Samnit, a Roman Embassador hath “been abused: and thereupon you may take a just occasion and good quarell to make war upon “upon us. Are you not ashamed, and bash you not to broach and set abroad, in the view and “face of the world, such mockeries of Religion? What? old and ancient grave personages, and “such as have been Consuls, to seek such subtle devices (not fit for very children and babes to “play with) and all to shift off and falsify their promise made by covenant? Go Lictors, loose the “Romans of their bands: and no man so hardy as to stay them, but that they may depart when “they will at their own pleasure. So they, having thus perhaps discharged the publick fidelity, “or at least wifely quit themselves undoubtedly of their own, returned from Caudium, unhurt, to “the Roman camp.

The Samnits seeing that in lieu of a proud and unreasonable peace, there was a most cruel war new sprung up again, not only foresaw and apprehended in their minds, but well beer saw evidently with their eyes, all that ever ensued after. Then, all too late and in vain, God wot, they praised the two-fold counsel of old Pontius: and how they taking the middle way between, were deceived, & had exchanged the certain possession of victory, for an uncertain and doubtful peace:
 and having lost the opportunity both of gratifying the Romans, or doing them harm any more, were now to fight & wage war with them, whom they might either have disabled for being hurtful enemies, or made their fast and assured friends forever. And so without any weakening of their power and forces of either side by battel, their hearts after this Caudine peace were so changed, that Posthumius by his voluntary yielding was more honored among the Romans, than Pontius his bloodless victory among the Samnits: and the Romans made this reckoning, that the possibility of making war was to them almost as undoubted victory: and the Sam-nits believed verily, that the Romans had at once made war again: and got the upper hand.

While these things thus passed, the Satrians revolted to the Samnits: and the Colony at Freg-gellæ, by the sudden and unlooked for arrival of the Samnits (with whom it is certain the Satricans were banded) in the night was surprised and taken. But the mutual fear one of the other, kept them in on both sides that they stirred not out until the morning. Then began the fight, which for a certain time was equal and indifferent: yet for that the Frugellones within fought for their Church and chimney (as they say) and by reason that the multitude, untrained for arms, stood them in godd head in annoying their enemies from off their benches, they held out and found them play a long time. But afterwards, a wily and deceitful policy turned all backwards and was their undoing: for they suffered the voyce of the cryer to be heard through the Town, who proclaimed, That whosoever laid down weapon, should depart alive and safe with bag and baggage. The hope whereof, caused them to slack somewhat of their fight, and therewith they began to cast away their armor in every place. But the resolute fort armed still, brake away through a postern-gate, whose venturousness proved to them more safe, than the inconsiderate fear of the other, which made them credulous and too light of belief. For the Samnits compassed them about with fire, and for all they called upon the Gods for their help, and so their enemies for performance of their promise, yet they burned them most piteously.

The Consuls parted between themselves, their Provinces, P. Papirius took his way to Lucania in N-Apulia where the Roman Horsemen given for hostages at Caudium were kept in ward: but Publius stayed in Samnium to make head against the Caudine legions. Which thing much troubled and distracted the minds of the Samnits: for neither their hearts would serve them to go to Lucania, lest the enemy should come on their backs: nor yet to stay behind, for fear lest in the while, Luceria should be lost. They thought it best therefore, to put all in hazard of a battel, and to try it out with Publius. Whereupon, they bring forth their power into the field: with whom when Publius was minded to joyn in fight, he thought it not amiss first to make some speech unto his men, and so commanded them to assemble unto an audience. But as they came running to the Prætorium, with exceeding great cheerfulness, so by reason of their noise that called hard for battel, no exhortation of the General could be heard: each man his own heart mindful of the former disgrace, served well enough to encourage and animate them. So they march out to battel, putting forward the standard-bearers and post-ensigns. And because they would lose no time, they first charged with lancing their javelins and shooting darts, and after that in drawing their swords, they threw away their javelins, as if they had had a signal given them so to do, and with naked drawn sword, they ran upon their enemies. No cunning was there to be shewed of warlike Captaining nor skill to be shewed either in setting in array the files and ranks, or placing of the reeward for supplies. The soldiers furious anger, with raging violence, marshalled and managed all.

So,

A So, the enemies were not only discomfited and put to the rout, but also because they durst not hinder their flight by retiring to their own camp, they made all the hast they could, disbanded as they were, toward Apulia. Howbeit they were rallied together in one company, and so came to Luceria. The Romans, in the same boiling heat of blood that they pierced through the mids of the enemies battel; entred also into their camp: where was more bloudshed and execution than in the battel, and the greater part of the pillage was in their choler marred and clean lost.

The other army commanded by Papirius the Coss, marched along the Sea coast to Arpi: and all the Country they passed thorow, shewed them friendship and courtesie, more for the outrages and losses sustained by the Samnits, and the hatred they bare them, than for any love to the people

B of Rome, or good received at their hands. And now the Samnits at that time dwelling upon the Hills in Villages, being mountainers and wild people, and as it is commonly seen, of like disposition to the places which they do inhabit, wasted the plain Champian and Sea coasts, despising indeed their more civil life and conversation. Which Country, if it had been true to the Samnits, either the Roman army had not been able to come to Arpi, or else the penury and scarcity of all things between Rome and Arpi, would have consumed them, being cut off from all provision of victuals. For even then, being gone from them, and lying encamped before Luceria, as wel they without in the leaguer & those that were within the City besieged, were nipped and bitten with hunger. The Romans were served all from Arpi, but so slenderly and scantily, that whiles the footmen were occupied in their guards warding, watching, and working uncessantly; the Horsemen, were

C fain to bring corn from Arpi, in little leather baggs: and otherwhiles, if they met the enemy, were forced to cast the corn from off their Horsebacks, to fight more nimble. They that were within besieged, before the other Consul came with his army, had both from the mountains of the Samnits, victuals brought unto them, and succors also of men let in to them. But the coming of Publius made all provisions more streight: for, leaving the charge of the siege to his brother Consul, he rode lightly appointed without carriage, all over the Country, and so beat all the quarters, that they were too hot for the enemies to forage and purvey victuals. Then the Samnits, seeing that they within the City besieged, were past all hope to abide the famine any longer, encamped about Luceria, and were forced to gather all their forces together from all parts, and to give Papirius battel. At which very instant, when they were on both sides preparing to fight, the Tarentin

D Embassadors came between, discharging and forbidding, both Samnits and Romans to fight: professing withal, that whosoever they were that refused to give over war, against them they would fight in defence and favor of the others. Papirius having heard that embassage, making semblance, as if he had greatly regarded their speeches, answered that he would confer with his brother Consul: and having sent for him, and bestowed all the mean time in preparation to fight, when he had talked with him as touching the execution of matters already resolved, he presently gave the signal, and set out the bloody banner of battel. Now as the Consuls were busy in sacrificing and performing duties belonging to God and man (as their manner is when they purpose to go to a battel) the Tarentin Embassadors aforesaid, encountered them and expected an answer. To whom Papirius, The Chick-master (qd. he) O ye Tarentins, sendeth me word, that the birds feed

E right, and all is well; and besides that, the Gods in our sacrifice seem passing well pleased. And in the name of the Gods, and under their conduct (as ye see) we are going to battel. Then commanded he to set forward the standards, and led forth his power, mocking the foolish nation for their great vanity, who, not able to manage their own affairs by reason of home seditions and civill discords, thought it meet to be moderators between others, and to prescribe them war or peace. The Samnits on the other side, having flaked all their care and desire of war, for that they desired peace in good earnest, or else thought it expedient for them to make a semblance thereof, for to win unto them the Tarentins; seeing the Romans all of a sudden arranged in battel array and ready to fight, cryed forth aloud, that they rested still in the authority of the Tarentins, and were at their direction: neither would they come forth into the field, nor put themselves in

Farms out of their fort: choosing rather being thus disappointed, to abide the chance of fortune whatsoever, than to seem to have despised the Tarentins, who had interposed themselves as Mediators for peace. Marry (quoth the Coss.) we take that for a good sign and presage of lucky success: and we would wish no more at Gods hands, but to put into their enemies heads that resolution, not to defend their trench and rampire. So the Coss. when they had parted between them their forces, approached the very camp of their enemies, and set upon them with an hot assault on every side. Thus while some filled and dammed up the trenches, others plucked up the stakes of the rampier, and threw the bank and all down the ditches under their feet: whiles not only their own inbred valour by nature, but also anger and choler provoked and pricked to the quick, their hearts already fretted and cankered at the very root, for the last disgrace received, they

G entred the camp. Every man for his part gave out and said, Here are not the straight gullets of Caudium, here are not the impassable nor inaccessible passes, and Forrests, where as proud fraud had gone beyond their silly error and want of forecass: but Roman vertue and prowess, which no rampier never so strong, no trench how deep soever, is able to put by and withstand. So they killed all afore them indifferently, as well them that made resistance and stood to it, as those that retired and gave way: armed and disarmed, bond and free born, old and young, as well under age as undergrown, man and beast, one with another: neither had there escaped any living creature drawing breath, but that the Consuls sounded the retreat, and with minatory

words commanded the souldiers, so greedy of murder and bloudthirsty, to go forth of the camp. Whereupon when they were highly discontented and in great indignation, for that they were staid and interrupted in this sweetness of easing their anger, and satiating their revenge to the full; it was time to deliver this speech unto them, wherein the souldiers were given to understand, how the Consuls neither were behind any of them in malice and hatred to their enemies, nor would be hereafter: but as they were their chief conductors to the war, so they would be their leaders and shew them the way, to unsatiable appetite of revenge and execution; had not the care and regard of those 600 Horsemen, which were kept as hostages in Luceria, cooled their thirst and staid their stomachs; left haply the enemies in despair to find pardon and mercy, should run upon them in a blind fit of fury and rage, and put them all to the sword; chusing rather to torment and kill them first, before they died themselves. The souldiers greatly commended this course, and rejoiced that thus their choler was allaid, and their fury bridled, confessing, That they were indeed to abide all whatsoever, rather than the life of so many of the forwardest and principal young Gentlemen of Rome, should be betraid, or in danger. This audience being dismissed, they drew together to a Council, whether with all their forces they should assail and press hard upon Luceria, or with one of the armies and chief Leaders, give the attempt to sound the Apulians, a close and secret kind of people thereabout, who ever to that day had stood in doubtful terms with them.

Publius the Consul, who had taken this journey to over-run all Apulia, in that one voyage and expedition, either by force subdued and brought under his obeisance certain States, or upon conditions entred league and society with them. Papirius also, who staid at the siege of Luceria, within a short time sped according to his expectation. For having forelaid and beset all the wayes, by which victual was conveyed thither out of Samnium, the Samnits who lay in garison at Luceria, pinched and tamed with famine, sent Embassadors to the Roman Consul, making offer to release and deliver up into his hands those Horsemen, (the only cause of the present war) in case he would raise and levy the siege. To whom Papirius made this answer, that they should have gone first to Pontius, the son of Herennius, by whose counsel they had put the Romans under the yoke and the gallows, to learn and know of him, what in his opinion they were to abide, who were vanquished and overcome. Howbeit, for asmuch as they had rather, and chose rather to be censured indifferently, and to receive equal conditions of their enemies, than of their own selves, he willed the Embassadors to give them to understand in Luceria, that they should leave their armor, their bag and baggage, their beasts of carriage, and impotent multitude not fit for the wars, within in the wals. And as for the fighting souldiers, he would put them to pass under the gallows in their single shirts, for so revenge the shame first offered them, and not to inflict any new ignominy upon them. Nothing was denied and refused: seven thousand men of war were put under the gallows, a rich and huge pillage raised within Luceria, all their own ensigns and armor regained, which they had lost at Caudium: and that which surmounted all other joyes, they recovered again those Gentlemen of arms, whom, lying for pledges and security of the peace aforesaid, the Samnits had sent to Luceria to be kept in safe custody. There is not lightly to be found a victory more noble, and of greater consequence to the people of Rome than this, in regard of the sudden change of fortune, in case (as some records bear witness) Pontius also himself the son of Herennius, and General of the Samnits, to make satisfaction and quittance for the Consuls disgrace and shame, was put under the yoke, as well as all the rest. But I less marvel, that it is not clear, but left uncertain, that the enemies General was rendred, and went under the gallows: this rather I wonder at, that doubted it is, whether Lucius Cornelius Dictator, with L. Papirius Censor, General of the Horsemen, managed these acts first at Caudium, and then afterwards at Luceria: and being the only revenger of that disgrace of the Romans, triumphed most worthily (I dare be bold to say) of any man before that time, next to Furius Camillus: or whether the chief honour hereof pertain by right to Papirius as Consul. Upon this error followeth another in the neck of it, whether Papirius, surnamed Cursor, for his good service at Luceria, in the next Election, continued in Magistracy, and were made the third time Consul with Q. Amylius Caretanus, the second time: or whether it were L. Papirius Mugillanus, and the error grew upon the surname. But it is agreed upon by all writers, that from this time forward all the reliques of the wars, were performed and finished by Consuls. Amylius in one prosperous battel made a final conquest of the Ferentans, and upon composition had the City delivered up unto him, whither they had retired their forces for succor after their defeat in the field, and hostages were imposed upon them. With like good success fought the other Consul with the Satricans, who being Roman citizens, had revolted to the Samnits, after the loss at Caudium; and had received into their City a garison of theirs. For when as the Roman army approached under the wals of Satricum, and that the citizens within (after Embassadors sent to treat by way of humble petition for peace) had received this hard and heavy answer from the Consul, That unless they would kill the garison of the Samnits, or deliver them into his hands, they should come no more again to him: the Coloniers and inhabitants were more frighted and terrified with that speech, than at all the forcible attempts of their army. Whereupon the Embassadors followed their suit hard and continued still, demanding very often of the Consul how he could believe, that they being but few, feeble, and disarmed, should be able to force a garison so strong and wel appointed, against their wills? being willed to ask counsel of them, by whose means they had received the said garison into the Town, they departed

A parted their wives: and having hardly obtained leave & licence at his hands, to consult with their Senate, and to bring answer, they return home again. Their Senate was divided into two factions, which distracted and held them in suspense that they could not soon resolve. The one, consisting of the chief personages and head men, who had solicited them to revolt from the people of Rome; the other of true hearted and loyal Citizens. Howbeit, both sides strove in the end and endeavored to labour the Consul for reconciliation of peace. The one part thought it sufficient (because the Samnits garrison having not provision enough beforehand to hold out the siege, was to depart the night following) to give notice to the Consul, what hour of the night through what gate the enemies would go forth, and which way they would take: the other, namely, against whose will they were revolted to the Samnits the very same night, opened another gate besides to the Consul, and privily let their enemies armed into the City. So by a twofold complot of treason, they were surpris'd unawares and all their throats cut not only the garrison of the Samnits (by reason that the woods all about the high way were laid for them and beset) but also at one instant there was a shout and alarm raised by the enemies within the City, which was full of them: and thus in the space of one hour both the Samnits were slain, the Sarricans taken, and all they had in the world fell into the hands of the Consul: who after diligent inquisition by torture, Who were the principal authors of this revolt? whomsoever he found guilty, those he scourged and beheaded: and setting there a strong garrison, he took from the Sarricans all their armour. From thence Papirius Cursor departed to Rome for to triumph (as they write, that say, by his leading Lacerna was recovered, and the Samnits put under the yoke.) And without question, a man he was worthy of all commendations of a warrior, surpassing not only in fortitude and courage of spirit, but also in force and natural strength of body, and namely, for his good footmanship: whereupon he got his surname * Cursor. For in running (they say) he had not his peer, but went away with a prick and prize before all other in those daies: and were it by reason of his bodily vigour and strong constitution, or his much exercise, a stout and mighty eater he was, he drank as liberally of his meat, and could carry it as well. Never had foot or horse under any Captain more rough and harder service, for that himself was of so tough metall and steel to the very back (as they say) that he could abide any pains and travell whatsoever. His horsemen upon a time were so bold, as to request him in lieu of their good service in some exploit, to ease them a little of their ordinary toil and labour: yes marry will I (quoth he) and that ye shall not complain that ye have no easement at all, I will ease you of this pains, That when ye alight from your horses, ye shall not need any more to stroke their shoulders, back and buttocks. He was a man besides for severity straight, and of right great command, as well over his allies and confederates as his own Citizens. The Prætor of Preneſte, for very fear chanced once to be somewhat behind, and slack in bringing forward the reereward, into the vangard and front of the battel: as he walked before his pavilion he commanded him to be called unto him: when he was come, he willed the sergeant to bring forth his axe immediately: at which word when the Preneſtin stood amazed and well near dead, Dispatch Lictor (quoth he) stock me up and grub this root that hindreth them that walk this way: and when he saw him astonied and his heart in his heels for fear of death, he let a good round fust upon his head, and so let him go. Doubtless in all that age (than which there was never any more fertile and fruitfull for vertue and valour) there was no one man, upon whom the state of Rome rested and relied more: In so much as men had destined, and in their minds appointed him to have matched and made head with Alexander the great, if after the conquest of Asia, he should have bent his power hither, and waited in Europe.

Albeit it may well appear that I have nothing less sought, ever since I began this work, than to digress and decline more than was needful, from the order and course of mine history, and by extravagant garnishing and mingling my writings with variety of matters, both to seek for the readers pleasant starts and diversities to repose themselves, and for my self some ease and recreation of my spirits: yet the mention of so mighty a King and renowned Captain, maketh me to think upon, and to utter abroad the secret conceits and discourses, which often I have cast and tossed in my mind: and which induce me now to search and examine willingly, what event would have hapned and befall to the Romans, in case they had waged war with Alexander. First and foremost, the things that seem to bear sway and prevail in war, be these (to wit) number of soldiers, valour, and courage withall, wit, sufficiency and dexterity of their chief leaders, and lastly, fortune, which as in all other humane and worldly affairs beareth a great stroke, so in war most of all. Which points, if a man consider either severally by themselves, or jointly altogether, do prover that the Roman Empire and government had stood as well against him as other princes and nations invincible. And first, to begin with comparing of the Captains themselves, I do not deny, but that Alexander was a noble and singular warrior: and this maketh more for his fame and renown, that he was a sole commander of himself, that he was a young man and died in the growth of his prosperous affairs, before he had felt and tasted of adverse fortune. For to let pass other of the glorious Princes and brave captains, (the great mirrors and examples of humane changes and varieties of this world) what was it that exposed Cyrus, whom the Greeks commend and magnifie above all other, as also of late time, Pompey the great, to disfavor & the turning wheel of fortune, but only this, that they lived long? Let me but rehearse and reckon up the Roman captains: and those not all, nor in every age, wherein they flourished: but even them only with whom being either Consuls or Dictator, Alexander should have waited, if had he come: namely, M. Valerius

A digression to a discourse of comparison between Alexander the Great and the Romans.

Corvinus, C. Martins Rutilius, C. Sulpitius, T. Manlius Torquatus, Q. Publius Philo, L. Papirius Cursor, Q. Fabius Maximus: the two Decii, L. Volturnus, M. Curius: Besides other brave men and valiant personages that followed after in case he had fought the Carthaginian were first (for if he had lived he meant to have warred there) and then passed over into Italy, when he had been well steeped in years. In every one of these there were the same good parts, the like towardness of nature, as much forwardness of courage and spirit, as in Alexander, yea, and as good Military discipline, which even from the foundation of the City, passing from hand to hand, grew at length to the form and perfection of an Art, framed & compiled of continual rules and precepts, and confirmed by experiments. For so, after one course the Kings conducted their wars: even so, next unto them the banishers of the Kings, (to wit, the Junii and Valerii) so, consequently the Fabii, the Quintii, and Cornelii: so did Furius Camillus, whom those two Romans in their youth (Manlius Torquatus and Valerius Corvinus) with whom Alexander should have encountered, saw an aged man in the latter end of his daies. And whereas Alexander ventured his own proper person in battel, and performed all Military duties with other soldiers, (which was not the least part of his praise & glory) would Manlius Torquatus have given him one inch of ground, think ye, if he had met with him in skirmish equally matched? or Valerius Corvinus either, both of them brave & stout souldiers before they were leaders and captains? Or would the Decii have given him place, who with devoted bodies to death, came among the thickest of their enemies into present danger? Would Papirius Cursor have given him way, a man of that incomparable strength of body, & invincible courage of heart? And (not to name every one particularly) would that Senat & Council have been overwrought with the stratagems & policies of that one young man? which, whosoever he was that said, it consisted and was composed altogether of Kings, was the only man that conceived & comprehended the true image and Idea of the Roman Senat. May, here was all the doubt (forsooth) left that he knew how to chuse out a convenient plot of ground, to pitch a Camp in, more wisely & cunningly than any one of those before named, to make provision for victual, to foresee & beware of ambushes, to pick out & take a meet time for to fight a battel, to set his battailons in array, and to strengthen the same with sufficient succours & supplies from the roegard. Surely, he would have said himself, that he had not now to deal with Darius, which Monarch carrying with time a train of dainty women, and tender Eunuchs, weakened and made effeminate with wearing purple and gold, with all his rich furniture, for shew and ostentation of his wealthy and superfluous fortune, Alexander without any bloudshed, with doing nought else, but knowing well how to condemn such toies and vanities conquered as a prey and booty rather than an enemy and warrior. He would have thought verily that the situation and nature of Italy far differed from that of India, through which he marched at his ease with his drunken Army, feasting and banqueting all the way; but specially, when he should have beheld the woody forrests and unpassable straights of Apulia, the high hills and mountains of Lucania, and the fresh marks and tokens of the loes that happed in his own name and house, namely, where not long before his Uncle Alexander late King of Epirus miserably perished. Our talk all this while is of Alexander, not drowned yet with the overflow of prosperity; wherein no man had ever less rule of himself than he. Whom if we consider, as he was attired in the habit and attire of his new fortune, and (if I may so say) of a new nature, whereinto after his conquests and victories he was transfigured: surely he would have come into Italy more like a Darius than an Alexander, and brought a bastard army with him, nothing at all resembling but quite forgetting their native country of Macedonie, degenerated already, and growing out of kind, into the manners and fashions of the Persians. It grieveth me, and I am ashamed, in so great a Monarch as he was, to report the proud changing and variety every while of his apparel, his excessive vain-glory and desire of being courted and crouched unto (as he was) in flattering manner, by men lying upon the earth groveling and prostrat at his feet. Such abject baseness should have been hardly endured of Macedonians conquered and subdued; much less than being conquerours as they were. Abashed I am to recount the foul and horrible torments & executions, the murders of his well deserving friends, even in the midst of his cups and dainty viands: last of all, his vanity, his over-weening, and forging to himself a divine race and pedigree from the gods. But what if his drunkenness and unmeasurable love of wine, were every day more than other? what if his fell anger and exceeding heat of choler increased daily? (for I report nothing, but that which all writers agree upon) reckon we not these infirmities for great blemishes, and wondrous hindrances, to the vertues and perfections of a warrior & general commander? But here is all the danger and fear (which some are wont to give out & alledge, even the vainest persons of all other Greeks, who favour & magnifie the glory of the very Parthians in comparison of the Roman name) that the people of Rome had never been able to abide the very majesty and name of Alexander the great. (And I think verily, that even themselves that talk so much of him, never heard the truth, so much as by the brute and fame) and that against whom in Athem, O a City mightily decayed by war with the Macedonians, and even then, when as they might see before their face the ruins of Thebes in manner smoking full in their eyes, the Orators durst freely make publike invectives (which appeareth by the very records of their Orations now extant) against him: I say, not one of so many States and noble personages of Rome durst have opened his mouth and given one word again frankly and boldly. How much soever the grandeur and greatness of this man may be conceived and imagined in the mind, all that shall be but one only man, rising, growing, and come to his height with the felicity of little more than ten years.

Whic

A Which happines of his, they that extol in this respect, that the people of Rome, although in no war they were subdued, yet in many battels had the foile and lost the day: whereas Alexander never fought field but he won the victory: little understand they, that compare the exploits of one person, and him a young man, with the deeds and acts of a State, which had now warred eight hundred years. And can we marvell, it when on the one part there may be reckoned more ages than years on the other, that in so long a time, fortune should vary more, than in the space of thirteen years? But why compare you not man with man, Captain with Captain, and lay their fortunes together? How many Roman Captains and Generals, in this case am I able to name, who never lost field? Ye may turn every leaf and page of the yearly annals of Magistrates, of day-books and journals of those Consuls and Dictators, whose valour and felicity the people of Rome had never cause to repent of and be discontented for, so much as one day. And that which maketh them more wonderful, and to be admired above Alexander or any other King in the world, some of them bare the Dictatorship but ten or twenty daies; and none the Consulship longer than a year. Their levies and musters now and then were letted and impeached by the Tribunes of the Commons. The due and best time for war otherwhiles overlipped them, and yet they went forth. Before their term expired, they were often called home for to be presidents of the Magistrates Election. In the very midst and busiest time of their affairs, the year very often turned about. The inconsiderate rashness one while, and the peevish crookedness another while of a Collegue and companion in government was hindrance and harm both. They succeeded sundry times after the loss and overthrow of their predecessors, and received the army either of raw untrained souldiers, or such as were in ill discipline trained up: whereas Kings and Monarchs contrariwise, not only freed and exempt from all such obstacles and inconveniences, but also Lords and Masters, and of absolute command over their enterprises, over times and seasons fit for execution, give direction to others, draw all after them to their advice and counsel, and are themselves directed and over-ruled by none. Say now, that Alexander were invincible, and dealt with these Captains as invincible as himself, he should likewise have hazarded as great pawns and favours of fortune as any of them; nay rather, he should have adventured and incurred more jeopardy, in that the Macedonians had but Alexander alone, a man not only subject but also exposing himself to many perillous chances: but many Romans there had been equal to Alexander, either for glory or greatness of their worthy deeds: who every one should have lived and died according to the fatal course of his own severall destiny, without the hazard of the whole and main chance. It remaineth now that forces be compared with forces, and armies to armies, either in number, or in quality of souldiers, or multitude of Allies, from whom they had their aids. There were esteemed by computation in the Taxing years, and Surveies taken by the Censors of that age, two hundred and fifty thousand polls Citizens of Rome. And therefore in all the revolts and rebellions of their allies the Latines, they were able to levy and enroll ten legions compleat of Roman Citizens well near and none else. And for many years oftentimes there were four and five armies employed at once, which maintained wars in Tuscan, in Heituria, in Umbria, take also the Gauls with you their enemies, likewise Lucania in Sannium. Besides all these, Alexander should have found all Latium with the Sabins, Volscians, and Equians; all Campania, part of Umbria and Heituria, with the Picentes the Maritians, Pelignians, Vestins, and Apulians, and all the coast adjoyning thereto of the Greeks, along the nether Tyrrhen sea, from the Thuriens to Naples and Cumes, and from thence, the Samnites, as far as to Antium and Hofia. All these he should have met with, either mighty and puissant allies and friends to the Romans, or if they were enemies, vanquished and subdued by their arms. He should have passed the seas himself, having of old Macedonian bands, not above thirty thousand foot, and four thousand horse, and those, most of them Thessalians; for this was all his power. And in case he had joynd thereto the Persians, Indians, and other such nations, he should have drawn along after him, more let and encumbrance, that help and succour by them. Take this over and besides, The Romans had fresh supplies alwaies ready and near at hand, at home in the City: whereas Alexander his army (as afterwards it happed to Annibal warring in a strange country) would have waxed old and decayed. They had for their armour and weapons, a shield or buckler, and a spear in manner of a pike. The Romans had a target of larger capacity to cover the whole body, and a javelin, being a weapon much better and more forcible than the pike, either to strike and push withall near hand, or to be lanced a far off. The souldiers, I confess, both of the one side and the other, stood their ground surely, kept their place and array still within their severall ranks. The Macedonian huge Phalanx moved not, was stedfast and alwaies after one sort: but the Romans battallion more distinct, and consisting of many parts easie both to divide and display, or to joyn and reunit upon any occasion. To speak now of painfull work and travell, what souldier is comparable to the Roman? Who better able to endure all sorts of labour? Alexander by the loss but of one battell had been clean done, and his war at an end forever. But the Romans, whose hearts, neither the shameful disgrace at Candium, nor the wofull defeat at Canna, could amate and dunt: what power would have discouraged? What battell in the world would have broken their backs? Certainly, Alexander although he had prospered and good success in his first beginnings and enterprises, would oftentimes here have missed his Persians and Indians, and desire with all his heart to have had dealing with them again, and other cowardly and dastard Nations of Asia: nay, he would have said, that he had warred before but with women, as Alexander, King of Epirus (by report) gave out, when he was wounded to death, conferring the easie occurrents of war which this young Prince H his nephew, met withall in Asia, with the difficulties of his own, that he found here in Italy. And verily, when I call to mind and remember the conflicts and fights at sea, in the first Punick war, for the space of twenty four years, with the Carthaginians, I suppose the whole age of Alexander would hardly have brought about and finished that one war, and against one of those two States. And peradventure, when both Carthaginians and Romans had been combined, either according to the ancient leagues, or for equall fear of a common enemy, and those two Cities most puissant both for men and munition, had taken arms at once against him, he would have been overwhelmed with the Punick and Roman war together. Moreover, the Romans have made good proof of the Macedonians as enemies, if not when they had Alexander to be their Captain, nor whiles the Empire of Macedonia was at the best, and stood upright unfoiled: yet tried them they have, and made head against them under the conduct of Antiochus, Philip, and Perseus: and it never cost them the loss and overthrow of their own part, no, nor so much as any appearance of danger at all. I would not be thought to speak a proud word, but be it said without arrogancy, and setting all our civill wars aside: never were we distressed, either by horse or foot, never in open field and battell ranged, never on even and plain ground, never in unequal places of disadvantage, were we endangered. The souldier in heavy and compleat harness, I confess, may fear the Cavalry in the plains: may fear shot of arrows, cumbersome forrests and woods, straight gullets, and unpassable wilds, without waies forward or backward: but let there be a thousand armies greater and stronger than the Macedonians or Alexanders, so long as we hold together, and continue still in this love of peace and care of civill concord, wherein we live at this present, we are able, and ever shall be, to discomfit and put them all to flight.

After this, were M. Follius Flaccina, and L. Plautius Venox Consuls. The same year there came from sundry Nations of the Samnits Embassadors, to treat for the renewing of the league, and moved the Senat, most humbly kneeling prostrate upon the ground: but being put off and referred to the people, their prayers availed not to such effect: for as touching a league, they had a flat nay. And after they had for certain daies together importuned them one by one apart, with cap and congee: at length after much suit, they obtained truce for two years. And out of Apulia the Theanenses and Canusins wearied with rodes and spoil made in their Territories, after they had put in hostages to Lucius Plautius the Consul, yielded themselves to his protection. The same year first began Provosts to be created at Capua, to govern under certain laws given unto them by L. Furius the Pretor: after that themselves had made suit for the one and the other, as a remedy for their state, greatly decayed through civill discord. And at Rome were two more Tribes added to the rest, Ufentina, and Falerina. When Apulia began once to shrink and go backward, the Theatins, being also Apulians, presented themselves unto the new Consuls, C. Junius Bubulcus, and Q. Emylius Barbula, and sued to enter into a league with the Romans. And since they were the men that led the way first, and by their example and perswasion induced all Apulia to be in peace with the Romans, and had confidently undertaken, as sureties and pledges to bring it to pass, they obtained their request. Yet was not the league indifferent and formal, with equal conditions, but so, as they should be in subjection to the people of Rome. After that Apulia was conquered (for Junius had won also Tarentum, a strong town and a rich) they marched forward against the Lucans. Then upon the sudden coming of Emylius the other Consul, Nerulum was by force taken. And after that it was noised abroad amongst the allies of the people of Rome, that the state and weal publike of Capua were established by Roman discipline and government: the Arriats also, who made moan and complained, that they lived without positive set laws and Magistrates, obtained of the Senate certain Advocats and Commissioners, to ordain Statutes likewise for that Colony. So, that not only the Roman arms, but also their law and jurisdiction extended far and near, and was of great request. C. Junius Bubulcus, and Q. Emylius Barbula Consuls, in the end of the year, delivered their Legions not to the Coss. by them created, Sp. Nautius, and M. Popilius, but consigned them to L. Emylius the Dictator. Who with his General of horse, L. Pulvius, began to lay siege to Satricula, whereby he gave the Samnits occasion to rebell. Which brought upon the Romans a double fear two waies. For of the one side the Samnits having assembled a mighty army, to deliver their allies from the siege, pitched their Camp not far from the Romans leaguer: on the other side, the Satricans set open their gates suddenly, and with a great tumult brake into the wards and corps de guard of their enemies. And so both parts, relying rather upon hope of succour and help elsewhere, than trusting upon their own strength, within a while began to charge the Romans in full battell, with banner displayed, and distressed them. And although the Dictator was assailed both waies, yet was he sure and safe on either side, because he had got a plot of ground, not easie to be compassed, and made head both against the one and the other, advancing his ensigns accordingly. Howbeit, he charged more hotly upon them that sallied forth, and without much ado beat them again within the wals. Then turned he the whole battell upon the Samnits. Where there was hard hold, and more to do. The victory, though long first, was neither doubtful nor variable. The Samnits being chased and driven into their Camp, having in the night put out all their fires, dislodged and departed privily away: and being past all hope of defending Satricula, they besieged Plisilia, a town confederate to the Romans, to requite their enemy with the like displeasure. The revolution of the year being gone about, the war continued under the conduct of Q. Fabius

A Q. Fabius Dictator: and the new Consuls, like as the former remained still at Rome. And Fabius came before Satricula to receive the Army of Æmylius, bringing with him a new supply to make up the broken bands: for the Samnites made no stay at Plisfia, but having levied and sent for fresh souldiers from home, presuming upon their great numbers, encamped in the very place where they lay afore: where by braying the Romans, and challenging them with many skirmishes, they would have forced them to raise the siege. But the Dictator so much more earnestly bent his forces against the wals of the enemies, thinking it the best piece of service to assail the Town, as being of such importance to the rest of the war, which depended thereon: and was more carele is therefore of the Samnites, and only opposed against them certain guards both day and night, along the trench and rampire, to keep them from making any assault upon the Camp. But the Samnites on the other side, so much the more fiercely skirmished on horseback about the fortifications, and never gave them rest. Insomuch, as when the enemy now was at the point to enter the gates of the Camp, the General of the Horse, Q. Æmylius Carcanus, without advice and direction of the Dictator riding forth in a great noise with all his Corners of Horse, repelled the enemy. But even in that light manner of skirmish, and no set battell of any long continuance, Fortune so plaid her part, and shewed what she could do, that on either side there heell a notable loss, with the glorious death of both the Captains. For the General of the Samnites first taking it to heart, to see Æmylius so fiercely ride and give the charge, and himself to be disarraied and driven out of his place, with much intreating and exhorting his horsemen, renewed the fight. Against whom, as he advanced himself bravely to be seen amongst his men and fought most valiantly, the Roman General of the horse, with spear in rest, so galloped his horse, that with one push he unhorsed him and left him for dead: and yet for all this was not the whole troop besides (as commonly it is seen) at the fall of their Captain so much amazed, as provoked rather to fight. For they that were about him charged Æmylius hard as he rashly rode without heed, and engaged himself too far within the thickest of the squadrons of his enemies, and lanced their javelins at him: but they gave the special honour to the brother of the Samnites Captain to be revenged for his death. He, full of anger and sorrow, plucked Æmylius from his horse, and slew him in the place, even in the midst of his victory: and for that he fell among the troops of his enemies, he had like to have left his dead corps among the Samnites. But presently the Romans alighted on foot, and the Samnites were forced to do the same: and thus being arranged suddenly in great haste into battallions, there began a cruell fight on foot about the bodies of the Captains. Wherein the Romans went clear away with the better, and having recovered the corps of Æmylius, in great joy, intermingled with sorrow, they returned winners into their Camp. The Samnites thus having lost their Captain, and tried their strength what they could do in fight on horse-back, left Satricula, which they supposed could not possibly be defended, and so returned again to the siege of Plisfia. After few daies, Satricula was surrendred by composition to the Romans, and the Samnites by assault won Plisfia. Then changed they the seat town of the war. For out of Samnium and Apulia, the Legions were removed to Sora. This Sora was revolted to the Samnites, and had slain all the inhabitants therein that were Romans. Against which place, when the Romans were come first by great journeyes to revenge the loss of their Countrymen, and to recover the Colony, their espials and scouts whom they had sent out dispersed along the high waies, brought word, that the Legions of the Samnites solowed, yea, and one after another gave advertisement, that they were not far off. Hereupon they went forth to meet with the enemy, and near to a place called Lanula, there was fought a doubtful and dangerous battell: for no slaughter it was, nor flight of either part, but the very night that parted them, and they knew not whether they had the better or the worse. In some Chronicles I find, that the Romans lost the day, and that there died in this battell Q. Æmylius General of the horse. C. Fabius chosen in the room of Æmylius, came with a new and fresh army from Rome, and having dispatched messengers before to the Dictator to know his advice, where he should stay and rest, and what time, and which on side he should set upon the enemy: after he was well informed and instructed in all points what to do, he put himself close in ambush. The Dictator himself, who had for certain daies after the last skirmish, kept his souldiers within trench, more like one besieged, than besieging: all on a sudden, put forth the signal and token of battell: and thinking nothing more effectual to animate and kindle the courages of hardy men, than to know of no other help or hope, nor to trust upon any man but in themselves, he concealed from his souldiers the coming of the General of Horse and his fresh forces: and as if there had been no other way but one, even to break forth and jally with violence: "We being" (quoth he) my souldiers, pent here and taken tardy in these straights have no other issue but "that which by victory we shall make open. Our hold wherein we lie is fortified sure enough but "the same for scarcity of all things noisome, irksome, and hurtfull to us: for all parts hereabout "are revolted from whence we should have convoy of victuals: and were it that the people were "disposed to help us, yet the advenues & passages are hard, and the place of our abode incommo- "dious. Therefore will not I deceive and abuse you any longer, by leaving here your tents into "which ye may after (ye have missed the entire victory) betake your selves for safety, as ye did the "other day: for our fortifications and holds, ought to be defended by force of arms: and not "our arms by fenced forts. Let them have their Camp well fortified, to issue forth and to retire "thither again at their pleasure, who have a purpose to make a long war of it. But let "us cut off all regard of other matters, but only of a present and final victory. Advance then your ensigns directly against the enemy: and so soon as our Army is once without the trench and rampiers, let them let the tents a fire, that have the charge so to do: you shall make up your losses again, my souldiers, with the spoil of all the nations hereabouts, that have revolted. At this speech of the Dictator, which shewed no other semblance but of extream necessity, the souldiers took heart and were hot set to march straight to the enemy. And the very sight of their tents burning behind them (albeit those only which stood next were set on fire, for so the Dictator had given commandment) was no small provocation and prick unto them. And therefore they gave a charge like mad men, and at the fift push and brunt they brake the array of the enemies: and withall, in good time, the General of the horse, when he saw a far off the tents on fire (for that was the signal agreed between them) came hastily upon the back of the enemies and assailed them. So the Samnites being environed round about, made every man what shift he could to get forth and escape, and so fled. But the main multitude that were shuffled together all on a round heap, for fear, being an hinderance one to another in the press, was slain in the midst and cut in pieces, the enemies camp won, and ransacked: with the pillage whereof the souldiers were laden, and the Dictator brought them back unto their own Camp: who were not so joyous for the victory, as for that they found (besides a little part thereof disfigured by fire) all the rest safe and sound, beyond their expectation.

From thence they returned to Sora, where the new Consuls M. Petilius and Caius Sulpicius took the Army at the hands of Fabius the Dictator: who discharged many of the old souldiers, and brought certain new cohorts for supply in their stead. But when by reason of the difficult and unaccessable fight of the Town, they knew not well which way, and by what means to make assault, and seeing that the winning of it would either ask long time, or be exposed to manifold and present dangers: a certain runaway-Traitor of Sora who was closely stoln out of the Town, got to the Roman Sentinels, and required forthwith to be brought to the Consuls: who being presented before them, promised to betray the Town: and being questioned withall, how and by what means he would perform that which he undertook, seemed unto them to alledge some reasons to good purpose, and prevailed so far with them, that he caused the Roman Camp, which lay in a manner close under the wals, to be removed six miles off the Town, saying, that thereby, the wards by day, and the watch by night would be neglected, and less careful and diligent to keep the City. Himself the night following, after he had willed certain cohorts of footmen to lye in ambush within the woods near the Town, took with him ten elect and chosen souldiers: and through steep places, and such as were not well passable, conducted them into the Castle, having brought thither more shot and darts to throw than to serve so small a number of men: besides, there was good store of stones at hand, which lay there, either scattering by chance (as commonly in such craggy and rocky ground) or else heaped together by the townsmen of purpose, for the better defence of the place. Where, after he had bestowed the Romans, and shewed them a narrow and steep path-way out of the town into the Castle, From getting up here (quoth he) there needs no more but three men only well armed to keep back the greatest multitude that is: ye are in number ten, and more than that, Romans: and of Romans the most hardy and valiant: the place will stand you, I know, the darkness of the night will be for your purpose, the night, I say, which by reason of uncertainties, maketh all things seem much more than they are to men affrighted and amazed already. I will for my part set all in a hurly burly, look you in the mean time that you duly keep the fortress. This said, he runs down with as great a noise and shouting as he could, crying, Alarm, help, help Citizens, the Castle is taken by the enemy. come away to defence. These words he resounded ever as he rapped at the gates of the principal Citizens and Noblemen: these words he redoubled aloud to all that he met, and to as many as ran forth affrighted into the streets. This fearful alarm received from one man, was set abroad by many more all over the City. The Magistrates quaking for fear, sent certain to the Castle in espial to discover the truth: and advertised by them that the Castle was surprized indeed by armed men, and full of armor (for they made the number, and every thing else, more than it was) were clean put out of all hope to recover their Fortress. So every where they fell to running away: the gates were broken open by them that were not well awake, and those most part unarmed. At one of the gates, those companies of the Romans aforesaid, who lay in ambush, and were raised with the noise and clamour, brake in, and killed all that in this fright ran headlong in their way. Thus was Sora won against the Consuls should come in the morning betimes by break of day: and look whose fortune it was to scape out of the massacre made in the night, and to flie away those they took to mercy upon submission: whereof two hundred twenty five, even those who by the general voice of all were pointed at, and reputed above the rest the principal actors in that horrid massacre aforesaid, of the Roman Coloners, inhabitants, and the authors of their revolt they had away with them to Rome, bound hand and foot. The other multitude they left at Sora safe and unhurt, and planted there a garrison. All they that were brought to Rome were in the market-place scourged with rods, and beheaded, with the exceeding joy and contentment of all the Commons, whom it concerned most, that the multitude which should be sent into sundry Colonies might in every place live in safety and security of their lives.

Sora surprized
by treason.

The Consuls being departed from Sora, marched forward to make war upon the Lands and Territories

A Territories of the Aufonians: for the coming of the Samnites after the battle of Lanuvium; they were all out, full of insurrections and commotions; and many conspiracies there were in all places about Campania: neither was Capua it self without blame and faultless. Nay, this matter passed as far as to Rome, where information was made against some of the Nobles, and warning given to enquire into them. But the whole nation of the Aufonians, by reason that the Cities were betrayed, like as Sora, was reduced under obedience to the people of Rome. Aufonia, Minerva, and Vesfina were the Cities, out of which twelve of the chief young Gentlemen having conspired and sworn together to betray their own Cities, presented themselves unto the Consuls, giving them to understand, "That their countrymen wished long ago for the coming of the Samnites, and for A conspiracy of the Aufonians.

B "soon as they heard of the battle before Lanuvium, made account that the Romans were utterly vanquished, and helped the Samnites both with men and munition. But now, say they, that the Samnites were chased from thence, they lived unresolute in doubtful terms of peace, and shut not their gates in dread upon the Romans, for fear of bringing war upon themselves, yet obstinately bent to shut them if their Army approached toward them. In this wavering and doubtful floating of their minds, they might at unawares be suddenly surprised. By this persuasion of theirs, they encamped nearer, and at one and the self-same time were souldiers sent about those three towns before named, some in armor closely to lie in ambush in convenient places near the walls: others in side gowns with swords under them, who a little before day, so soon as the gates were set open, should enter into those Cities. By whom the matter was so handled, that at one instant they began to kill the wardens at the gates, and gave a signal to those armed souldiers who lay in ambush, for to rise at once and come to succour. Thus were the gates seized and possessed, and three towns in one hour by the same stratagem surprized. But because this exploit was performed in the absence of the Captains, there was no stay in execution and slaughter, but beyond all measure, and without all mercy, no sex nor age was spared: and so the whole nation of the Aufones, before they were detected for certain of revolt, was destroyed and extinguished, as if they had warred mortally, and been at deadly feud.

C The same year Luceria came into the hands of the Samnites, by reason that the City had betrayed and delivered the Roman garrison to them; but the traitors went not long unpunished for it. The Roman Army chanced to be not far from thence, and at the first assault, the City standing as it did on a plain, was won. The Lucerins and Samnites both were put to the sword every one: and so far forth proceeded their furious rage, that when the Senat sate in council at Rome, about sending men to inhabit Luceria, many were of mind, that the City it self should be rased to the ground and destroyed: for besides the cursed and execrable hatred they bare against them being twice conquered and revolted: the distance also of the place so remote, caused them to dislike greatly, and abhor the confining, as it were, of their Citizens, so far from home, to live amongst such a kind of people so cruel and dangerous. Howbeit, their opinion took place and prevailed: who gave advice, that Coloners and inhabitants should thither be sent, and to the number of 2500 were there planted.

D The same year when as the Romans found all unloyal unto them, and nothing but falsehood on all sides; at Capua also certain secret conspiracies of the Nobles and best of the City were detected and revealed. Touching which, the Senat's advice was asked, and the matter not neglected by them, but Commissions were appointed: and thought good it was that a Dictator should be nominated for to sit upon the same commissions and inquisitions. And C. Manius was created, who named M. Felli General of the Horse. Great was the terror of that Magistrate, and thereupon either for fear, or guiltiness of conscience, the two Calavii, Ovinus and Novius, who were the chief of that complot, before information was given against them by name to the Dictator, died: & questionable by their own hands shortened their daies, and so avoided the trial of justice and punishment accordingly. After that, when the Inquisition wanted subject matter once about the Capuans, the Inquisitors (by interpretation of words in the Commission) proceeded to Rome, saying, F that the Senat had good warrant to make enquiry and straight search, not by name and precisely, who at Capua only; but generally, who in any place whatsoever had used conventicles, and conspired against the Common-wealth: and all secret meetings, say they, and packings together, for to get Dignities and Offices, were directly against the State and Common-wealth: so that the Commission extended larger both for person and real action. Yea, and the Dictator himself nothing gainsaid, but that the vertue of his Commission was directed without limitation. Hereupon were certain Gentlemen of the Nobility brought into question: and notwithstanding they called upon the Tribunes for to assist them, with interposing their negative, yet there was not one of them would succour and relieve them, the presentment was taken against them, and they indicted. Then the Nobility, I mean not them alone who were in trouble, but generally the whole Gentry of the City, at once, pleaded, That they were not the natural and true Noblemen indeed, who were to be touched and charged with this crime: who if it were not for sinister and indirect courses, had easie and open success unto all honourable places and promotions; but certain new upstarts and Gentlemen of the first head: saying, That it was the very case of the Dictator himself, and his General of Horse, who were rather parties guilty, and offenders themselves, than sufficient Inquisitors, and competent Judges: and that should they well know and understand, when they were once out of their place and office. This made Manius to bestir himself, who mindful rather of his good name and reputation, than respective of his high place and absolute absolute government, went up into the common place of audience before all the people, and spake H to this effect: "My Masters and friends all, Citizens of Rome, well assured I am, that privy ye are to the whole carriage and course of my former life: and besides that, even this very honour and dignity which you have bestowed upon me, is able to testify and approve mine innocencie.

For, to sit upon these inquisitions, there was not to be chosen now for Dictator (as oftentimes heretofore, according to the dangerous occasions and necessity of the time) a man reputed the best and most noblest warrior of all other; but such a one, as throughout his whole life hath most of all misliked and condemned ambitious conventicles. Howbeit, forasmuch as certain persons of noble linage, (for what cause, it is more meet for you to deem and judge, than for me being a Magistrate, to speak without book, as they say, and upon no preground) first have endeavoured with all their might and main to overthrow the process of the inquisition it self; and afterwards, seeing they were not able themselves to bring that about (notwithstanding they were Parentis) have fled to the holds of their very adversaries, even the protection of the Tribunes and their negative, rather than to justify themselves and stand to the trial of their cause: and at last having there also a repulse (thinking all means safer than to approve their innocencie) have fallen upon us, and bashed not (privat men as they are) to accuse and touch the person of him that is Dictator: to the end therefore, that both God and man and all the world may know, that as they have assied to compass that which they are not able to bring to pass, namely, to avoid the rendering an account of their life and demeanor: so, I am ready (to set forward their accusations) to offer my self unto mine adversaries, and giving them means to call me to mine answer, here I resign up my Dictatorship. And I beseech you O Consuls, if so be this charge be laid on you by the Senat, to proceed in examination against me first, and this Gentleman the General of Horse M. Felli: that it may appear, how we, through our own innocency alone, and not by the countenance and privilege of our dignity and high calling, are protected and safe from these slanders and intended crimes. Herewith he gave over his place of Dictator: and after him incontinently, M. Felli yielded up his room likewise of General over the Horse. These persons were the first, who being charged and put to their trial judicially before the Consuls, (for to them by order from the Senat, was the commission directed) notwithstanding all the depositions and testimonies of the Parentis, were in every point found unguilty, and acquit. P. Philo also, albeit he had so many times attained to the supremie dignities of state, after he had achieved so many worthy deeds, as well in peace as war, yet a man maliced or envied rather of the Nobility, was put to plead for himself, and finally absolved. But this inquiry into such men of name and quality, lasted no longer in force, (as it is usually seen) than whiles it was fresh, and in the first heat thereof.
From them it began to fall to persons of less reckoning and baser account, untill such time, as by the same conventicles and factions, against which it was devised, it fell to the ground, and was trodden underfoot.

The fruit of these things, and more than that, the hope of the Campains revolt, whereto certain had conspired and sworn (as ye have heard) recalled the Samnits back again to Caudium, who were turned and bent wholly into Apulia: that from thence, being so near at hand unto Capua, they might (it haply any insurrection and trouble presented the overture and opportunity) seize upon it and take it perforce from the Romans. Thither came the Consuls with a strong and mighty army: and at the first they staied and lingred about the passes and straights, having on the one side and the other an ill way of passage unto the enemies. Afterwards the Samnits fetching a short compass about, came down with their army through the open places into the plains, I mean, the champain country and fields about Capua. And that was the first time that the enemies had a sight one of the others Camp. Whereupon by light skirmishes, on horseback oftner than on foot, they tried masteries on either side: neither were the Romans one jot discontented with the issue and event thereof, nor repented of the delay whereby they drew the war a-length. Contrariwise, the Samnit Captains perceived their forces to wear daily by small losses, and their courage to cool and decay evidently by that lingring war. Whereupon, they came abroad into the field: and divided their Cavalry into wings: with a special charge, to have a more careful eye backward toward their camp (for fear of any impression and assault that way) than to the main battel: which would be guarded safe enough by the Infantry. The Cos, marshalled themselves in this manner Sulpitius led the right point of the battel, and Petilius the left: the right side (whereas the Samnits also were arranged in thinner ranks and files, of purpose to compass and environ the enemies, or not to be compassed and enclosed themselves) shewed it self more abroad and open. They on the left hand, besides that they stood thicker and more close, were by occasion of a sudden policy of Petilius the Cos, farther strengthened. For those cohorts and bands which were reserved apart in the rereward, for help at any need, and kept fresh against all occurrents and hazards of long fight, he advanced presently to the forefront in the vanguard, and with all his forces at once charged the enemy at the first encounter, & forced him to retreat. When the footmen of the Samnits were thereby troubled and disarraied, the horsemen followed close and entred into the skirmish. But as they rode cross and overthwart between the two hosts, the Roman horsemen pricked and galloped their horses to flank them, and disordered and troubled the ensignes, cornets, squadrons and troops of foot and horse, pell-mell together, untill he had caused the whole battel of that side, to turn their backs. In this left point not Petilius alone, but Sulpitius also joyned with him, and was present in person to exhort and encourage the souldiers: for he had transported and distracted

A distracted himself from his own men, who as yet were not come to joyn battel at the cry & shout that arose from the left side: and seeing on that part undoubted victory, he went towards his own charge, accompanied with 1200 men: Where he found a change of fortune, namely, the Romans to have retreated and lost ground, and the enemy as victor, advancing forward his ensigns upon them sore dismayed and daunted. Howbeit, the Consul his coming made a present alteration: for both at the sight of their Captain were the souldiers hearts refreshed and comforted; and for to aid them, there came a greater supply indeed, than in shew of number, of tall and lusty men. So when they heard first, and saw soon after, the victory got of the other part, they renewed the fight. After this on all sides the Romans had the better hand, and the Samnits giving over fight, B were either slain or taken prisoners: saving only those, who fled to Maleventum a town now named Beneventum. It is left in record, that there were upon 30000 Samnits, either left killed in the place, or brought away captive.

The Consuls having obtained this notable victory, forthwith from thence lead their Legions to lay siege unto Bovianum: and there wintered before the Town, untill such time as C. Petilius (chosen Dictator together with M. Fellus his General of the Horse, by the new Consuls L. Papyrius Cursus for the fifth time, and C. Jun. Bubulcus the second time) received the Army at their hands. Who hearing, that the Castle of Fregella was by the Samnits taken, left Bovianum, and went forward to Fregella; which he recovered again without drawing his sword: for that the enemies had quit the place, and were fled by night: and when he had placed a strong garrison there he returned from thence into Campania, of special purpose to regain Nola by force of arms. Thither were retired within the wals, a little before the Dictator his coming, both all the whole multitude of the Samnits, and the rustical peasants about Nola. The Dictator having viewed the situation of the Town, to the end he might have the more open access to the wals, set all the houses on fire that were in the suburbs along the counterscarpe (and there they stood thick and were well inhabited.) And not long after, whether it were by Petilius Dictator (I know not) or C. Junius Consul (for it is reported as well of the one as the other) Nola was forced and won. They that would draw unto the Consul the honour of winning Nola, add moreover and say; That he won also Atina and Calatia: and that Petilius upon a pestilence that began, was made Dictator, for the setting or fastning of a spike or great nail. Two Colonies that year were conducted to Suessa and Pontia, Suessa belonged to the Aurunci. The Volscians inhabited the Island Pontia situate over against their own shore within a kenning. And a decree passed from the Senat, that to Cassinus also, a third Colony there should be sent inhabitants. M. Valerius and P. Decius, the Consuls that next succeeded, ordained three Triumvirs for that purpose, and sent four thousand to people those places.

The war with the Samnits was in a manner now dispatched and brought to an end: but before that the Nobles and Senators of Rome had left the care thereof, a brute was blown of the Tuscans war. And there was in those daies another nation (setting the Gauls tumults aside) whose forces and hostility they more feared; for that their country was so near a neighbour and so populous withall. Therefore, while one of the Consuls was occupied in dispatching the reliques of the war in Samnium, P. Decius who staid at Rome grievously sick, by authority of the Senat, named Dictator C. Junius Bubulcus. He according as the important affairs required, caused all the younger sort to take the military oath, and prest them for souldiers. Armor, and whatsoever requisite besides, with great diligence he prepared. And albeit he were thus furnished and well appointed yet was he nothing bold and forward to begin war, willing (no doubt) to be quiet and stand upon his guard, unless the Tuscans shewed themselves first in arms. The same purpose had the Tuscans also, both in preparing for war, and in making stay to begin war. So, of neither side they departed out of their own limits.

In that year was there a famous Censorship of App. Claudius, and C. Plautius. But the name of Appius became more memorable of the twain, and of happier renown unto posterity, for that F he paved with stone the causey or Port-way (bearing his name) and conveyed a channel of water into the City of Rome. Which works he finished alone, for that his Colleague for shame of an infamous and odious choice of certain Senators which he made, gave over the office. But Appius having the stout stomach, engraffed in his name and house from the beginning, bare the Censorship alone. By the motion and means of the same Appius, the Porcii, to whose family properly belonged the Priestly service, at the altar of Hercules called Maxima, had taught certain public servants (for that the function might be committed over to them as delegats) the solemn rites and ceremonies of that sacred ministry. Hereupon is reported a wonder to be spoken, and that which might strike a scruple of conscience, and make men afraid ever after, to alter any thing in religion from the former state and first institution. For whereas at the same time there were twelve houses of the Porcii, and in them about thirty that were above fourteen years of age; within one year it is said, that they died all, with their whole issue and off-spring. Moreover, that not only the name of the Porcii became thus extinct, but that Appius also the Censor, within certain years (such was the ire of the gods, mindfull of revenge) fell stark blind. Therefore the Consuls that followed in the next year, C. Junius Bubulcus the third time, and Q. Emilius Barbula the second time, in the very entrance of their office framed a complaint unto the people: That by the leud and corrupt Election of some new Senators, that honourable state and order was deformed, and namely, how some were over-slips, who were of more worth than those that were taken in: And saying plainly, That

That they would not observe and have in any regard such a choice, which without respect of good and bad was made for favour and affection to some, and at the pleasure of the Censors: and immediately they cited the Senat by name in that order and form, as had been used before the Censors, App. Claudius and C. Plautius.

* A Legion consisted now of 4000 footmen; howsoever at other times, of 3000, 5000, yea, and 6000, and the Colonels fewer or more in a legion, according to the quantity thereof. There belonged besides to every legion ordinarily 300 horse. With whom the Tribunes or Colonels aforesaid had nothing to do, being Captains of robbers for a peece.

And in that year were two places of charge and command, first given by the people, both pertaining to warfare: the one, that sixteen Colonels for four * Legions, should from that time forward by the people be created, which before were in a manner the gifts and favours conferred by the Dictators and Consuls: and few or none of the people had any hand or voice therein. This Act and Ordinance was propounded by L. Petilius and C. Martius, Tribunes of the Commons. The other was, That the same people should have the appointment and ordaining of two Duumvirs at sea, for the rigging, repairing, and trimming of the Navy. The maker of this Act was M. Decius, another Tribune of the Commons.

I would let pass one thing that hapned this year, as of small weight and importance, and not worth the speaking, but that it seemed a matter pertinent to religion. The minstrels that plaid upon the flute and hautboies, for that they were prohibited and debarred by the last Censors, to have their good chear any more in the Temple of Jupiter, according to an old custome and tradition, took snuff thereat, and in a pelting chafe all in one company went their waies to Tybur: so as there was not one of them in the City left to sing and pipe before the pomp of sacrifices, and on their feastival daies. The Senat made some conscience hereof, and were troubled in their mind. Whereupon they dispatched certain messengers to Tybur, to travel with the townsmen, and endeavour all they could, that these good fellows might be restored and sent home again to the Romans. The Tyburtins undertook the matter, and promised right courteously to do their best: and first they sent for these musicians into their Town-Hall, and perswaded with them to return again to Rome: but when they could not be brought to that, for any thing they could do, then they wrought another policy and feat with them, that sorted and fitted well the humour of such kind of people, and of their coat. Upon a festival holyday, under a colour of making merry with minstrelsie and musick about them, some invited one, and some another, to give them a fit of mirth accordingly. But they plied them so with wine (which all the sort of this profession love but too well) that they drank untill they winked, and winked so long, till they fell fast asleep. And being found asleep, the Tyburtins brought them gently to their beds in certain waggons, and thus bestowed, conveyed them to Rome. Neither perceived they ought, senseless drunken sorts they, before that their wagons were left in the market place of Rome. Nay, before they had slept out and concocted their wine that steamed up into their heads, and clouded there, the day-light came upon them, and then they awoke. The people came running together from all parts to them, and after they had either got at their hands, or charged them to stay, and make no more such frolics, it was granted unto them, that three daies every year, being disguised and dressed in a mask for the purpose, they might range and walk about the City, with singing, and sounding their instruments, after this licentious manner and jollity, which now adaies is yearly used, and their privilege of eating in the temple was restored to them again, namely, to such as sung and plaid in time of their divine service and sacrifices: and all was well. This ridiculous pageant hapned amidst the care and preparation of two great and dangerous wars.

The Consuls parted their Provinces between them: To Junius fell by lot the Samnits, to Emilius the new war in Hetruria. In Samnium, Cluvia, a fortress and hold of the Romans being impregnable by an assault, was a long time besieged; and forced by extreame famine, was delivered up to the Samnits. After they were once Masters of the fort, they took the garrison souldiers, and notwithstanding they yielded themselves, yet they whipped and tare their flesh most beastly, and in the end, without all mercy killed them. Junius exceeding wroth at this cruelty, thinking nothing more needful to be done first, than the winning again of Cluvia; laid all other matters aside, and the same day that he assailed the wals, took it by force, and slew all he could find above fourteen years of age. In this train of victory the Army was brought against Bovianum. This was the chief place of the Pentrians in Samnium, the wealthiest City, the best provided, and most furnished of all other with men and munition. The souldiers very eager and sharp set for hope of a rich pillage, won the Town. But for that they were nothing so angry and hot of revenge as before, they dealt not so cruelly with the enemies: but they got together and carried away more spoil and sackage from thence than they ever had well near out of all Samnium; and as liberally was it bestowed every whit upon the souldiers. And forasmuch as no pitched battel in plain field, no Camp so well fortified, no Cities and Forts, howsoever fenced, were able to withstand the puissant Romans in force of open arms: all the Princes in Samnium studied and applied their wits to find means of sleight and subtile policy; it haply, as they wasted and foraged the Territories after a loose and licentious manner, the Army disbanded once, might be entrapped and enclosed within some ambush. It fell out so, that certain fugitive peasants of the Country, and Captives, some by chance, and other of purpose, coming in their way, made relation of tidings to the Consuls, well agreeing all in one tale, and the same sounding of a truth indeed, namely, that a great sort of sheep and other cattel were driven together into a by-forrest out of the way: and so induced them to lead thither the Legions lightly armed, and to fit their hands with a fat booty. Now the Samnits had privily forelaid all the high waies with a mighty army, and after that they saw the Romans to have entred & engaged themselves within the chale or forrest aforesaid, all of a sudden

A sudden they rose up and with a great cry and shout ran upon them to charge them when they least thought of any such thing. At the first this so strange and unexpected occurrence made them afraid, while they took them to their weapons, and laid their fardels and baggage together on a heap in the midst. But after that every man was eased of his load, and had put on his armor, they rallied on all sides to their ensigns; and without the commandment or direction of any man, they of themselves put the battel in array, each one knowing his rank and place according to the accustomed order of the ancient Military discipline. The Consul perceiving that he was brought to a most doubtful and dangerous battel, alight from his horse; and protested before Jupiter and Mars, and the other gods whom he called all to witness: "That he came not into that place to get glory to himself by any enterprise, but only a booty for his souldiers: and that no fault else could be imputed unto him, but an overmuch desire and affection of his, to enrich his souldiers by the spoil of the enemy. From which blame and shame both, nothing could free and acquit him else, but the manhood and prowess of his souldiers: exhorting them with one accord but to stay themselves and endeavour all together to set upon their enemy, defeated and vanquished in battel, driven out of Camp and field, bereaved of his Towns and strong holds, and come now to attempt his last and utmost hope, of privy and theevish trains of forlaging, trusting upon the vantage of the ground, and not pure force of arms. But what place is there now unaccessible or unpregnable to the valiant Romans? Herewithall he named the Castle of Fregella and Soria, and what place of disadvantage and hard access soever, they had won by force. With these words the souldiers encouraged and enflamed, forgetting all difficulties and dangers, marched apace and advanced forward up to the army of the enemies that now approached them, and were over their heads. Where the Romans found some difficulty all the while they climbed up the cliff or ridge of the hill against them. But after that the foremost ensigns were mounted up and had gained the plain in the top, and perceived they were embattelled upon an even and equal ground, presently the terror turned upon those that lay in wait for them, & being disbanded, scattered, and driven to fling away their weapons, they fled and tridged as fast as they could to recover again those starting and lurking holes, wherein before they had hid themselves. But even those difficult places which they had sought of purpose for their enemy, and their own deceit and guile, encumbered themselves. For very few of them could find the way out, and escape by flight, in so much as to the number of 20000 were slain. And then the Romans after this victory ran up and down at their pleasure to that booty of sheep and cattel, which was first presented unto them by the enemy, as a bait to catch them with.

Junius the Consul to his souldiers.

While these things thus went in Savinium, all the people of Herruria by this time, but only the Arretins, were up in arms, and entred into a right great war; beginning first with the siege and assault of Sutrium: which City being allied to the Romans, was (as a man would say) the very Barriers of all Herruria. Thither came the other Consul Emilius with an army, to rescue and deliver their allies, and to raise the siege. Against the Romans coming, the Sutrians courteously brought victuals for the Camp, lying before the City. The Tuscans spent the first day in consulting whether they should make a short war of it, by hot assaults, or temporise and protract the time by lingering siege. The morrow after, when as the Captains liked rather of expedition and hasty courses, than of more sage and safe proceedings, at the sun rising they set out a flag of defiance and the signal of battel, and armed they go forth of their Camp into the open field to fight. Which after it was told the Consul, presently he commanded a watch-word to be given, that the souldiers should take their breakfast: and after they had refreshed and strengthened their bodies with food, go straight to arm themselves: which was obeyed accordingly. The Consul seeing them well appointed in readines, commanded the ensigns to advance forward out of the rampier, and not far from the enemy marshalled his battels. For a good while they stood on both sides, wisely looking, and waiting that the shout and charge should begin from the adverse part. But it was past noon before there was one dart flung or javelin lanced, either from the one side or the other. But then, because they should not go away without doing somewhat, the Tuscans began to set up a cry, the trumpets sound the charge, and the standards came forward. Neither were the Romans any jot behind to begin battel: Thus they ran to it, and encountred with exceeding animosity and fury; the enemies more in number, the Romans better in hardiness and verthe. The fight was doubtful and dangerous, and cost the life of many a man on both sides, and namely, those that were most forward and valiant: neither began they to shrink on any part, before that the second battailon of the Romans, fresh and lusty, advanced to the forefront of the vanguard, into the place of their wearied fellows. The Tuscans for that their vanguard was not supplied and reenforced by any new succours, both before and all about their ensigns were beaten down and slain every man. Never in any one battel had there been less running away, or more bloodshed, if the night had not protected the Tuscans: so resolute were they all to die in the place: in so much as the winners gave over play before the losers. After the sun set, the retreat was sounded: and by night both parts returned into the Camp. After this, no exploit was performed before Sutrium that year, worth remembrance: both for that, the foreward of the enemies army, was wholly in that one battel, defeated and destroyed: and they had none left but the Subsidiary souldiers of the rearward, and those hardly able and sufficient to guard and defend the Camp: and also, the Romans were so hurt and sore wounded, that there were more of them died after the battell of their hurts than were slain in the very skirmish outright. Q. Fabius, Consul for the year following, succeeded ed and entred upon this war at Sutrium. And for his colleague he had C. Martius Rutilius: and like as Fabius brought a new supply from Rome to furnish out the broken bands, so there came fresh forces also unto the Tuscans, levied at home.

For many years there had been no jars and debates between the Magistrates of the Nobility and the Tribunes of the Commons: but now there began a variance and contention out of that family and house, which even then was fatal, (as it were) and born to do mischief to the Tribunes and Commons both. Appius Claudius the Censor, after eighteen months expired (which by the law Emilia was the full term of bearing that Magistracy) notwithstanding that C. Plautius his Colleague had given up his office; could by no means possible be forced himself to go out and give over the place. Then rose up one P. Sempronius, a Tribune of the Commons; who took in hand this matter as touching the demission of the Censorship, within the time prefixed by the law: an action doubtless, not more popular than just and rightfull, nor less acceptable to the better sort, than pleasing to the very Commons and base people. He having frequently rehearsed and reiterated the law Emilia, extolled with praises up to the sky, the author and maker thereof, Mamercus Emilius a Dictator; who had reduced the Censorship, an office aforetime of five years continuance (a puissance and authority, which by the length thereof favoured of Lordship) within the compass of a year and six months. "Come on, quoth he, Appius Claudius, answer and say, "what you would have done in case you had been Censor, when C. Furius, and M. Giganus were "Censors? Appius answered and said, that this demand and question of the Tribune did not greatly touch or concern his cause. For put the case, that the law Emilia had obliged those Censors, during whose Magistracy the Act was made, (for that after those Censors created, the people had granted that law, and look what they last allowed and ordained the same was good, lawfull, and ratified) yet neither he nor any of them, who after that law enacted were created Censors, could be bound by vertue of that law. Whiles Appius thus cavilled, and no man there present soothed him up, or gave applause and assent unto him: "Behold Quirites, quoth Sempronius, "again, the progeny and race of that Appius, who being created Decemvir for one year, elected "himself the second year: and in the third, being chosen neither by himself, nor by any other, in "quality of a private person, held the sovereign dignity and government, with all the regal marks "and ensignes thereof: and thus continuing still in rule and dominion, would never give over, "before that his usurped governments of his ill-gotten, badly born, and naughtily kept and re- "tained, were his final fall and utter overthrow. This is the same family and house, (my Masters "and friends, Citizens of Rome) by whose violence, by whose wrongs and oppression, ye were "driven like poor banished persons to forgo your own dear native country, and to seize and "hold the Mount S. C.; the very same, against which ye procured and purchased to your selves "the support and help of Tribunes; the same, for which with two armies ye were fain to possess "your selves of the Aventine hill; the same that alwaies withstood the Statutes devised against "Usury; the same that ever impugned the laws for division of wast lands among the people; the "same brake for the time, and interrupted the marriages between the Nobles and Commons; "the same kept out the Commons so long from bearing any dignities of the Chair, and of State: "finally, this name is much more spitefully and mortally bent against your freedom, than that "of the Tarquins. And is it so indeed, O App. Claudius? Would you have us believe, that be- "ing now an hundred years since Mamercus Emilius was Dictator, there have been so many "Censors most noble and valiant personages, that none of them all ever read the twelve Tables? "and none of them knew that to be law which the people last granted and allowed? Yes I wis, "they all wist that well enough: and thereupon yielded they, and obeyed rather the law Emilia "than the old and ancient Statute, (whereby the first Censors were created in the Common- "wealth) even because the people approved it last: and by reason that there are two ordinances "repugnant and contrary one to the other, there the new alwaies repealeth and abrogateth the "old. And is this your saying, O Appius? That the people are not bound to the law Emilia? or ra- "ther that they are tied unto it, but your good self alone is free and exempt therefrom? Was the "law Emilia able to bridle and curb those violent Censors C. Furius, & M. Giganus, who shew- "ed sufficiently what harm and mischief this Magistracy could do in a Common-wealth; when "for anger & despite that their term was abridged and cut short, they disfranchised, and deprived "of the right of voice and Suffrage, yea, and brought within the range of Tributaries, M. Emilius "the worthiest and most excellent personage of his time, both at home in peace, and abroad in "war? This law took hold of all the Censors, one after another in order, for the space of an hun- "dred years after; and bindeth now C. Plautius your Colleague, created with the same Auspices, "and in equall authority with you. Tell me (I pray you) did not the people elect and make him "with as good right and authority as any Censor might be? Are you the only and special man a- "mongst all others to have this prerogative, this priviledge and singular preeminence by your self? "Suppose a man should create the King Sacrificer, should he, having once got the name and title "of a King, give out and avouch, that he was King indeed, of as great a prerogative as any King "of Rome? Who, think you, will be content with a Dictatorship of six months, or with an In- "terregne for five daies and no more? Whom may a man boldly and confidently create Dictator "either to fasten a spike or great nail? Or for the stately plaies and games; or horse-running, and "such like? How foolish, think ye my Masters, how base-minded and simple were they in this "man his conceit, who within twenty daies, after notable exploits done and atchieved, gave over "their

A "their Dictatorship? or they, that being created with some error and default, went out of their place? But what need I to rehearse examples of old date? Of late, even within these ten years, C. Manius Dictator, for enforcing a commission more severely than stood with the safety of some great & wealthy persons, was charged by them with the guiltiness of the same crime, whereupon he late and made inquisition: who, to the end, that being a private person, he might answer the accusation of his adversaries, and justify himself, resigned up his Dictatorship. But I would not, that you in any hand were so modest: no, no, degenerate not a jot from that most imperious stock and proud race: go not you forth of your office, howsoever you do, a day, no, nor an hour sooner than you needs must: but see then withall, that you exceed not the ordinary time limited and set down. At leastwise, it might content you to draw out your Censorship a day longer, or to stretch it farther by a month. A month? what tell you me of a month? I will exercise my Censorship (quoth he) three years and six months, more than may be by the law Æmylia: yea, and by my self alone will I exercise it. Yea, many for this is somewhat like indeed, and spoken like a King. What, will you substitute unto you a Colleague in the room of the other? will you so? Whom lawfull it is not to be subrogated and chosen, no, not in the dead his place? For you think it not enough, belike, that you (religious holy Censor that you be) have translated and transmitted, that most ancient solemnity, and only instituted by that good [Hercules] in whose honour it is celebrated, from the function of most noble Sacrificers and Chaplains, of that divine and sacred service, unto the ministry of base servants, and abject slaves: and that a kindred and lineage of greater antiquity, than the very first foundation of this City, so sanctified by entertainment and lodging of the immortal gods, by your means, and by occasion of your Censorship, within one year is rooted out and perished every mothers son: unless also by the same means, you hazard the whole Common-wealth, and bring all into the same enormity, and guilt of wickedness, whicheven to prelage and conjecture, my heart doth tremble and quake again. In that Lustrum [or five years space] was the City of Rome taken by the Gauls, wherein L. Papirius Censor, because he might not go out of his Censorship, took a Colleague unto him, M. Cornelius Maluginensis, in the place of C. Julius the Censor late deceased. And yet see, how much more sober and moderate was his ambitious humour in that behalf, than this of yours, O Appian, For L. Papirius neither alone, nor yet beyond the just set time by law, administered his Censorship: yet found he never any one person after him, that would imitate and follow his example. All Censors from that time forward, upon the death of their fellow Censor gave up the office. But as for you, notwithstanding that the date of your Censorship be fully out, and your companion in government departed out of the place: neither law nor shame, is able to rule and restrain. You suppose that vertue consisteth in pride, in audacious boldness, in contempt both of God and man. For mine own part truly, O Ap. Claudius, for the reverence and majesty of this honourable place, which you have born, I would not willingly enter into any such hard courses, as to touch your person by violence of hand: no, nor so much as to offend your name with any foul or unkind language. But as these words that have already passed, your own peevish and perverse forwardness, your opinionative contumacy, and insolent pride, having wrung and forced from me: so unless you will obey the law Æmylia by your leave, I will be so bold as command you to ward and prison. And since our forefathers and ancestors have so provided and ordained, that in the Election of Censors, if either of the twain come short of sufficient voices requisite for to choose him, the other cannot be admitted and declared Censor: and so they must proceed again to a new election, and the former Scrutinies are of no effect: shall I suffer you to exercise the Censorship alone, who may not lawfully be created alone? These and such like remonstrances after he had alledged, he commanded the Censor to be attached and committed. In these proceedings of his, six of his fellow Tribunes adhered unto him, and three only assisted Appian: who called instantly upon them for their protection and lawfull succour: and so with exceeding ill will, and highest discontentment of all states and degrees, he went clear away, and bare off the Censorship alone.

These matters thus passed at Rome, and Sutrium was besieged still by the Tuscans: and as the Conf. Fabius was leading about at the foot of the hills, certain forces to succour his allies, & to assail the fortifications of the enemies what way he could, they with an army in battel array met with him. Whose great multitude when he might discover upon the plains underneath, because he would help out the small number of his men by some advantage of the ground, he wheeled a little about, up toward the hill tops (which were rough and craggy places spred all over with stones) and from thence he turned his banners full upon the face of the enemies. The Tuscans forgetting all things, and thinking upon nothing but their multitude, whereof only they presumed; gave battell so hastily and in such greediness, that casting away their shots and darts from them, to the end they might the sooner come to hand-strokes, they drew their swords, as they marched against the enemy. The Romans on the contrary side laid load with shot, and applied them one while with darts, another while with stones which the place plentifully afforded them. Which, as they thumped and clattered, and stuck upon their shields and morions, although they hurt them not much, yet troubled them not a little: neither could the enemies easily come within them to fight neer and close, nor any darts or javelins had they to sling and launce afar off, and thereby to annoy their enemy. And whiles they stood still exposed as Buts, to receive all that came, and had nothing now to cover and protect them sufficiently; whiles some of them also gave ground and retreated, and the whole battel was wavering and unsteady, the Roman Hastati and Principes, came forward with a new shout, and charged them afresh. This violent assault could not the Tuscans bear, but turning their ensigns, fled again in disarray toward their camp.

 But when as the Roman horsemen who were rid over through the plains and had gotten before, met them afront in the rout, they left their way unto the Camp, & turned toward the mountains:
 from whence with their whole company in a manner disarmed and sore wounded, they recovered the Forrest Ciminia. The Romans having slain many thousands of the Tuscans, gained thirty eight ensigns of the field, and won also their tents with rich pillage; began to consult about pursuing the enemy. The wood Ciminia was at that time more unpassable and to be feared, than were of late daies the German Forrests: for never to that day had it been travelled and frequented so much as by merchants. And scarcely any one but the Captain himself durst venture to enter into it: for, all the rest had not forgot as yet the unhappy luck they had at Caudium. Then the Consul his brother, one that was there, (M. Fabius, as some say, as others, Cato, and as other some C.
Claudian, his brother only by the mothers side) promised that he would go as a scout inspiall, to descry the wood, and within a while bring certain news. He had in his tender years been brought up at Cere, among the ancient friends of his house and family, where afterwards he was taught the Tuscan learning and knowledge, and thereby was perfect in their tongue and language. And I find some authors of credit that writ, how in those daies the Romans young children went to school for to learn to parl Tuscan, as now they do to speak Greek. But it standeth more like a truth, that there was some special matter in this man, who with so bold semblance and dissimulation, durst intrude and insinuate himself amongst the enemies. It is said, that one only servitor accompanied him, one who had been brought up and nursed together with him, and thereupon not ignorant of the same language. And all the way as they went they did nothing else, but superficially and after a generall sort, learn the nature and site of the quarters which they were to enter into, and the names withall, of the chief rulers and principal personages of that country and nation: to the end that in their speech and talk, they might not falter and trip, and be taken tardy in any apparent thing, which might bewray and discover them. They went clad in pastoral weeds like herd-men, armed like country Kernes or Peasants, each of them with a faulchion and two javelins. But neither the familiar use and commerce of the tongue, nor the fashion of apparel which they wore, or weapons that they carried, saved them so much as this one thing, That no man would ever beleieve, that any forreiner and stranger durst enter upon those thick Ciminian Forrests. Well, forward they went (by report) as far as to the Camertins in Umbria. There, the Roman ventured to bewray who they were: and when he was brought into their Senat, he treated with them in the Consuls name, about a league and amity. Whereupon, after he had been courteously entertained and friendly intreated, he had his dispatch, and was willed to relate unto the Romans, That there should be ready for their army, sufficient victuals for one whole month, if they would come into those parts: Also, that the youth of the Camertins in Umbria should be at their command, prest in arms at all times. These tidings being reported to the Consul, after that he had sent before his carriages at the first watch of the night, and commanded the legions to go after, himself staid still with the horsemen: and the morrow morning by day-light he began to skirmish with the corps de guard of his enemies, which were quartered without the Forrest, and when he had long enough kept them play, and amused them at his pleasure, he retired unto his Camp; from whence he went forth at another gate, and before night overtaken the main army. The morrow after, at the point of day-break, he was got up to the crest of the hill Ciminus: from whence, after he had beheld and vewed the goodly prospect of the rich grounds and fields of Hetruria, he sendeth out his souldiers abroad to forrage and fetch in prizes, and by that time they had got, and were driving a fat booty, certain tumultuary bands of the rustical Peasants of Hetruria, gathered together in great hast, and of a sudden, by the States of that country met with the Romans; but so out of order were they, that being come to rescue a prey, they had like to have been a prey themselves. A number of them were slain or put to flight, and the Romans, having wasted and made spoil all over the country, enriched with store of all things, returned victorious into their Camp. Thither were arrived (as it fell out) five messengers or pursuivants with the Tribune of the Commons to warn and command Fabius in the name of the Senat, not to pass through the Forrest Ciminus.
 But these messengers being glad that they came too late for to hinder and interrupt their enterprises, returned home again to Rome with news of the victory.

By this expedition and journey made by the Cos, the war rather encreased and spread farther, than was dispatched & brought to an end. For all that tract lying along the bottom & foot of the mountain Ciminus, felt the smart of this rode: and provoked to anger & desire of revenge, not only the State of Hetruria, but also the borders and marches of Umbria. Whereupon there came to Sutrium, a greater power than ever afore: for not only they removed their Camp forward out of the woods, but also for the eager desire of fight withal speed, they came abroad into the plain field.
 Afterwards, they stood first embattelled in a plot, by them sely chosen, leaving over against them a space of ground for the enemies to set themselves in order of battel: but perceiving the enemies to fall off, & loath to fight, they approached the very trench and rampiers; but finding there, that the guards were retired within their hold, all at once they began to cry with one voice to their captains, for to give order, that the rest of their allowance of victuals for that day should be brought

A them thither out of the camp; for they would stay in their armor and harness, as they were, and either in the night, or else in the morning betimes by day-light, give the assault upon their enemies camp. The Roman army was no more quiet then they, yet at their Generals commandment kept in. Now it was welnear the * tenth hour of the day; When as the Consul willed his souldiers to take their refection, and warned them to be ready in armes at what hour soever by day or by night he should give them the signal of battell. And in the mean time maketh a short speech unto them, praising highly, and setting out of the Samnits wars, debasing the Tuscans, saying, that there was no comparison between either enemy to enemy, or number for number: over and besides, he said that he had another feat and secret devise in store for them, which they should know when time served; in the mean while they must keep silence of necessity, and hold their peace. By these dark speeches and hidden mysteries, he made semblance, as though he had some privy intelligence,

B that one part of the enemies would betray the rest when time came: this did he, to the end, that the heart of his souldiers (which haply were dismaied and discouraged at their great multitudes) might be comforted and refreshed: and for that the enemies lay abroad in field without any hold and fort, it was more likely and probable, which he pretended. The souldiers having taken their repast, they laid their bodies to repose and sleep, and somewhat before the reliefe of the * fourth watch, they were raised without noise, and armed themselves. The souldiers boies and lackies, and such as followed the camp, had mattocks and spades divided amongst them, to cast down the rampire, and to fill up the ditches with the bank; whiles that within the compasse and circuit of the camp, they were marshalled in battell array. The chosen * cohorts or bands were placed at the gates and passages forth. Then at the sound of trumpet, a little before day (which in summer nights is the time of the deepest and soundest sleep) the whole army, when the rampire was laid along and levell, issued forth at once, and charged the enemies on all sides, lying here and there scattered on the ground. Some before they were stirring, others half asleep and half awake in their couches; but the greatest part, making hast in that sudden fright to take arms, were slain and cut in peeces. Few had time to put themselves in armour, and they having no ensigns, no colours to follow, and no captains to direct them, were by the Romans soon discomfited, put to flight, and pursued in chace. Some made hast to the camp, other to the woods, sundry waies one from another. But the woods were the safest place of refuge. For their camp pitched in a plain, was the same day taken, and won. All the gold and silver there found, was by expresse commandment brought unto the Consul his pavilion; the rest of the pillage, was the souldiers share. Slain and taken prisoners that day, there were of the enemies to the number of 60000. This so noble a battell (some writers say) was fought on the other side of the wood Ciminia, before Perusia: who also report, that the City of Rome was in great fear, lest that the army being inclosed within so dangerous a wood, should have been surprisid and defeated by the Tuscans and Umbrians, who were risen up in arms together from all parts. But wheresoever it was fought, the Romans had the day. Whereupon there came Embassadors from Perusia, * Cortona, and * Arretium, where were in maner the chief and principall Cities at that time of all Tuscan, treating and suing to the Romans for peace, and a league: but they obtained truce only for thirty years.

During these affairs in Hetruria, the other Consul, C. Martius Rutilius, wan from the Samnits the town * Allifas. Many other villages and castles were either utterly demolished and destroyed by way of extreame hostility, or yielded safe and whole unto their subjection. At the same time the Roman navy also, under the Conduct of P. Cornelius, whom the Senat ordained Admiral of the sea-coast, set sail for Campania, and being arrived at * Pompeii, the mariners and sea-servitors went a land to waite and forage the territories about * Nucerina; and after they had made spoil, and pillaged by snatches the parts lying neerest unto the sea, from whence they might safely again return to their ships; they adventured farther for sweetnesse of gain and booty (as usually it falleth out) and so gave the alarm to the enemies for to rise. As they stragled all over the fields, no man made head against them, at what time, as they might have been soon slain every one; but as they were returning with a disordered march, and stood not upon their guards, a troop of the peasants of the country overtook them, not far from the Ships, and eased them of their spoil and pillage, and slew some of them: the rest of the multitude, as many as escaped the sword, were chased to their fleet.

The journey of Q. Fabius beyond the Forrest Ciminia, as it caused great fear in Rome, so it gave occasion of as joyfull news in Samnium. For the rumor ran, that the Romans army was shut up and besieged. And hereupon they called to remembrance, and alledged the like example of a losse and shameful disgrace at Claudinna; reporting and giving forth, that these Romans being a nation greedy alwaies of incroaching farther, and winning more ground, were through the same rashnesse now run headlong into the blind Forrests impassable, and invironed not so much with the power and force of enemies, as the dangerous difficulties of those passages. In such sort as amid this joy of theirs, they envied also that fortune had turned the glorious honour of the conquest over the Romans, from the Samnits, to the Tuscans. And therefore being well appointed with men and armour, they ran out from all parts, to tread down and confound C. Martius the Consul for ever: minding from thence, in case Martius would not abide a battell, to go into Hetruria through the Maris and Sabins. But the Consul met with them by the way; where was fought a shape and cruell battell with doubtful event, and much effusion of blood on both sides. And as uncertain as it was, whether part lost more blood, yet the rumor went, that the Romans had the worle

worse, by reason of the losse of certain knights and gentlemen of Rome, and Colonels, and one Lieutenant; and that which made most, for that the Consul himself was hurt. Hereupon the brute (as commonly is seen) got more feathers still as it flew, and made every thing greater: so as the LL. of the Senat in Rome, were in great fear and perplexity, and agreed to create a Dictator. Neither was there any doubt at all, but that Papirius Cursor should be the man, who in those daies was reputed the only warrior above all others. But neither could they be assured of sending a messenger safe into Samnium (considering all the country was up in arms) nor that the Consul was for certain alive. And as for the other Consul Fabius, upon an old secret and privat grudge, he maliced Papirius: which quarell, lest it might hinder the service of the Commonweal, the Senat thought good to send unto him certain Embassadors (as it were) even such as had been Consuls; who of their own authority, as well as by vertue of publick commission from the State, should admonish and counsel him to remit and forget all old displeasures and rancours, for his countries sake. When these personages were come to Fabius the Col. and had delivered unto him the decree of the Senat, and used withall such speech and reasons of their own, as suited well to the errand they had in charge: the Col. casting his eies down toward the ground, departed from the Embassadors without giving ever a word, and left them doubtfull what he would do. But the night following, in the dead time (as the manner is) he nominated L. Papirius for Dictator. And when these messengers or Embassadors gave him great thanks for mastering and ruling his affections to exceeding well, he held his resolution still of silence, and without any answer given, or mention made of himself, dismissed them: that it might appear, how upon an high mind and haughty stomach, he bridled and kept in that grief of heart and spiteful anger of his, Papirius named C. Junius Bubulcus commander of the horse. And whiles he proposed an act concerning the regiment and command of his army, before the people assembled by the Curia or wards, there hapned a matter of ominous preface, which caused that businesse to be put off untill the next day: for that the ward Fancia, which by lot had the prerogative now to give the first voices, was noted already for infamous and unhappy, in regard that two calamities which happened in both years, wherein the same Curia likewise began the suffrages first; namely, the taking of the City of Rome, and the Caudine peace. Macer Licinius making that ward ominous and unlucky, for a third losse and calamity received at Tremera. But the next morrow, the Dictator, after he had taken new Auspices, went through with the act, and obtained his commission, and set forward with the legions lately mustered and enrolled upon the fearfull alarm given, that the Roman army was passed the wood Cyminia, untill he arrived at Longula: where, after he had received of the Consul Martius, the old bands of souldiers, he brought his forces into the field to give battell. The enemies for their part seemed not to refuse fight: howbeit, as they stood armed and aranged, and neither the one side nor the other would begin to charge, the night came upon them, and forced them to retire. Then they abode encamped neer together in rest and quiet for certain dayes, neither distrusting their own puissance, nor yet disdainig and despising their enemies. In this mean time there was doings and war in Etruria: for both there was a battell fought with the army of the Umbrians: howbeit, the enemies were rather discomfited and put to flight than slain, for that they were not able to hold out and maintain fight long with such courage and animosity as they began: and also neer the lake and Meare Vadimon*, the Tuscans had levied a new army, according to a sacred law, whereby one man had chosen another (who as sworn brethren were to live and die together) where they fought a field, not only with greater number, but also with more courage than ever at any time before: and with such heat of anger and malice one against the other they encountred, that of neither side they thought of discharging shot and flancing darts, but began at the very first with their swords to go to handstrokes: and the conflict being right fiercely begun, increased still, and waxed hotter in the very skirmish, and continued for a good while so doubtfull, that the Romans thought they dealt not with Tuscans so often by them defeated and vanquished, but with some new nation more warlike than they. No shew of flight on neither side; down go the formost, and lay dead before their Standards: and lest that the ensignes should be left naked and bare, and without the defendants, the second range and ward of the battailon came in place to supply the first: and so still new succours and fresh were set even as far as from the rereward behind, destined for the last help and utmost refuge. And to that extremity of travel and perill they proceeded, that the Roman horsemen abandoning their horses alighted on foot, and were faine to go to the footmen in the forefront of the vanguard, over armor, and over dead bodies, lying all spread upon the ground; which new troop and battailon risen and sprung (as it were) a fresh, to reenforce and strengthen their distressed fellowes, disordered the squadrons and ensignes of the Tuscans. The other legionary souldiers, wearied (as they were) followed hard and seconded their violence and forceable charge, and at length brake through the ranks of their enemies. Then the Tuscans as stiffe as they stood afore, began to have the worse, and certain bands gave way and retreated: and when they once turned back, they fell plainly to take their heels and run away. This was the first day, that overthrew and laid along the puissance of the Tuscans, who abounded so long in wealth and fortunate prosperity. Their whole flour and strength which they had, was in this battell slain, and at the same time their camp won and ransacked.

With like hazard and glorious successe of the end, was the war managed with the Samnites soon after; who besides all other preparations and ordinary furniture of war, gave order that their

A their army should glitter and shine againe with a new kind of garnishing their harnesse and armors. For having divided their forces in two armies, the one had laid their shields with gold, the other with silver. The form and fashion whereof was this, that upper part wherewith the breast and shoulders are covered, was broader, and the head of it of even height: but the nether end growing downward to the bottom was more pointed wedgewise, for to weld it more nimble; Their breast and stomack was fenced with sponges, the left leg armed with a good greave, their morions with high crests made a shew of tall stature. The souldiers aforesaid with guilded shields wore coats of sundry colours; the other with silvered, white linnen: and these had the leading of the right wing, or point of the battell; but they of the left. The Romans had notice and knowledge already what preparation there was of brave and goodly armor: and their Captains had taught them afore, that a souldier ought to be dreadful and terrible, not dight and decked in his damasked gold and silver, but trusting in the sharp edge of iron and steel, and a good heart and courage withall: and as for that other furniture, it was rather a good booty than armor of proof; fair and resplendent, before men come to the sharp, but foul and unseemly amongst bloody wounds. The true ornament and beauty of a souldier, is valour and hardinesse; as for all those braveries, they went commonly with victory: and to conclude, that a rich enemy would serve well for a good prize to the conqueror, were he never so poor and needy. With these speeches after that Curio had animated his souldiers, he leade them into the field: himself he put in the right wing; the left he committeth to the conduct of the General of horse. So soon as they charged one another and buckled together, a great conflict and hardy had they with the enemy, and no lesse emulation there was between the Dictator and him; striving much whether of them twain should begin the victory. But as hap was, first Junius disordered the enemy, and from the left point which he commanded, he charged right lustily the right wing of the enemies: saying ever and anon, That he offered and sacrificed unto the Devill and infernall spirits, those souldiers of theirs, consecrated already unto them after the manner of the Samnites, and decked accordingly in white livery, and bright silvered armour, suting in colour thereunto: and withall advanced forward his standards, brake their staves, and made the battell to shrink evidently and give ground. Which when the Dictator perceived, How now, quoth he, shall the victory begin at the left wing, and shall the right, wherein the Dictator fighteth in person, come behind and follow the battell of another, and not carry away with it the greatest part of the victory? Herewith he setteth on his souldiers, yet gave the horsemen no place in manhood to the footmen, or the service of the Lieutenants was inferiour to the Captains themselves and chief commanders: M. Valerius on the right point, P. Decius on the left, both Consular men, put themselves forward, and rode out to the horsemen ranged in the wings, exhorted them to take part with them in honor, and charged a-crosse upon the sides and flanks of the enemies. Whiles this new terror upon the former, had on every side entred the battell of the enemies; and the Roman legions, to terrifie them the more, had redoubled a fresh shout, & charged them with great fury, then began the Samnites to flie again. Now were the fields overspread with the bodies of slain men, and strewed thick with armor, ere while so brave and glorious: and at the first, the Samnites in great affright recovered their tents; but being there, were not able so much as to keep them, for they were won and rifled before night, and fire set upon them. The Dictator by a decree of the Senat triumphed: and the said armor which was taken from the enemy, made the goodliest pageant of all other, in the pomp of triumph: which carried so stately a shew and magnificent, that the guilded shields were divided amongst the warders of the company of Bankers and Goldsmiths, to the beautifying of their Hall and Market place. And hereof began first the custome of the Ediles, to adorn and set out the common place of the City in their solemn processions, when the sacred images of the gods and holy reliques were carried about for pomp in silver chariots. And the Romans verily for their part put this goodly trim armor of their enemies to this use, namely, to honor their gods withall. But the Campains upon a pride and inveterate hatred that they bare against the Samnites, used to arm their sword-players and fencers at the sharp (which was a solemn fight and pastime they had at their great feasts) with this same attire, and termed them in mockery, by the name of Samnites.

The same year Fabius the Consul fought with the rest of the Tuicani at Perusia* (which City Perugia* also had broken the covenant of truce) where neither doubtfully nor hardly he obtained victory. And the very town it self he had forced & won (for in the same train of his conquest he approached the walls) but that their Embassadors came forth and yielded the City. When he had placed a good garrison at Perusia and sent before him to Rome unto the Senat, the Embassadors of Hetruria, who treated for peace, he being but Consul, made his triumphant entry into the City for a more magnificent victory, then the Dictator. And that for a good part of the honor of subduing the Samnites, was ascribed to the Lieutenants P. Decius, and M. Valerius, therefore at the next Election, the people with general assent declared the one Consul, and the other Pretour. Fabius for having Hetruria so bravely and valiantly, continued Consul still, and had for his Colleague P. Decius. Valerius was created Pretor the fourth time. The Consuls parted between them the provinces, Hetruria fell to Decius, Samnium to Fabius. Who taking his voiage to Neapolis, laid siege to the City of the Alliats, and won it by assault; and notwithstanding they made suit for peace, he rejected and despised them, for that when it was offered, they would not accept it. With the Samnites he fought a battell; but without any great conflict, the enemies were vanquished. Neither had the remembrance of that field been left in record, but that the Marfians first took arms and warred with the Romans. After the Marfians were revolted, the Pelignians did the semblable, and sped alike. Decius also the other Consul had good success in his wars. He drove the Tarquinians for fear, to find the army corn, and to sue for a truce of forty years. Certain castles and holds of the Volscinians, he forceably won: some of them he utterly rased, for that they should not be any receptacle or harbour for the enemies. And with warring round about every where, he became so terrible, that the whole Tuscan nation made suite to the Consul for peace and confederacy. If they could not obtain: but truce for a year was granted. In regard whereof, for that year they satisfied the whole pay for the army, and a double livery for every souldier was exacted and taken of them. This was the pension and fine that their truce cost them.

But now when all was quiet among the Tuscans, the sudden revoking of the Umbrians, a nation free, and saved hitherto from the calamities of war, but only, that the Roman army passing through their territories troubled all anew: for they having raised the strength and flower of their youth and solicited also a great part of the Tuscans to rebel, levied so great a power that making no account of Decius, whom they left behind them in Hetruria, they gave out proud words of themselves, and spake basely of the Romans, vaunting and boasting that they would march right forth to assault Rome. Which designe of theirs, so soon as it was reported to Decius the Cos. he made speed, and by long journies departed out of Hetruria toward the City, and in the Country of the Papinians, encamped himself; listning ever after the enemies, what they meant to do. Neither at Rome was the Umbrians war neglected and set light by: for their very threats and menaces scared them, as who already had seen by experience, by the foil they had at the Gauls hands, how unsure a City they inhabited and not apprenable. Therupon messengers were dispatched to the Cos, Fabius, That if he had any breathing time, and rest from the Samnits war, he should with all speed lead his army into Umbria. The Cos. obeyed, and by great journies went forward to Morvania, where at that time the forces of the Umbrians lay. This sudden and unexpected coming of the Cos. whom they thought verily occupied in Samnium far enough off from Umbria, so terrified the Umbrians, that some gave advise to retire back to their walled towns, others to relinquish the war altogether. One Canton or tract of their country (which they themselves call Maserina not only kept the rest in arms, but also set them on to fight immediately, so as they charged upon Fabius, as he was trenching and fortifying. Whom when the Cos. saw rushing upon his rampiers in such heaps, he called his men from their work, and as the ground & time would give leave, he marshalled them in order of battel: and after he had encouraged his souldiers with a true report & discourse of many glorious and honourable journies achieved as well in Thusaia as also in Samnium he willed them to dispatch this smal residue of the Tuscan war, that hung by and remained behind, and to be revenged of that accursed and impious speech, whereby they threatened to assail the City of Rome. These words of his were heard by the souldiers with such alacrity and cheerfulness of heart, that before their Generall had made an end of his speech, they set up a shout of themselves and interrupted him: and thus before commandment and signall given by sound of trumpets and cornets, they ran amain upon the enemies, and charged them as if they had not been men, and those also armed. For (a wonderful thing to be spoken) at the very first they began to pluck the banners and streamers out of the bearers hands, after that, the ensign-bearers themselves were led to the Consuls, and the souldiers armed as they were, transported out of one battalion into another, and where there was any scuffling, they fought not so much with sword, as buckler: and what with their bosses and iron pikes, and what with jussling, shouldering, and striking the enemies about the arme-pits, they were overbrowed and felled. In which skirmish, more men were taken then slain: and no other cry was heard throughout the field, but down with weapon, down with weapon. So that in the very conflict, the principal authors of the war rendred themselves: and the morrow after, and other daies following, the rest of the people of Umbria likewise yielded. The Otricoliens by stipulation only and pledges given, were received in amity. And Fabius having thus got the victory in that war, which fell to another mans lot and charge, led back his army again into his own province. And in regard of his prosperous and happy exploits, like as the people the year past continued his Consulship: so the Senat against the year following, when Ap. Claudius, and L. Volturnus were Cos. prorogued his martial rule still, mangre the heart of Appius, who was greatly against it. In some Chronicles I find, that Appius, while he was Censor, sued to be Consul, and that his Election was crossed and staid by L. Furius, a Tribune of Com. untill he had resigned up the Censorship, Being created Cos. and the war with the Salentins (declared new enemies) allotted unto his Colleague, he remained at Rome: that by civil policy, and managing home-affairs, he might augment his own state and authority, since that the honour of war-service rested in the hands and conduct of another. Volturnus had no cause to repent of his charge and province: for many fortunat battels he fought, and some towns of the enemies by force he won. He was a bountifull giver of the spoil away unto his souldiers: and this bounty in it self alone acceptable, he helped much with great courtesie and gentleness, by which vertues and artificial means, he made the souldiers both venturous in perils and hardy in travell.

Q. Fabius on the other part, in quality of pro-Consul, gave battell to the Samnits near the City Alisa, where the day was nothing doubtful. The enemies were discomfited and beaten into their camp: neither had they been able to have kept the field, but that there was but a little

A the day left behind : and yet before night, they were beset round about in their hold : yes, and watched with good guards all night long, that none should make escape. The morrow morning ere it was well day light, they began to yield themselves, and to capitulate, that as many Samnites as there were among them, should be sent forth in their single garments, and they all went under the gallows. As for their confederats and allies, there was no such proviso nor composition made; but they all, to the number of seven thousand, were sold as slaves, and wore a garland. As many as avowed themselves to be Hernicks, were kept apart by themselves to be forth coming. All those Fabius sent to Rome to the Senat, and untill such time as enquiry was made, whether in a publick muster they were pressed souldiers or voluntarily served under the Samnites against the Romans, they were committed to be kept in ward among sundry nations of the Latins : during B which time, the new Consuls, Publius Cornelius Arvina, and Quintus Martins Tremulus (for those were now created) had in charge to propose that matter anew unto the Senat. The Hernicks took that ill. Whereupon the Anagnins held a Diet or General Councel in the round Cirque, which they call Maritimus, of all the Cities of that Nation, except the Alatrins, Ferentinats, and the Verulans. Where the whole State of Hernicks proclaimed war against the people of Rome. In Samnium also, for that Fabius was departed thence, there arose new troubles and rebellions. Calatia and Sora were forced, and the Roman garisons that there lay, were put to the sword; and upon the bodies of as many as they took alive, they exercised much torture and cruelty. Whereupon Publius Cornelius the Consul was thither sent. And to Martius were the new enemies appointed (for by this time decreed it was, That war should be made upon the C Anagnins and the other Hernicks.) At the first the enemies had so seized all the convenient passes and waies between both the Consuls camps, that there could not readily passe a lackey or currier between, in so much, as for certain daies both Consuls abode doubtful how the world went; and uncertain one of the others state. The fear whereof, spread to Rome, for all the younger sort [from seventeen years of age to seven and forty] were to serve : and against all sudden occasions, and occurrents whatsoever, two full and compleat armies were levied and enrolled. But the Hernick war was nothing correspondent either to the present menaces, or to the ancient glory and reputation of that nation : for having done no worthy adventures, and within few daies lost their camp thrice, they covenanted for to have thirty daies truce ; during which time, they might send Embassadors to the Senat of Rome : and in consideration hereof, they D promised to lay down two months pay, and to find corn for the army, and allow every souldier one coat. But from the Senat they were put off and referred to Martius : unto whom by order from the Senat, a large commission was granted, to dispose of the Hernicks as he thought good : and so he took the whole nation as yielded to his devotion. The other Consul in Samnium being in forces more puissant then the enemy, was not withstanding encumbered much with the difficulty of the ground. All the passages had the enemy stopped, and possessed himself of the Forrests and woods which were thorow faies; that no way victuals might be conveyed unto him. Neither could the Consul, for all that daily he displayed banner in field, train them forth to fight : so as it was well seen, that neither the Samnites could abide present battell, nor the Romans long delay of war. But the arrival of Martius who upon the subduing of the Hernicks, made hast to aid his E Colleague, caused the enemy to defer no longer the trial of the field. For, they, who thought themselves not good enough to match so much as the one army, knew full well that if they suffered two Consuls armies to join together, there had been no hope left. They therefore set upon Martius as he marched without order of battell. Hereupon in al hast their trusses and fardels were brought together and laid in the middle; and as the time would permit, he set his souldiers in array. At the first encounter, the shout was hard into the camp of the other Consul. Afterwards the dust descried as it off, gave an alarm, and made a trouble and tumult there. Then the Consul presently commanded to arm : and hastily bringing his souldiers forth into the field, entered upon the battell of the enemies in the flank, while they were busied in another skirmish. He cried aloud to his men, that it were exceeding great shame, to suffer the other army to carry away double victory, and not themselves win the honour of that war, which was their proper charge.
 F Thus, whereforever he charged, he brake in and made entrance, and having pierced and made a great lane through the midst of the enemies battell, he passed on towards their camp, which finding void of defendants, he took and set afire. Which when the souldiers of Martius saw burning before their faces, and the enemy likewise, as they looked behind : then began the Samnites on all hands to flee : but killed they were every where down right : all places full of murder and slaughters so in no part could they find means to escape and save themselves. Now when there were thirty thousand of the enemies slain, the Consuls sounded the retreat, and gathered both their armies together, with great congratulation one to the other : by which time, behold, there were descied a far off, certain new bands of enemies, enrolled for a supply ; and they gave occasion
 G of a new and fresh slaughter. Against whom without commandment of Consul, or any signall received from their leaders, the Romans advanced lustily, crying aloud, that these Samnites were to be welcomed with an ill hantell, and this their first training should cost them dear. The Consuls let the legions alone in this their furious heat, as who knew well enough, that these new comers seeing the old beaten souldiers so astonished already and flying away, would soon have enough of it, and not once adventure fight. And they were not deceived in their opinion ; for the whole forces of the Samnites as well old and new, fled apace unto the next mountains : and thither the Romans also make as great speed. But no safe place could those vanquished enemies find: for even from the very hill tops which they held, they were beaten down, so that with one voice they all craved peace. Then after the Consuls had imposed upon them corn for three months, and a years pay, and for every souldier a livery besides, they were permitted to send Embassadors to the Senat, to treat and capitulat thereof. During which time, Cornelius was left in Samnium, and Martius returned into the City, with triumph over the Hernicks. Moreover a decree passed, that his statue riding on horseback should remain in the common place of assemblies, which was erected accordingly even before the Temple of Castor. To three States of the Hernicks, to wit, the Alatrians, the Verulans and Ferentinans, their own laws, and ancient liberties were restored again, because they made choice thereof, rather than to be enfranchised Citizens of Rome: and permitted they were to marry amongst the Romans, which liberty they only of the Hernicks for a good while enjoied. The Anagnins, and those that had born arms against the Romans were incorporat free denizens of Rome, but without the priviledge of giving voices and suffrages: debarred they were of holding any Councils and making marriage with them, yea, and denied at all to elect any magistracy, but only the function and ministry of divine service and sacrifices.

The same year the Chappell of dame Salus was by C. Junius Bubulcus now Cenfor, set out at a price to be built, which he in his Consulship had vowed, in the Samnits war. By his direction and appointment, together with his colleague M. Valerius Maximus, were the great high waies and cauleys made, of all sides of the City, through the fields, at the common charge and expenses. The same year also, was the league renewed now the third time with the Carthaginians: and their Embassadors who came for that purpose, were courteously entertained, and rewarded liberally with rich gifts. In that year there was a Dictator P. Cornelius Scipio, with P. Decius General of the horse: and these were Presidents at the Election of Consuls, for to that purpose they were created, because neither of the two Consuls could be spared from the wars. Consuls were created L. Posthumius, and T. Minutius. But Piso sayth, that these Consuls immediately succeeded Q. Fabius and P. Decius: leaving out those two years, wherein he hath written that Claudius with Volumnius, and Cornelius with Martius were Consuls. Whether he forgot himself in digesting his Annals and yearly records, or of set purpose overhipt two couple of Consuls, thinking that they were not in truth Consuls, I wot not.

The same year the Samnits made rodes into the territories of Stella, within the liberties and appurtenances of the Campains, and therefore both Consuls were sent into Samnium: who when they were parted into divers wayes, for Posthumius took his journey to Tifernum, and Minutius to Bovianum: first there was battell fought at Tifernum, under the leading of Posthumius. Some make no doubt, but write, that the Samnits were discomfited, and put to the worse, and thirty thousand of them taken prisoners: others say, that the conflict was equall, and that they departed on even hand: also that Posthumius making semblance of fear, journeyed by night, & closely retired unto the hills adjoyning, & the enemies followed after them, two miles, and from thence encamped, and fortified also themselves in strong places of advantage. The Consul, because he would be thought to have fought and chose a safe place, and plentifully stored with all necessaries (as it was no lesse indeed) where he might keep a standing camp: after he had fortified the same, and furnished it with all kind of provision, leaving behind him a strong garrison for defence: at the relief of the third watch, leadeth the neerest way, his legions not encumbered with cariage, to his Colleague, who also himself lay in camp over against another army. There, by the perswasion & advice of Posthumius, Minutius gave battell; and when as the conflict continued doubtfull until it was far on the day: then Posthumius with his fresh legions, on a sudden charged the battailions of the enemies, now already overroyled, & bus partly for weariness, and partly for wounds, they being disabled for to flee away, were out of all measure slain every one, and xxi. banners were taken: and so from thence they went forward to the camp of Posthumius. Where these two victorious armies finding the enemy discouraged and amazed at the tidings of this overthrow, set upon them, discomfited, and put them to flight; and wan from them xxvi. ensignes: where the General of the Samnits Stratius Collus, with many a man besides, was taken prisoner, and both their camps won. Bovianum also, which the morrow after began to be assaulted, was shortly after forced: and finally with great glory of no noble acts atchieved, both Consuls triumphed. Some write that the Consul Minutius being grievously hurt, was broughed back into the camp, and there dyed: and that M. Fulvius was substituted Consul in his room: and that it was he, who being sent unto the army of Minutius, won Bovianum. The same year Sora, Arpinum, and Consentia were recovered from the Samnits: and the great image of Hercules was in the Capitol set up and dedicated.

When as P. Sulpitius Avernus, and P. Sempronius Sophus were Consuls, the Samnits desiring either to see an end of war, or else to delay it, sent Embassadors to Rome pretending peace. To whom as they pleaded and intreated most humbly, this answer was given: That if the Samnits had not so often treated for peace, when they intended and prepared war they might after certain intervals, and conferences passed between, obtain their suit: but since that evermore until that time, their words were but wind; now they would trust to their deeds, and nothing else. P. Sempronius the Consul, shall shortly be in Samnium with an army: who would not be abused, but soon see, whether their minds be enclined to war or peace: and as he found and saw every thing, so would he bring word and make relation: and therefore their Embassadors were to attend upon

A upon the Consul when he departed out of Samnium. The same year after that the Romans army had passed peaceably to and fro, and visited all Samnium, having victuals by the country courteously allowed, the ancient league was granted again to the Samnites. From thence turned the Romans their forces against the Æquians, their old enemies; but for many years making semblance of quietness, where as indeed their peace was little to be trusted: for that the Hernick nation was safe and on foot, they with them, had used oftentimes under hand to send aid unto the Samnites; and also after the subduing of the Hernicks, the whole nation in a manner without dissembling, and averring all they did by publick counsell and authority, had fallen away unto the enemy: and after that the Romans had made league with the Samnites, and their heralds came to make claim for their goods took from them by way of hostility, they said, It was but a tempting of them, to see, whether upon fear of war they would suffer themselves to become Romans. Which, say they, how greatly it were to be wish'd, the Hernicks was able to teach them: for they, as many of them as had liberty to do what they would, chose rather to live under their own laws, then to be enfranchised citizens of Rome; but others, who had not the same scope to choose to their liking, they were constrained to accept of the Burgeoisie of their City, by way of a punishment. Upon these speeches and arguments commonly tossed in their assemblies and Councils, the people of Rome decreed war against the Æquians: to which both the Consuls went, and encamped four miles from their enemies camp. The Æquians (who in their own behalf, and for any quarrell of theirs, had many years sat still and made no war) like as if their army had been levied of a sudden and in haste, without certain Captains appointed, and without any Generall to command, were affraid. Some thought good to go forth into the field, others to defend themselves, and keep within their camp: most of them were moved to think aforehand upon the wasting of their country afterwards, and consequently the destruction of their cities left but with slender garrisons. Therefore after that, amongst many opinions, this only had audience, namely, to abandon the care of publick weal and every man to regard his own privat state, and at the first watch to depart divers waies one from the other, and quit the camp, and convey away all their bag and baggage, and to defend their Cities within the wals: they all with one accord accepted thereof, and imbraced it. Now when the enemies were thus scattered abroad about the country, the Romans by day-light, with banner displayed went forth into the field: and when they saw no man come abroad to meet them, they marched in warlike order apace towards the enemies camp. But when as they could perceive there, neither warders before the gates, nor any man upon the trench & rampiers, nor so much as the usual noise of a leaguer, being moved with this unaccustomed silence, for fear of forelaying and treachery, they stood still: but being got over the rampier, and finding the tents void and empty, they set forward to pursue the enemy by his trace. But when they found their foot-tracks, leading to all parts of the Country alike: as being slipt here and there, sundry and divers waies, at the first they wandred out of the way, and missed of them; but afterwards knowing by their espials the purpose and intent of their enemies, they went round about and besieged every City, and in three-score daies wan forty towns all by assault: most part whereof were razed even with the ground, and consumed into ashes, and the nation of the Æquians utterly in a manner destroyed. Over the Æquians there was triumph; Whose calamity and desolation was so fearfull an example, to the Marrucins, Marfi, Peligni, and Ferentins, that they sent Orators to Rome to treat for peace and amity: and to all those nations at their request, a league was granted. The same year, C. Flavius a Notary or Register by profession, whose father Cneus was no better than of a slave made free, a man, thus descended of base and low parentage, howbeit otherwise crafty and eloquent withall, arose to be an Ædile Curule. I find in some records, that when he gave attendance in his calling to the Ædiles, and saw that his own Tribe were willing to give him their voices and elect him Ædile, but his name not accepted of among other competitors, for that he got his living by his pen, he cast aside his books and papers, and sware an oath, that he would no longer be a Notary and use pencraft. But Macer Licinius avoucheth, that a good while before, that he gave over his writing, namely, after he had been Tribune, and born two Triumvirships, the one for the night misrules, the other for the placing and transporting of a Colony. But they all agree upon this, that he became very stout, and in great contumacy opposed himself and made head against the Nobles that contemned his base birth. The civil law which before time was laid up in great secret by the Priests, and Prelats in their Arches, he published abroad: and set up a table in the great common place, in manner of a Calendar, wherein all men might know worke-daies from holy-daies; when it was lawfull to plead, and when not. Also in despite, and to the great heart-burning of the Patritii, he dedicated the temple of the goddesse Concord upon the Court of Vulcan: and by the generall consent of the people, Cornelius Barbatius the high Priest was compelled to endite and pronounce the certain form of words therto belonging; notwithstanding he contested and denied, that by the customes of their forefathers any could dedicate a Temple, unlesse he were either Consul or Generall of an army. And therefore by the authority of the Senat, a law was preferred to the people, That no man might dedicate a Temple or Altar, without permission and consent of the Consul, or the more part of the Tribuns of Commons. I will report in this place a thing, of itself not worthy of remembrance, but only for a proof and example of the liberty of the Commons against the pride and insolencie of the Nobles. This Flavius, coming upon a time to visit his Collegue lying sick, by a complot afore hand of certain young gentle-gentleman of the Patritians that sat by his bed side, had no reverence done unto him, nor any one so much as rose up at entrance into the chamber: whereupon, he commanded his ivory chair of State to be brought unto him, and set him self upon it; and so he outfaced his adversaries, that were so vexed to the heart with envy of his dignity. This Flavius was nominated & chosen Edile, by the base faction of the commoners, banding together in the place of assemblies: who first took heart by the Censorship of Appius Claudius the first that ever distained and polluted the Senat, by bringing in the Sons of Libertins: and when he saw that no man accounted that Election of Senators good and lawfull, and perceived withall, that in the Court he had not that backing of Citizens which he sought for; he intermingled in every Tribe certain of the most base perions of the Commons: and so he corrupted both the common place and Mars field also. In so much as the Election of Flavius was reputed so unworthy an indignity, that most of the gentlemen of Rome laid away their gold rings and rich trapping of their horses which were the ornaments and ensigns of their calling. And from the time forward the City was divided into two parts. One side was maintained and upheld by the true hearted people, such as favoured and loved good things: the other by the faction of ruffe-raffe and scum of the City: untill the time that Q. Fabius and P. Decius were created Censors. Fabius to bring the City unto an uniform accord, and to withstand this inconvenience, that the Elections of Magistrats should not be carried away by the strong hand of the vilest and most abject persons, made a separation of all that base rabble, and cast them into four Tribes, and called them * Vrbana. Which action of his (men say) was accepted with so great contentment and thankfulness, that upon the good temperature of degrees, he purchased the surname of Maximus, which in so many victories he had not acquired and obtained. By him also (by report) it was ordained and instituted, that on the Ides of July, the horsemen rode, as it were, in a solemn muster, and shewing their great horses to the Censor.

* Tribes of the City such as were born to no lands in the country: all the rest were named Rusticae.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the Tenth Book.

Two Colonies were planted in Sora and Alba. The maritians of Carseola, were reduced under obedience. The fellowship of the Augurs was augmented to the number of nine, whereas before they were wont to be but four. The law or edict as touching the appealing to the people, was now the third time proposed by Valerius the Consul. Two Tribes more were added to the rest, Anienfis and Terentina. War was denounced against the Samnits, and fortunately fought with them. What time as there was a battell given to the Tuscans, Umbrians, Samnits and Gauls, under the conduct of P. Decius, and Quintus Fabius, and the Roman army was in great extremity of danger, P. Decius following the example of his father, devoted and exposed himselfe to die voluntarily, for to save the host: and by his death obtained the victory of that journey, to his countrymen and fellow Citizens. Papirius Cursor put to flight an army of the Samnits, who were bound by a solemn oath not to depart out of the battel without victory, to the end, that with more magnanimity and resolution, they should enter into the field. The Cense was held, and the number taken of the Citizens, with the solemn purging and Lustration of the City. And assessed there were 262322 polls.

The Tenth Book of T. Livius.

When L. Genutius and Ser. Cornelius were Consuls, there was rest in a manner from all wars abroad; in such sort, as they had leisure to place certaine Colonies at Sora and Alba: And for Alba there were enrolled 6000 inhabitants, to affront the Equians. As for Sora, it had sometimes belonged to the Volscians territory; but the Samnits usurped the possession of it, and thither four thousand were sent to inhabit. The same year, the Arpinats and Trebulans were enfranchised denizens at Rome. The Frusinats were fined with the losse of one third part of their lands: for they were evidently detected to have solicited the Hernicks to rebellion; and after that the Consuls Commission from the Senat, had made due inquisition, the principall heads of that conspiracy, were scourged and beheaded, yet because there should not pass a year clean without war, a journey was made (such a one as it was) into Umbria; upon news, that there used to issue forth day by day, certain men in arms out of a cave, and to make rodes into the country about. Into this cave or peak, the Romans entred with their ensignes displayed: where by reason that it was a blind corner, they received many a wound, and specially by throwing of stones

A Stones: untill such time as they found the other mouth of the cave (for it was a thorough-fare.) So they piled a deal of wood together at both ends, and set it on fire: with the smoke and vapour whereof, there were about 2000 armed men driven out of their hole, who rushing at last into the flame, desirous to escape, were smothered and burnt to ashes.

When as M. Livius Dentatus and C. Aemilius were Consuls, the Equians began to war again: for they hardly could abide and endure, that a Colony should be planted upon their borders, as a frontier-fortress to bridle them, and assailed by all kind of force to win the same: but they were lustily repulsed by the Inhabitants only within the town. Howbeit, such a fear they made at Rome, because it was not thought credible, that the Equians alone of themselves, so distressed as they were, would be so hardy as to take arms, that in regard of that trouble, a Dictator was named, to wit, C. Junius Bubulcus, with T. Titinius General of the horse. Who at the first conflict subdued the Equians, and upon the eighth day of his government returned into the City in triumph: and now the Dictator, dedicated the Temple of Salus, which he had vowed being Consul, and had put out to workmen for to be builded, while he was Censor.

The same year a fleet of Greeks, under the conduct of Cleonymus a Lacedæmonian, arrived upon the coast of Italy, and won Thuria, a City of the Salentines. Against this enemy was the Consul Aemilius sent, who in one battel discomfited him, and drove him aboard. Thus Thuria was rendred again to the former Inhabitants, and the Salentine Country obtained peace and quietness. I find in some Records, that it was Jun. Bubulcus the Dictator who was sent to the Salentines: and that Cleonymus before he was to encounter with the Romans, departed out of Italy. From thence he fetched a compass, and doubled the point of Brundisium, and sailed with a fore-wind through the midst of Venice gulph: for that on the left hand the Havenless and harbourless coasts of Italy, and on the right, the Illyrians, Liburnians, and Istrians, fierce nations, and for the most part, reputed infamous, for roving and robbing by the sea-side, put him in exceeding fear. So he arrived at length upon the river of Venice, lying far within the shore, and there he landed a few to discover the Coasts: but hearing that the strand that lay out against them was not broad and spacious, and when they were past over it, there were behind them the plashes (as it were) overflowed with the sea-tides, and that not far off might be seen the champion fields near hand, and hills beyond: and discovering by this means the mouth of a very deep river, into which he saw,

D that the ships might be brought about as into a safe harbour (now that rivers name was Medusæus) thither he commanded, that the Armada should put in, and to make sail up against the stream. The heaviest vessels, the chanel of the river would not bear: but the souldiers were transported in lighter barks and small pinaces, and so fell at length with the levell and the plain Country, frequented with much people, by reason that three sea-towns of the Patavins, inhabited that Territory. Being once landed, and having left a slender guard for their ships, they take Towns by assault, burnt houses, plunder and drive away prizes both of men and cattell: and when they had once tasted of the sweetness of booty and pillage, they went far from their ships. The allarme hereof was given at Patavium (now the Patavins were alwaies in arms, because of the Gauls their borderers.) Whereupon they divided their fighting youth into two regiments: the one was led in-

E to those quarters whereas the report went, that the Greeks foraged here and there all abroad: the other, because they would not meet with the robbers and rovers, was conducted another way to the harbour, where the ships rid (about fourteen miles from the Town. And after they had slain the warders, they charged upon the small barks. Whereupon the mariners were afraid, and were forced to retire their vessels to the other bank-side. Likewise upon the main they sped as well in fight against the stragling rovers: for when as the Greeks fled back to recover the harbour, the Venerians encountred them afront, and made head against them. So the enemies were environed in the midst, and most of them slain: some that were taken prisoners, bewrayed what their fleet was, and that King Cleonymus was three miles off. There, when they had bestowed the prisoners sure enough in ward within the next village; some man with souldiers of their river-vessels, made fitly and framed with flat bottoms, for to pass over the meers and shallow washes; others embark armed men in the small gallions taken from the enemies, and made way apace to give an assault upon the main fleet, and beset those ships which rid at anchor, and durst not weigh and remove, fearing not the enemy, so much as the unknown coasts. These, I say, they environed, and charged upon them: and when they made haste to gain the deep and open sea, without any resistance at all, they were pursued and chased unto the mouth of the river. Thus when they had taken the enemies ships, and fired others, namely, such as for fear and haste were driven upon the shelves, and run a-ground, they returned with victory. Cleonymus hardly saved the fifth part of his fleet. And thus having had no good luck in attempting to land in any coast of the Adriatick sea, he departed. The stems of the ships, with their beak-heads, and brazen pikes, together with the spoils of the Lacedæmonians, were set up in the old Temple of Juno, and there be many at this day alive, which have seen them. The memoriall of this sea-fight, is celebrated yearly (upon the very same day that it was fought) at Patavium, with a solemn skirmish and combate of ships represented upon the river, within the midst of the City.

The same year was a League made at Rome with the Vettins, who came to sue for peace and amity. But from that time, there arose many and divers fearfull occurrents. For news came, that that Hetruria rebelled, which troubles took their beginning by occasion of the civil dissension and discord of the Arcins: who began to expell by force of arms the house and family of the Licinii (mighty and puissant above the rest) for very envy and repine of their wealth and riches. Over and besides, the Marfians stood out, and by arms maintained their title to that part of their territory, into which there had been a Colony of Carfcolans brought, to the number of four thousand men, enrolled there to inhabit. Against which stir and tumults, Marcus Fulvius Maximus was created Dictator, who made choice of M. Emilius Paulus to be the Commander of the Horse. Which I rather believe to be true, than that Q. Fabius, a man of those years and that worth, after so many honourable dignities, should be under Valerius. But I would not deny, that the error might grow by reason of the surname of Maximus. The Dictator having taken the field with his Army, in one battell discomfited the Marfians; and after he had driven them into their walled and fenced Towns, Milenniana, Plesina, and Fresilia; within few daies, he won them also over their heads: and having fined the Marfians with the loss of some part of their Territory, he received them into their ancient League again. Then all the forces were employed against the Tuscans; and whiles the Dictator was departed to Rome to take his Auspices anew, the General of Horse, being gone out a foraging, was by a secret ambush entrapped. And having lost certain ensignes, he was forced into the Camp, after a foul slaughter and shameful flight of his men, which fearfull cowardice is not like to have been in Fabius, not only, because if ever he deserved his surname of Maximus by any commendable parts, it was especially for his prowels in war: but also, for that in remembrance of Papyrus his cruelty toward him, he never could have been brought to fight, without the commandment or permission of the Dictator. This discomfite and loss being reported at Rome, caused a greater terrour than there was cause. For no less than if the Army had been utterly defeated, there was published and proclaimed a stay and cessation of all law-matters, warders bestowed at the gates, order taken for standing watches in every street, and armour and darts carried up to the walls. And after that all the younger sort were sworn and prest to serve the Dictator was sent again to the Army. Where, he found all more quiet than he looked for, through the carefull diligence of the General of Horse. The Camp was removed to a place of more strength and safety, the bands and companies which had lost their ensignes, left on the bare earth without the rampiers, destitute of tents and covert: and the army eager and desirous of fight, to do away and rale out the former ignominy and shame. Presently therefore, he raised his Camp, and removed forward into the country of Rasella. Thither followed the enemies also hard at heels; Who albeit, upon their late good speed, they were in right great hope and affiance, to be strong enough even in open fight and plain field; yet they assailed the enemy also by the same sleights and trains which they had already fortunately tried. There fortuned to be in the country thereabout, not far from the Romans Camp, certain houses half pulled down and ruinate, belonging to a village which was burned when the country was over-run: where, after they had bestowed closely certain men in arms, they drave their beasts and cattel in the very sight of the Roman corps de guard, commanded by G. Fulvius, a Lieutenant: at which haire, when as there stirred no man from the Roman wards, one of the Heardmen advanced even under the very trench and fortifications of the Romans, and called aloud to the rest (that seemed for fear to drive but slowly from the ruins of the village aforesaid) asking why they staid behind, seeing they might safely march, and pass forward still (as it were) through the middle of the Roman Camp? These words certain Carits interpreted to the Lieutenant Fulvius. Whereat, every band or company of souldiers took great indignation, but durst not stir a foot without a warrant. Then he commanded those that were skilfull in the tongue to mark whether their language sounded neerer to the speech of peasants or to Citizens: Who brought word, that both their voice, and also the habit and fresh hue of their bodies, was more elegant and civill than for country shepherds. Go your waies then (quoth he) unto them and bid them beware and discover their ambush, which in vain they seem to hide: for that the Romans were cunning in all things, and advertised of their designs, and could no more now be overtaken with wiles, than overcome by arms. When these words were once heard and carried to those that lay in wait, presently they start up out of their lurking holes, and brought forth their ensignes all abroad into the open field. The Lieutenant supposing they were a greater troop than might be dealt withall and marched by his corps de guard, with all speed sent for aid to the Dictator: and in the mean while himself received and bare off the brunt and forcible charge of his enemies. This message was no sooner brought, but the Dictator commanded the standards to be advanced, and the souldiers to arm and follow: but every thing was done sooner almost than it could be commanded: forthwith they caught up the ensignes, and took weapon in hand: and scarcely could they be held in, but that they would run amain. For not only the pitiful anger of the late received loss pricked them on, but also the shouts of their fellows, which they might hear more loud, and to be redoubled thicker, according as the skirmish grew hotter and hotter. The greater haste therefore they made, whiles one putteth forward another, and crieth to the port-ensignes to go faster and mend their pace. But the more haste the Dictator seeth them to make, the more earnest was he to keep them back in their march, and to hold them in; willing them to go fair and softly. Contrariwise the Tuscans, who rose up at the beginning of the battell, were there ready with their whole forces to give the charge. Whereupon there came messenger after messenger to the Dictator, bringing word that all the

A legions of the Tuscans were entered into the fight, and that his men already were not able to fight any longer. Nay himself also, from the higher ground, might see in what danger the corpus of Panfa was. But presuming and resting upon this conceit, that the Lieutenant was able yet to maintain fight, considering that he was not far off himself to help and save him out of perill he was desirous that the enemies might be wearied and tired as much as was possible, and that his own forces fresh and in heart, should set upon them over-tired. And albeit they went softly forward, yet by this time had the Horsemen but a very small ground to take theib on with full career. For most marched the ensigns of his legions, that the enemy should not see any covert and privy stratagem, but leave good spaces and distances between the files of their footmen, through which the Horses might have room and liberty enough to gallop with ease. Then all the battallion of the Infantry set up a cry and shout when they charged, and wished the Cavalry, with reins at large entered within the ranks of the enemies, who being not marshalled and set in order against such a blustering storm of Horsemen, were with a sudden fear astonished. Whereupon, the troop of Fulvius which erewhile was in manner environed and compassed about, and had help and rescue almost too late, now all in general breathed themselves at ease, and were put to nothing. For their chief came fresh and lusty, undertook the whole weight of the conflict: which was neither long nor doubtful. The enemies were put to flight, and in disaray made hast to recover their camp. And when as the Romans advanced against them with battal displayed, they quit their place and retreated, gathering themselves round about heaps in the farthest part of the camp: and as they would have fled out, they stuck fast in the narrow gaps and passages of the gates: a great part of them leapt upon the banck, to climb the rampier, if haply either from the higher ground they might defend themselves, or get over any where and escape. By chance in one place where the banck was not well rammed, the rampier was surcharged with the weight of so many standing upon it, and so tumbled down into the trench. Whereupon, they set up a cry all together, That the Gods had made them way to escape, and by that means indeed they saved themselves, but more of them unarmed than armed. In this batel, were the forces of the Tuscans once again utterly abated: in so much as after they had capitulated and promised a years pay, and corn for two months, the Dictator permitted them to send Embassadors to Rome for a treaty of peace. Peace was denied, but truce for two years granted: and the Dictator with triumph returned into the City. I find in some writers, that Hetruria was by the Dictator quiered, without any notable batel, only by composing the variance and debate of the Aretins, and reconciling the unity of the Licinis with the Commons.

M. Valerius upon his Dictatorship became Consul. Some have believed that he was created without his own suit, yea, and while he was absent, and that the said Election was held by the Interregent. But howsoever it was, out of all question, he bare the Consulship with Apuleius Panfa. Whiles M. Valerius and Q. Apuleius were Consuls, all was well quiered abroad: for the Tuscans of one side, partly upon their ill success in war and partly by reason of their truce, were forced to be still and in repose. The Samnits also on the other side, being well tamed with the overthrowes so many years together, repented not yet, and were not weary of their new league. At Rome likewise the Commons were quiet, and found themselves much eased, and discharged of a great number of base and poor people, which were withdrawn and sent away into Colonies. But because their rest should not be every where entire and perfect, there arose a quarrel between the chief and principal men of the City, as well the Nobles as Commons, and that by the suggestion and instigation of Q. and Cn. Ogulnius, Tribuns of the Com. Who having sought occasion and matter every way to accuse and blame the Nobility unto the Commons: when they saw all means assayed in vain, at length entered into an action, whereby they kindled and set on fire not only the meanness, but even the chief heads of the Commons, such as had been Consuls, and triumphed: who wanted no promotions and honors, but only Sacerdotal dignities and Prelacies, which as yet were not indifferently common to both States. They proposed therefore a Law, That whereas at that time there were but 4. Augurs, and as many Prelats or Bishops, and for asmuch as they thought it good, that the number of Priests should be increased, there might be chosen to the rest, 4. Bishops, and 5. Augurs, all out of the body of the Commons. But how this Colledge or Fellowship of Augurs, was reduced to the number of four, huddy the death of two, I can not find: since this is certain, that among the Augurs the number must be odd: namely that the three ancient tribes, Rhamneses, Titieses, and Luceres, should have each one their Augur: or if they needed more, they should with equal number increase those Priests, like as they were augmented and multiplied: when as five being put to four, made up the number of nine: that is to say, for every tribe three. Howbeit, because they were chosen out of the Commons, who should supply, and make up the number, the Nobles took it as grievously to the heart, as when they saw the Consulship parted equally in common: but they made semblance as though this indignity pertained to the Gods more than to them: who would themselves see, that their holy service and sacred mysteries should not be polluted. And as for them, this only they could do, namely pray and wish, that no calamity thereby should light upon the common-weal. But less earnest were they in opposing themselves and making resistance, for that they were used already in all such broils and contentions to have the worse: and they saw besides, that their adversaries shot not at that (which in time past they could scarce hope for) namely, the greatest honours and dignities: but that they had already obtained all, for which they had strived so long in so doubtful terms of hope, to wit, manifold Consulats, Claudius.

Censorships, and Triumphs. Howbeit, the contention and dispute in debating and arguing to and fro the law proposed, was maintained (as men say) between Ap. Claudius especially, and *P.
Decius Mus*; and after they had contested and discounted in their Orations pro & contra, the same reasons in manner, touching the rights and liberties pretended by the Nobles and Commons, which sometimes had been alleged, both for, and against the law Licinia, at what time as as it was set on foot for the Commons to be Consuls: Decius (as it is said) represented in open audience the very resemblance and shew of his father, in such manner, as many of them who were then present at the assembly, had seen him: to wit, girded and apparelled in Sabine robe, standing over his javelin, in which gesture, habit, and fashion, he offered himself to voluntary death, for to save the people and legions of the Romans: "Seemed (quoth he) P. Decius, that then was God, as pure and religious in the fight of the immortal Gods, as if T. Manlius his colleague had been likewise devowed and offered: and might not the same P. Decius have rightly been chosen, to execute the publick divine service and sacrifices of the people of Rome? or is this all the fear and doubt, that the Gods would giveless ear to his prayers, than to Ap. Claudius? or doth Ap. Claudius with more devotion serve God privately, and worship the Gods more religiously, than himself? Who was there ever that repented or misliked of the vows, which so many Consuls and Dictators of the Com. either at their first setting forth to their armies, or in time of war and battel, pronounced for the Common-wealth? Reckon and count the chief Captains, year by year, since the first time that the Commons began to have the leading and conduct of the wars: number all the triumphs ever since: it will appear that the Commons are no whit abashed, and have no cause to complain of their own nobility. And this I know for certain, that if any new sudden war should arise, the Senat and people of Rome would repose no more hope and confidence in the ancient Patritii, than in the Com. for to be the Captains and Commanders. This being so, quoth he, what God or man can think it an indignity, to adorn those persons also with the titles and ornaments of Bishops and Augurs, whom ye have honoured with chair of Ivory, with the long robe bordered with purple, with the coat of arms embroidred and branched with the palm tree, with the gown or mantle of purple, wrought with divers colours, with the chaplets and coronets of triumph, and with the victorious branch and garland of lawrel: whose houses ye have beautified above the rest, with setting up the spoils of enemies? Or who can thinck much, if he be seen with a sacring cup, or holy-water pot, and with a crossier staff, and his head veiled, either to kill a sacrifice, or to take Augury by flight of birds from the castle hill: who hath been adorned and decked with the ensignes and ornaments of the great God Jupiter, and hath ridden in a gilded chariot through the City into the Capitol? Or in whose Title, inscription and stile over his image, men shall with content, read Consulship, Censorship, and Triumph: will not the same abide to see and read that ye have added thereunto either Augurship, or Pontifical dignity? I verily for my part hope (without the displeasure, and with reverence of the Gods be it spoken) that we by the beneficence of the people of Rome are such, as for our quality and worthineis, may and will yeeld no less credit and honor to our Priest-hoods, than we shall receive thereby: and who desire, in regard of the honor and service of God, more than for our own sakes and proper interests, to have the means, That whom we serve and reverence in private, those we may also worship and honor publicly. But why have I hitherto so pleaded the cause, as if the Patritii were entirely alone intituled and invested in the prerogative of Sacerdotal Dignities; and as though we were not already possessed of one right honorable and principal Priest-hood? We see that the Decemvirs for celebration of sacrifices, and for interpretation of Sibylla her Prophecies, and other the fatal destinies of this people, the Prelats also and Ministers of Apollo his sacrifice, and other Holy Ceremonies, are of the Commons. Neither was there any injury done unto the Patritii at that time, when for to gratify the Commons, the number of the Duumvirs was increased; those I mean, who should oversee (as superintendents) the offering of sacrifices. And now at this present they have no greater cause to complain, if the Tribun, a stout and brave man, hath added five places more of Augurs, and four of Bishops, unto which commoners may be nominated: not to dispossess you of your rooms, or to displace you, O Appius, but that men of the commons might assist you in the function and ministry of divine service and Church matters: like as they do their part, and perform good service in human and civil affairs. And be not ashamed, O Appius, to have him for your colleague in the Priest-hood, whom you might beserm to have in Consulat or Censorship, your companion and fellow; unto whom being Dictator, you might be Collonel of Horse; as well as he to you in your Dictatorship. Those ancient Nobles in old time (our progenitors) admitted into their number and order, a Sabine stranger, the very head and top of your nobility, one Ap. Clausus, or *Ap.
Claudius* (chose you whether.) You must not thinck much then, to accept us into the number of Priests. We bring with us many honorable titles, even all the same that make you so proud, and to bear your head aloft. L. Sextius was the first Commoner, created Consul; and C. Licinius Stolo the first Collonel of Horse. C. Rutilius was the first Dictator and Censor, and Q. Publius Philo the first Prator. We have heard this song evermore sounding in our ears, That to you alone pertaineth the taking of Auspicia: that you only are of noble descent and gentility: that ye and none but ye, by right and duty ought to manage the affairs, and the sovereign government, both at home and abroad: and yet alwayes hitherto the commons in their places and charges, have done and sped as well as the Patritii, and henceforth ever shall (I doubt not.) What? heard ye never

A it spoken, that the Patritii were at first made and created, and not descended from Heaven: but such as were able to name their father and grandfire: that is to say, even free men just, and no more? What? I my self can nominate already mine own father to have been a Consul, and shortly shall my son be able to alledge his grandfire. There is nothing else, O Quirites, in the matter whereupon we stand, but that we may obtain all which hath been denied us. For the Nobles desire only to maintain a side and to contend; and care not greatly what issue their contentions come unto. As for me, I do advise, and this would I have, That (to the good profit, and happy estate of you all, and the weal publicly) this law may pass under your affirmative voyce [Uis rogat]. Then presently the people commanded the Tribes to be called to a scrutiny: and soon it appeared, that the law would without all doubt be accepted: but that day was lost, by the opposition and negative of some Tribuns. Howbeit, the morrow after, they were afraid to cross it: and then with exceeding consent of all hands it passed cleer. So there were created Prelats or Bishops; first, P. Decius Mus himself (that so pleaded for the law) with P. Sempronius Sophus, C. Martius Rutilius, and M. Livius Dentus. Likewise five Augurs of the Commons, to wit, C. Genutius, P. Aelius Paetus, M. Minutius Festus, C. Martius, and J. Publius. So there were eight Prelats in number, and nine Augurs.

The same year, M. Valerius the Consul, procured the law of appealing to the people, more surely to be established and confirmed. This was now the third time after the deposition of the Kings, that this one Act was revived; and alwayes by the same house or family of the Valerii. The cause of renewing the same so often, was no other I suppose, than this; for that the mightiness of some few great men of the Patritii, was more powerful than the liberty and freedom of the Commons. Only the Law Portia, seemeth to have been enacted for to save the back and sides of Citizens from whipping, because that it awarded and set a grievous punishment upon him, that either had beaten or killed a Citizen of Rome. The Law Valeria, which forbade, to scourge or behead any man whosoever, that made his appeal, had this annexed only, that if any one had trespassed and proceeded farther, it should be decreed, Leauidly and naughtily done. Such was the modesty and reverence of men in those dayes, that this one addition [in my conceit verily] was supposed to be a sufficient bond to strengthen the Law. But now adayes, would a man scarcely threaten his servant or slave in that manner.

D The same Consul made war, without any worthy or memorable exploit, against the Aequians that rebelled; who (setting aside their stout and proud stomachs) had nothing left of their ancient fortune and estate. The other Coss. Apuleius, besieged the Town * Nequinum in Umbria. The place was difficult and hard to get up, and on the one side steep down right (whereas now standeth Narnia) so that it was impregnable, either by assault, or countermines and sconces whatsoever. Whereupon, the new Consuls, M. Fulvius Patrus, and T. Manlius Torquatus, entered upon this enterprise, left undone and unfinished by the former. Now when all the Centuries nominated with one voyce Q. Fabius for the Consulship of that year, even without his own suit and seeking; Macer Licinius and Tuvero do write, that he himself laboured to have that charge put off, and reserved unto a year of more war: alledging, that for the present he would serve the Common-weal in better stead, by bearing some civil office in the City: and so neither dissembling what he rather desired, nor yet seeking for it, he was made Aedile of the Chair, with L. Papirius Curfor. But, to set this down for a certain truth I dare not; because that Piso, a more ancient Writer of Chronicles, saith, that the Aediles Curule of that year, were C. Domitius, Cn. F. Calpurnius, Sp. Carvilius, and Q. Fabius Maximus. That surname, I suppose verily, gave occasion of the error in the Aediles. Whereupon ensued a tale (sorting to that error) mixed and compounded of the Elections of Aediles and Consuls together. The same year was held a solemn survey and purging of the City by sacrifice, called Lustrum, by P. Sempronius Sophus, and P. Sulpitius Avernus; and two Tribes more were added to the rest, Aniensis, and Tarentina. And thus much concerning the affairs at Rome.

F But now to return to Nequinum; after much time spent in long and lingering siege before the Town two of the inhabitants, whose houses joyned close to the wall, undermined the ground, and by a secret way came as far as the corps de guard of the Romans. From whence they were brought before the Consul, and promised him to let in and receive what garrison and troop of armed men he would, within the City. This offer was thought neither to be neglected and refused, nor yet rashly to be credited. So with the one of these twain (for the other was kept behind as an hostage) two other spies were sent by the same mine to discover the train. By whose relation, when it appeared sufficiently, that all was safe and without danger: by the leading and guiding of the traitor aforesaid, 300 armed men, by night entered the City, & seized that gate which was next unto them: at which, being broken open, the Consul and the Roman army without resistance, made entry, and surprised the City. In this sort Nequinum was reduced to the obedience of the people of Rome. A Colony was thither sent to Frontier against the Umbrians, called of the Rivers name [which runneth under it] * Narnia. And the army with a rich prize was brought again to Rome.

The same year the Tuscans, contrary to the tenure of the truce, made preparation for war. But whilst they were busily occupied otherwise, it fortune, that a puissant army of Gauls invaded their marches, and for a while altered their designments. Afterwards, by the means of money, whereof they were full and bare themselves mighty, they sought to make the Gauls, of enemies to become their friends, and solicited them to band together, and so jointly to maintain tain war with the Romans. Their society and friendship the barbarous people refused not; only, they stood upon the sum what they should have for their hire. Which being agreed upon and received, and all things else in a readiness for to go into the field; when the Tuscans willed them to follow after, they flatly denied, that they had received any consideration for to make war upon the Romans: but whatsoever they had taken, it was because they should not wait the Tuscan Land, and by way of hostility and force of arms, do any violence upon the inhabitants: howbeit, if the Tuscans were so minded to employ them, they would be willing to serve, but for no other reward and recompence, than to be admitted into part of their territory; that at the length they might have some certain place of abode, to settle themselves in. Many Diets and consultations hereabout were held by the States of Tuscan, but nothing resolved and concluded: not so much, for that they feared to part with some of their Lands, as because they were in great dread every one and abhorred, to have dwelling by them such neighbours, descended from so savage a race and cruel Nation. Thus were the Gauls let go and dismissed, having away with them a huge mass of money, which they got without any travel or peril of theirs.

The bruit of the Gauls tumult and insurrection, together with the Tuscans war, caused no little fear at Rome. Whereupon, more hast was made to conclude a league with the * Picene people. T. Manlius the Consul had the charge of the Tuscan war allotted unto him. Who scarcely was entred into the confines of the enemies, but as he was training and exercising amongst the Horsemen, he ran his Horse with full career, and suddenly as he turned about, was cast off, and presently lay for dead: and so the Consul, three dayes after his fall, ended his life. Which the Tuscans taking hold of, as a good ominous token and presage, got heart and were very jolly; saying, that the Gods had in favour of them, begun this war. This was heavy news at Rome, both for the loss of so brave a personage, and for the time, wherein so unhappily it fell out: so as, the assembly held (by the advice of the chief Peers) for to substitute a Consul in his place that was deceased, frightened the Senators from chusing a Dictator. All their sentences, and all the centuries gave with M. Valerius to be Consul: who was the man, whom the Senat was about to have pricked for Dictator. Then forthwith, they ordained him to go into Tuscany to the army. Whose coming suppressed and kept under the Tuscans: so as not a man durst once go out of their trenches and hold. Even their very fear was as good as a siege unto them: for that the new Consul neither by wasting the fields, nor firing their houses in such sort, as every where, not only the small villages, but also the good and well-peopled Towns were seen to smoke and burn again, could draw them forth to fight.

This war continued longer than men thought: but behold, there arose a bruit of another; (which, considering the mutual losses of both sides, was for good causes greatly to be feared) upon intelligence given from the Picenes their new allies, namely, that the Samnites were about to take arms and rebel, and had solicited them also to do the same. The Picentes were highly thanked for this, and a great part of the Senators care was diverted now from Tuscany to the Samnites. The dearth besides, of corn and victuals troubled the City: and driven they had been to extreme famine, if Fabius Maximus (as they have written, who are of opinion that he was Ædile that year) by provident purveying and diligent conveying of corn, had not been as careful and industrious, in the dispensing of victual now at home, as many times before in war affairs. The same year there was an Interreign, but upon what occasion, it is not known. The Interregents were App. Claudius, and after him P. Sulpitius, who held an Election of Consuls, and created L. Cornelius Scipio, and Cn. Fulvius.

In the beginning of this year, there came Orators from the Lucans to these new Consuls, for to make complaint, That the Samnites, who by no conditions and means could induce them for to band and take arms with them, were entred into their confines, and made wast of the country, and by very force provoked them to war, saying, That the Lucans had long ago over-shot and passed themselves that way: but now they were so fully resolute, that they could find in their hearts, sooner to abide and endure all kind of calamity whatsoever, than ever after to offend and displease the Roman name. They besought the Senat therefore, to receive the Lucans into their protection, and also to keep and defend them from the violence and injury of the Samnites. And for themselves, albeit entering into war already with the Samnites, they were of necessity obliged to be fast and true unto the Romans: yet for better security they were ready to put in sufficient hostages. The Senat was not long consulting hereabout: but all with one consent were of opinion, to make league with the Lucans, and to summon the Samnites to make amends and restitution. The Lucans, besides a courteous and gracious answer, were accepted into the league. Then were there Fecial Heralds dispatched to the Samnites, to give them warning for to depart the territory of the Roman allies, and to withdraw their forces out of the confines of the Lucans. But the Samnites sent out certain messengers to meet them upon the way, and to denounce unto them, that if they presented themselves in any Council within Samnium, they should not depart again with safeguard of their persons. When these news were heard at Rome, both the Senat advised, and the people allowed, to make war upon the Samnites. The Consuls parted their Provinces and charges between themselves. To Scipio fell Hetruria, and the Samnites to Fulvius: and so they take their journey divers wayes, each one to the war allotted unto him. Scipio looked for no other, but a lingering war at the enemies hands, and like to the defensive service of the former year: but behold, they with an army well appointed and arranged,

A arranged, encountered him and gave him battle near to * Volaterra: where they fought the better * Volterra, part of the day, with much bloodshed on both sides: and whilst they were doubtful which way the victory went, the night came between. But the morning after bewrayed both who were winners, and who were losers. For the Tuscans in the still and dead time of the night dislodged. The Roman Consul coming forth into the field, and seeing by the enemies departure, the victory confessed; went forward to the camp: which he found empty of men, but full of rich pillage, (for they had fearfully and in great haste abandoned their tents) and was master thereof. From thence he retired his forces into the territory of the Faliscans: and after he had left at Falerii, all his bag and baggage with a meetly garrison there, lightly appointed, he marched forward, and with a running camp walked the marches and territories of his enemies. He put all to fire and sword: drove away booties from all parts: and left not the ground only, wast and desart, but set fire also upon Castles and borough Towns. Only he forbore to assault the great and strong Cities, into which fear had driven the Tuscans for refuge. C. Fulvius the Consul on the other part fought a noble battle in Sannium, near * Boianum, and the victory was no whit doubtful. After which he assailed Boianum, and not long after Ausidena: and both Cities he won by force. The same year was there a Colony brought to * Carseti within the territory of the Agnuculi. And Fulvius * Arceolo the Consul triumphed over the Samnites.

When as now the time of the Consuls Election drew near, there was a rumour raised, that the Tuscans and Samnites were levying and enrolling of great and mighty forces: that openly in all their C Assemblies and Diets, the Princes of the Tuscans were checked and reproved, for that they had not waged the Gauls to war, whatsoever it had cost them: that the Magistrates of the Samnites were blamed, for exposing that army as it were a prey unto the Romans, which had been provided against their enemies the Lucans. For now seeing that the enemies both with their own power, and also with the help of their allies, were come to war: they should not be able to match them, having their forces thus redoubled. Now albeit there were other famous and renowned persons stood to be Consuls, yet this new fear and affright turned all men to be come favourers of Q. Fabius Maximus: who at the first made no suit, and afterwards, seeing the inclination of their affections, refused also to be Consul. "Demanding what they meant to trouble and molest him, so "aged a man as he was, and one, who as he had gone through all labours and travels of this D "world: so he had passed also the rewards, and recompences of his travels: alledging, that neither strength of body, nor vigor of spirit could alwayes continue the same, and last for ever: and "besides, he feared fortune her self, lest haply she might be thought of any of the Gods too propitious and favourable unto him, and more permanent than the ordinary train and course of "this world would permit. Therefore, like as himself had grown up after the glory of his elders, "and succeeded them, so he saw and beheld with joy of heart, others also rising up after him, and "to succeed him in the like glory: and as there wanted not at Rome high promotions and advancements for hardy and valiant men, so there failed not brave men of worth for to receive those "honors and dignities. But by this refusal of his so modest, so just and reasonable he whetted and kindled more and more their earnest affections and favours towards him, which he thinking to

E dull and quench, with the reverent regard and awe of the laws, commanded a statute to be read, wherein it was not lawful for one and the same man within ten years to be created Consul twice. But scarcely for the noise that the people made could this law be heard read: and the Tribunes of the Com. said, that this should be no law: for they would prefer a bill unto the people, that he might be discharged and dispensed with, from the Statutes in that behalf. Howbeit he stood stiffly still in his refusal, demanding of them to what purpose and end were the laws made, if by the very makers thereof, they might be thus deluded and made of no force? For so (quoth he) laws ruled nor, but were over-ruled. But even he, lest the people went to a minority and began to give their voices: and as every Century was called into the rails, they named and chose Fulvius Consul, without sticking at the matter. Then at last, overcome with this general accord and consent of the F "whole City: God say Amen (quoth he) Q. Quinctius, so that you do and are about. But for as much as you will have your will and dispose of me at your pleasure, do me this favour yet, that I may have the chusing of my Colleague. He seach you make Consul with me; P. Decius a man approved unto me already, with whom I have sortted well in the fellowship of another office: a man I say, an worthy otherwise to the greatness of his name, and worthy of his fathers vertue, from whom he is descended. This favour which he requested, seemed unto them just and reasonable. So all the Centuries behind, created Q. Fabius and P. Decius for Consuls.

The same year the Ediles served process upon very many Citizens: for holding and possessing of more Lands, than by Law was limited: and none in a manner was able to acquit himself hereof. Which was a great bridle and restraint to their unmeasurable avarice. As the G new Consuls, Q. Fabius Maximus the fourth time, and P. Decius Mus the third time, conferred and laid their heads together about their charges, that the one should take in hand the Samnites, and the other the Tuscans; and consulted what forces might serve and be sufficient for this or that Province and exploit; and to whether war either of them were the more meet and sufficient Leader: certain Embassadors, from Capitium, Nepes, and Falerii, advertised them. That the States of Tuscany, were now consulting in their Diets, about a Treaty of peace: which was an occasion, that they turned all their preparations and forces into Sannium. The Consuls being gone forth, to the end they might have the readier provision of grain and

Visuals, and the enemy be more to seek; which way they would assail them, led their Legions into Samnium: Fabius, through the territory of Sorani and Drusi by the way of the Sidicini. When they were come into the confines of their enemies, both of them spied themselves all abroad, and fell to forrage and spoil the country: yet so, as they sent out their spies farther than they waited. Whereupon, they were well aware of their enemies, as they lay in ambush well appointed, with in a close and secret valley near Tifernum: what way as they thought to take the vantage of the higher ground; and to set upon the Romans so soon as they were once entered in. Fabius having removed his carriages into a sure place, and set there a competent guard for defence, fore-told his souldiers that there was a battel towards: and in a four-square battallion marched directly to the forlaid Embascado, where the enemies lurked and lay in wait. The Samnites then, despairing and out of all hope to do any great exploit, by sudden tumult, considering their trains were discovered; and seeing they must once at the length come to the tryal in open field, were themselves also more willing to put all upon a set battel. Thereupon they descended into the plain and even ground, and committed themselves to the fortune of fight, with more courage of heart than hope of victory. But were it, that they had assembled together the whole flour and manhood out of all the Nations of the Samnites, or that the hazard of the main chace made them more hardy and take the better heart: surely even in plain field, they held the Romans play and put them to great fear. Fabius seeing the enemies no way to retreat and give ground, commanded M. Flavins and M. Valerius, two Colonels, with whom he had set forward and advanced into the forefront, to go to the Horsemen; and to exhort them, If ever they remembered and called to mind, that the Common-wealth had been helped by the valour of the Gentlemen on horseback, they should that day endeavour to make invincible and eternal the glory of that degree and order of Cavalry. For seeing that the enemies stood unmoveable against the Infantry, there was no other hope but in the force of Horsemen: and here withal he called upon those two young Gentlemen, and plied both the one and the other with like courtesy, one while praising them, another while loding them with fair and large promises. But when as the assay of that force likewise, prevailed not, thinking where strength would take no place, there craft was to be tryed and practised, he caused Scipio his Lieutenant, to withdraw out of the conflict, the javeliniers of the first legion, and as closely as he could to fetch about with them, toward the next hills: and then, to march up the hill some way from the sight of the enemies; and after he had gained the top, all of a sudden to shew himself behind, and charge upon the enemies backs, whiles their faces were turned another way. Now the Horsemen, by the direction of those two Colonels, being ridden of a sudden before the standards, troubled their own fellows almost as much as the enemies. For against these troops and cornets of Horse that thus violently put forward, the Samnites battel stood unmoveable, and on no part could either be forced to retreat, or to break their array. The Horsemen when they saw this attempt to take no effect, retired themselves behind the ensignes, and departed out of the battel. Hereupon took the enemies more heart unto them; neither had the vanguard of the Romans been able to abide so long a conflict, and the violence of the enemies still encrassing, upon their own confidence, but that the second ranges in the middle ward, by the Consul his commandment, came forward into the front of the vanguard. Where they with their fresh strength, stayed the Samnites, being now ready to enter forceably upon them, and to gain the ground: and withal, at the time appointed, the ensignes shewed themselves from the hills, and came down unaware to the enemies: and setting up a shout, not only daunted the hearts of the Samnites, but also encouraged the Romans. For both Fabius cried aloud, that his Colleague Decius approached, and every souldier for his part, what he might, with joyful and cheerful hearts, iterated, that the other Consul was come, and the legions were at hand. Which error and mistaking, as it turned to the good of the Romans, so it caused the Samnites to flie, and to be surprized with a fright, fearing and doubting nothing so much, as that being now overtoiled and wearied, they should be overcharged also with fresh and lusty forces. And for that in their running every way, they were scattered asunder, there was less slaughter than for the preparation of so great a victory. For 3400 N only were slain, and of prisoners were taken, whereof three hundred and thirty: and three and twenty honours and ensignes won and carried away. The Apulians had joyned with the Samnites before the battel, but that P. Decius the Consul encamped against them at Maleventum, and having drawn them forth to fight, discomfited them. Where also there were more that fled, than died upon the sword: for not above 2000 Apulians were slain. And Decius making no reckoning of that enemy, conducted his legions into Samnium. Where, two Consular hosts, having overrun the country in divers parts, within five months space laid all wast and desolate. Five and forty places there were in Samnium, where Decius had encamped: and eighty six, wherein the other Consul had pitched. In which, they left behind them not only the marks of stakes, rampiers, and ditches, but also many other more notable signs and tokens of the country wasted all about, and utterly spoiled by them. Pallus besides, won the City Cusula. Where there were taken prisoners two thousand and four hundred armed souldiers, and slain there were in fight upon 430 From thence he went to Rome against the Election of new Consuls, and made all the haste he could to dispatch that business. And when as all the Centuries first called forth to give their suffrages, named Q. Fabius for the Consul: then Appius Claudius a Consular man, and one of the Competitors, a grim fir, and ambitious by nature, laboured no more for his own honour and advancement,

A vancement, than to recover again unto the Patritii, both the rooms of the Consulship, and employed as well his own devoir, as also all the means and assistance of the Patritii and Nobility, to have himself chosen Consul with Q. Fabius. As for Fabius, at the first, spake and alledged in his own behalf, the same reasons in manner which he had used the former year, and refused to be Consul. The whole body of the Nobility stood about his seat, praying instantly, and entreating him to pluck the Consulship out of the mire and base degree of these Commons, and to restore the ancient Majesty both to the Magistracy itself, and also to the Patritii and their houses and families. Fabius after silence made, framed a middle and moderate kind of speech, whereby he appeased and allayed their hot affection, promising and assuring them, that he would willingly accept the names of two of the Nobility, if he might see, that they would create any other Consul but himself: for at this present Election, he would in no wise admit himself, to be eligible and nominated Consul, and give so bad a precedent to prejudice all course of law, for the time to come. So L. Volturnius, out of the body of the Commons, was created Consul with App. Claudius, who likewise in the former Consulship had been matched Colleagues together. The Nobility used to object unto Fabius, and reproached him, that he avoided App. Claudius to be his companion in government, who for eloquence and other civil parts was no doubt a singular and excellent man. When the Election was ended, the old Consuls were commanded to war in Samnium, having their Government continued, and their commission renewed for six months. And so in the year following likewise, when L. Volturnius and Appius Claudius were Consuls, P. Decius, who being Consul, had been left behind his Colleague in Samnium, ceased not now in quality and name of Proconsul, to waite the country; until at length, when the Samnites would in no place abide battle, they were by him chased out of their own borders and limits. And thus driven out of the field, and excluded out of their own country, they went into Hetruria. Where, supposing that with so huge a multitude of armed men, they should do that more effectually with intreaty and prayers, mingled with threats among which by so many Embassages they had so oft attempted in vain; they called for a Diet and general Council of the States and Princes of Hetruria. Which being assembled, they declared and shewed, for how many years space they had maintained war with the Romans in the right of their freedom; that they had assayed all means, if haply they might have been able by their own puissance alone, to sustain and support the weight of so huge and important a war: that they had besides made proof of the aids of other neighbouring nations, but to little effect; that they had sought for peace of the people of Rome, when they were not able to wage war any longer; and because peace was more grievous unto them, than their subjection, than war with their liberty, they had rebelled and made war again: and now their only hope they had, remained in the Tuscans, knowing well enough, that for men, munition, and money, they were the mightiest nation of all Italy; as having to their neighbours the Gauls, a people born and bred up in armor and war: by natural disposition fierce and cruel, but especially in any quarrel against the people of Rome; of whom they do (and not untruly report) that they were by them vanquished and constrained to ransom themselves for gold. Now, if the Tuscans were of that heart and courage, as Porcius sometimes, and other their noble progenitors were: there were no doubt, but that they might dislize the Romans, and dispossess them of all the ground on this side Tyberis, and make them fight for the defence and preservation of their lives, and not for the intolerable slavery and dominion of Italy. They said moreover, that there was now come unto them an army of Samnites, well appointed and furnished with armour, and stored with pay and money, who would follow them forthwith, even to the assault of the City of Rome, if they would lead them.

While they were thus braving, and gloriously boasting themselves, and preparing of war in Tuscany, the Romans war at their own doles, lay fore upon them, and hung them at the heels. For P. Decius, having learned by the spies, that the Samnites army was gone forth, and had taken their voyage, assembled a Council and said, What mean we thus to range over the fields, warping from village to village? And not rather assail the walled Towns and strong Cities? There is no army now that defendeth Samnium; gone they are out of their confines, and wrought their own exile and banishment. When they all had allowed of this motion, he led forth his power to assault the strong City Murratinus. And so hotly were the soldiers set, both for the love they bare to their Captain, and also for hope of winning a richer pillage thereby, than by driving booties out of the country, that in one day by mere force of arms they won the Town. Where two thousand and one hundred Samnites, fighting men, either fell upon the edge of the sword, or were taken prisoners, with a great and rich booty besides. But for fear that it should surcharge and encumber the army with heavy carriages, Decius caused his soldiers to be called together unto an audience, and thus to them he said, And will ye stand contented indeed with this victory only, and this prey? Or will ye build your hope still, answerable to your prowess and valour? All the Cities of the Samnites, all the substance and riches that both men and beasts in their Cities do yours for much as ye have in so many battles vanquished their legions, and at last driven them out of their own country. Sell these prizes, and with hope of gain draw after you chapmen and merchants to follow the army. I will from time to time still help you to sell wares and commodities for to sell. Let us go from hence straight to the City Romula, where if your toil shall not be so great, but the spoil far greater. So when they had made sale of their pillage, and willingly of themselves called upon and exhorted their Captain to that expedition, to Romulea they go. Where likewise, without mure and platform, without warlike engines of battery, so soon as they advanced their ensigns, and approached the walls, they could by no violence be driven from thence, but set up ladders in all haste, at the next place that every man could find, and so scaled up the walls. Thus the Town was won and sacked. To the number of 2300 were slain, and 6000 taken prisoners. The souldiers having got an exceeding booty, were forced to sell it, and make all away, as before: and from thence without any rest at all given unto them were they led to Ferentinum, yet they marched thither with exceeding courage and cheerfulness. Howbeit there they found more difficult and perilous service: for the walls were with all forcible means defended, and the place it self was both by mans hand, and natural situation, surely fenced: but yet the souldiers now being fleshed, and enured to spoil, overcame all difficulties. Three thousand men about the walls were slain: and the sackage fell to the souldiers share. The greatest part of the honor in assailing and winning of these Cities, is ascribed in some Chronicles to Fabius Maximus. For they write, that Murgantia was by Decius won, but Ferentinum and Romulea, by the conduct of Fabius. But some attribute the glory hereof unto the new Consuls. And there are, that give the glory not to both, but to the one of them, to wit, P. Volumnius, unto whom be fell the Province of Samnium.

Whiles these affairs thus went in Samnium (by whose leading and managing it skills not) in the mean time a mighty war was preparing in Hetruria: and that, of many nations banded together: the principal author whereof was Gellius Egnatius a Samnit. The Tuscans, in manner all, had taken arms and levied their forces, and the neer society, caused also the people of Umbria adjoining to take their part: besides, Gauls also were waged for money to aid: all which multitude assembled together, and met in the Samnits camp. The news of which sudden and unexpected tumult, being brought to Rome: for so much as P. Volumnius the Cos, with the second and third legions, and with 15000. confederats was gone already into Samnium: it was thought good and determined, that App. Claudius with all speed possible, should go into Hetruria: and after him, two Roman legions followed, to wit, the first and fourth, with twelve thousand allies: who encamped not far from the enemy. But more good was done there, in respect that they came thither betimes, (to the end that the fear of the Roman name might keep in awe certain nations in Hetruria, which already intended war) than for any exploit performed either skillfully or luckily, under the conduct of the Consul. Many skirmishes there passed in places of disadvantage, and at times inconvenient: in so much, as the enemy took more heart, and conceived greater hope every day more than other: and now it grew welbees to this point, that neither souldier could well reckon of the sufficiency of Captain, nor Captain trust upon the loyalty of the souldier. In three severall Annals I find, that Appius dispatched his letters to his fellow Consul, and sent for him out of Samnium: howbeit, I am loth to set this down, being so uncertain as it is: seeing that the very Consuls themselves of Rome, who now the second time were coupled together in one government, contested, and openly jarred about this point: whiles Appius denied flatly that he sent any script at all, and Volumnius again avouched, that he was sent for by Appius by his letters. Volumnius by this time had won three Cities in Samnium, wherein were slain three thousand enemies, and almost half so many taken prisoners: and composed besides the seditions and quarrels of the Lucans, which arose from the Commons and needy persons: and that, with the exceeding good contentment of the chief and principal personages of the country, by the means and mediation of Q. Fabius the Proconsul, who was thither sent with the old army. This done, he left Decius to wast and pill the country of the enemies, and himself with his forces marched toward his Colleague into Hetruria. Who at his first coming, was received generally with all the joy that might be. For mine own part, I suppose verily, that as Appius had good cause to carry an angry stomack with him, in case his confidence bare him witness, that he wrote not unto him: so again, if he had need of his Colleagues aid, he shewed an illiberal, unkind, and unthankful nature of his own, in that he would to dissemble, and not be known thereof. For being come forth to meet him, before they had well greeted and saluted one another, How now, quoth he, O L. Volumnius, is all well? How goes the World in Samnium? What hath moved you to abandon and leave your own charge and province, and to depart? Volumnius made answer, that in Samnium all things went well and chieft prosperously, and that himself was now come, as sent for by his letters: which if they were counterfeit, and that there were no need of him in Hetruria, he would presently turn his ensigns, and be gone. Mary, quoth he, and good leave have you: you may be gone when you will, and no man holdeth you: and ill beleeming it is, that you who per adventure are not able to wield and manage your own affairs of war, should glory thus, and make your boast that you are come hither to help others. Hereat Volumnius should reply again and say: It is well, and God send us good luck: I had rather lose my labour, than ought should have happened, whereby one Consuls army were not sufficient to deal with Hetruria. Now as the Consuls were parting asunder one from the other, the Lieutenants and Colonels of Appius his army, came and stood round about them both: Some requested their own General, that the aid of his Colleague which ought to have been accepted by them if it had been required: now that it was offered so willingly, and of his own accord, should not be refused and rejected. But he more part encountered Volumnius, as he was ready to go his way, and earnestly besought him not for any forward contention, and debate with his companion, to betray the common weal. For if any overthrow or misadventure should happen, the blame would be imputed rather to the forsaker

A "saker than the forsaken: and now things were come to this pass, that the honor or dishonor of the war in Hetruria, prove it well or ill, should fall upon L. Volturnius: for that no man would enquire of the words and language that Appius gave him, but of the fortune and success of the army: and albeit Appius had given him his farewell and passport, the weal publick and the army held him still by the sleeve, and for proof hereof, let him but make tryal of the souldiers hearts and affections. Thus with remonstrances, persuasions, and hearty prayers to the one Consul and the other, they drew them both, in manner against their wils, to parly in publick audience before the whole army. Where they grew to longer speeches and discouries, but to the same purpose and effect, as before in the hearing and presence of a few. Now when Volturnius (as having the better cause) seemed to reply, and that with good grace & words enough, against that singular eloquence of his Colleague: and that Appius in trumpling and taunting manner, gave out and said; That they were beholden to him, and might con him thank, that of a dumb and tongue-tied Consul they had one now, that was so ready and eloquent: and who in his former Consulship, and specially in the first months, could not open his mouth, and speak a word, was now of a sudden become an Orator, and able to make plausible and popular Orations: then replied Volturnius and said, "Would God, with all my heart, you rather had learned of me to fight valiantly, then I of you to speak finely: and in conclusion, he said, he would tender him an offer, which should determine and put out of all doubt, whether of them twain, were, not the better Lawyer and Orator (for at this present the Common-weal stood not in need of such) but the better warrior and Captain General. Whereas therefore, there are ii. Provinces, Hetruria and Samnium, it shal be in your choice (qd. he) to take one of them, whether you will, and I my self will with my own army, make war in the other. Then began the souldiers to cry aloud unto them, that they would jointly enter both upon the Tuscan war. Which consent and accord of theirs, when Volturnius had perceived, Forasmuch (qd. he) as I have once mistaken and misinterpreted the will of my Colleague, I will not in any case stand in doubt and be ignorant of your minds too: Let me know therefore by a shout of yours, whether you would have me tarry or depart? Whereat they set up such a note, that it gave an alarm to the enemies, and raised them out of their camp: and presently they caught their weapons up, and came forth into the field. Volturnius likewise caused the trumpets to sound, and the standards and ensigs to be brought abroad. Then Appius (as it is reported) seeing plainly, that whether he fought or fate still, the victory would be ascribed to his Colleague, stood in a hammering and suspence for a while: but afterwards fearing, lest that his own legions also would follow Volturnius, gave likewise unto his men the signal of battel, which they so instantly called for. But neither they, nor the enemies were well arranged and in good order: for both the leader of the Samnits (Gellius Egnatius) was gone a foraging abroad, with some few cohorts and bands with him: whereupon the souldiers rather of their own head, than by conduct and direction of Captains, began to charge: and also the Roman armies were not both lead forth together, nor yet had time enough to be marshalled accordingly: for Volturnius first gave the charge, before that Appius could come to encounter the enemies: whereupon, the forefronts were not equally matched together: and as if some fortune had exchanged the enemies, that they were wont to fight withal: the Tuscans presented themselves to Volturnius, and the Samnits who stayed awhile (for that their General was absent) affronted Appius. It is reported that Appius in the very heat of the skirmish, was seen in the front of the foremost ensigs, to lift up his hands to Heaven, and pray in this wise, "O Lady Bellona, if thou give us victory, and the honor of this day then, be sure, I vow here unto thee at this hour, a fair Temple. When he had thus prayed, as if the goddess had put life unto him, and animated his courage, both himself matched the valour of his Colleague, and his army answered the vertue of their Commander. For he performed the devoir and part (indeed) of a brave General. The souldiers likewise, for fear that the other army should begin the victory, endeavoured and streined all that ever they could: Whereby, they disarrayed, discomfited, and put to flight the enemies, who could not easily abide any extraordinary force and violence, more than they were wont to meet withal. And so with pressing hard upon them still that retreated, and chasing them hotly that were scattered in flight, they beat them into their camp. There, by the coming in of Gellius and the Sabellian bands, the battel for the time was freshly renewed. But when they also, within a while were discomfited, then was the camp assaulted by the conquerors. Thus while Volturnius for his part entered with banner displayed unto the very gate, and Appius ever and anon, reiterated the name of Bellona the victress, and all, to set on fire and inflame the courage of his souldiers: there was neither trench nor rampier that could hold them back. So the camp was won and sacked, and a huge pillage therein found, which was given all to the souldiers. Seven thousand and three hundred enemies were slain, 1120 taken prisoners.

During the time that both Consuls, and the whole puissance of the Romans, were thus more bent and employed in the war within Tuscany: there were new forces raised in Samnium, to wait the marches of the Roman Dominion: who taking their way through the Vestins, into Campania and the country of Faleria, drave huge prizes and booties away. And as Volturnius by great journeyes returned into Samnium (for by this time Fabius and Decius were come to an end of their prorogued government) the bruit that was blown abroad of the Samnits army and their foraging of the territory of Capua, turned him out of his way, to the defence of his allies and confederats. So soon as he was entred into the country Calenum, both he himself saw the fresh marks and tokens of great damage and desolation: and also the Calenians advertised him, that the the enemies carried with them already so excessive a prey and booty, that they were scarce able for it to march in good order, and that their Captains began openly to speak and say, that the best courie they could take, was presently to retire Sapuntum, there to leave their prizes and booties, and so to return afresh to their rodes and make new expeditions; and not to commit an army, so laden and surcharged, to the fortune and hazard of a battel. Which words, albeit they sounded much to a truth, yet he thought it meet to look better into the matter, and to build upon a slier ground, and therefore he sent certain light Horsemen, to intercept some forragers as they straggled and were scattered one from another in the fields. By whom he learned, after much questioning with them, that the enemies encamped by the river  Vulturno*, and from thence at the  third* watch, would set forward on their journey directly into Sapuntum. After he had sufficient intelligences and advertisements concerning these things, he dislodged and put himself upon his way and encamped so far from the enemies, as his approach by being too near could not be known, and yet he might be able to surprize them as they should issue in disorder out of their camp. So, a good while before day, he marched towards the enemy: and sent such as were well seen in the Oscan tongue, to listen and learn what they did. Who being intermingled with the enemies (which was an easy matter in that night garboil and confusion) they found that the ensignes were set forward, not sufficiently accompanied with armed men for defence; and that the whole pillage with the guard and convoy thereof, was now going forth, and marched carelessly like a sort of vile and base lozels, every man thinking of his own particulars and running on his own head, without consent of others, and with little or no direction and government. This was thought the meetest time to set upon them: and now it drew neer day. Whereupon he commanded the trumpets to sound the charge, and set upon the march of the enemies. The Samnits, incumbered as they were, and pestered with their booty, and few of them here and there in armour, began, some of them to double their pace and to march faster away, and drive before them the booty: some stood still, and wist not whether they were better, to go on forward, or retire again into the camp. But while they thus trifled and stayed, they were environed and surprized by the Romans: and by this time they had gotten over their rampier: much killing there was, and confusion in the camp. The Samnits, as they marched, besides that they were troubled with the assault of their enemies, were also disquieted with the sudden escape and revolt of their prisoners: who being some of them loose, looked also those that were bound: while others of them, caught up their weapons which were fastned to the packs, and being confusedly intermingled in the march, made a greater and more fearful garboil and havock, than the very battel of the enemies. And more than that, they performed one memorable and notable Act above the rest. For as Stratius Egnatius the General, went about the ranks and files encouraging the souldiers to fight, they set upon him, scattered the Horsemen asunder, that accompanied him, environed him about, and took him as he sat on Horseback, and haled him to the Roman Consul. Upon which tumult and stir, the foremost ensignes of the Samnits were called back, and the battel which in manner was done, now began afresh: yet could not they any long time resist and hold out. Slain there were about six thousand; two thousand and five hundred taken prisoners. Amongst whom, were 4 Colonels and 30 Ensigns; and (that, wherein the victors took contentment) of captives, 7000 and 400 hundred were again recovered; with an exceeding great booty which they had got from their allies: whereunto, by proclamation were called, all that could lay any claim, or pretend a right, to seize upon their own goods, and to receive the same by a day appointed. And look what parcels could not be owned or challenged by the true owner, was given away to the souldiers: who were compelled to make sale thereof, to the end, that they should not set their heart upon any thing but war.

This sackage of the territory of Capua, had raised great trouble and stir in Rome. And at the very same time also, it chanced, that there came news out of Herrugia, how that upon the withdrawing of Volturnus his forces out of those parts, all that country was up afresh in arms; that Gellius Egnatius the Samnit Captain, and the Umbrians likewise, were moved to revolt; and the Gauls also solicited with great sums of money. At this bruit the Senat being affraid, commanded an abstinence or vacation of term, and that all sorts of men should be mustered: and not only the free born natural citizens, and the flower of the youth were prest and sworn, but certain  companies* also of the elder sort, yea, and bands of Libertins newly enfranchised, were inrolled by the hundreds. Likewise they sat in Council about devising means for defence of the City: and P. Sempronius the Pretor, had the whole government of the State. But the Senat was partly eased and discharged of this care, by the letters of L. Volturnus the Cos. which gave intelligence that the forragers of Campain were defeated, slain, and put to flight. Thereupon were decreed in favour of the Consul, for this exploit by him achieved, solemn processions, and the abstinence of term again was remitted, which had continued for eighteen dayes space: and the procession aforesaid, was right joyfully performed. Then began they to devise about garrisons for defence of the country, thus wasted and overrun by the Samnits. And agreed it was, that two Colonies should be sent about the Vestin and Falern coasts, one to the mouth of the river Liris, which Colony was called  Minturne*, the other in the Vestin Forrest and Straights, adjoining to the Falern country; where Synope, a Greek Town sometime stood, and afterwards was called by the Romans there inhabiting,  Sinuessa*. The Tribuns of the Com. had in charge to ordain by an Act of the common people, that P. Sempronius the Pretor should choose certain Trium-

A wars, about the sending and translating of inhabitants into those Colonies. But much ado they had to find those that willingly yielded to be enrolled Colonists, supposing indeed that they were sent thither, not to inhabit Land and ground for their butt-betwixt, but to lie in garrison, and to stand upon their guard in those frontiers, which were continually molested by warlike enemies. From the state of these affairs, the Senat was withdrawn, by occasion of the Tuscan war, whereof the rumour daily encreased: and letters also came thick from Appius, who warned them not to neglect the rising of that countrey: which letters imported, that four nations had united their forces, and binded themselves together: to wit, Tuscania, Sabinum, Umbria, and the Gauls: that they were already encamped in two places, for that one was not able to receive so great a multitude. Upon these occasions, as also for that the time drew neer of Election of Consuls, Lucius Volturnius the Consul was called home to Rome. Who before that he called the Centuries for to give their voyces, having assembled the people to an audience, discoursed before them at large, concerning the greatness of the Tuscan war. "How that afore time, when he himself and his brother Consul warred there together, it was of so great importance, that neither one leader, nor yet one army was sufficient: and by report, the Umbrians, and a mighty power of Gauls were afterward combined unto them. So that they should remember, that they were to chuse that day two Coss. against four Nations. As for himself, but that he was certainly persuaded and assured, that the people of Rome would with a general consent declare him Coss. who at that time, without all controverſie was counted the principal Captain and best leader of all others, he would forthwith nominat a Dictator. No man doubted, but the Q. Fabius was the man, who by the assent of all, was meant and destined to this charge: and him together with Volturnius, both the prerogative tribe, and all those that were called first, every one, nominated to be Coss. Fabius made a speech by way of excuse, in substance, like as he had done before, two years together: but afterwards seeing he was overcome with the general agreement of the people, he framed it so in the end, that he required P. Decius to be his colleague: "Alledging, that he would be in stead of a good prop and stay to him in his old age: how he had found by experience in one Censorship and two Consulships, born jointly together with him, that there was no surery and defence of the Common-weal, to the concord and agreement of those that are companions in government. And to any other new Colleague besides him, hardly could an old man's mind sort and frame. Also that he would and could more easily impart his mind and purpose to one, whose humor, condition, and behavior, he had been already acquainted with. The Coss. himself confirmed his Oration, and accorded therunto; as well, in regard of the commendable parts and deserts of P. Decius, as also of the good that proceeded and ensued upon the managing of war-affairs, by the concord and unity of the Consuls; and of the hurt which hapned and followed upon their disagreement and dissention: "and therewith he shewed how neer they were of late to utter peril and destruction, through quarrels between him and his brother Appius; admonishing Decius and Fabius both to live so, as with one mind and heart they affected and intended the same things. He added moreover and said, they were men of Action both, born for war and to be souldiers; for martial feats renowned already: but for to maintain contentions of words and quarrels of the tongue, altogether rude and unskilful, and such natures, (said he) were fittest to make Consuls. As for nimble heads and fine wits, deeply seen in points and quirks of law, full of their eloquent tearms, such as Ap. Claudius was; those were meet to be made Lord Presidents of the City and chief Justices in the common place, for to sit in judgment of causes, and see the execution of laws. Thus in handling of these matters was that day spent. The morrow after, according to the Consuls appointment, was the Election held, both of new Consuls, and also of Pretors. Q. Fabius and P. Decius were created Consuls, and App. Claudius Pretor, all absent. And L. Volturnius by Act of the Senat, and grant of the Commons, had his government prorogued, and continued in his charge one year longer.

The same year were many strange sights and prodigious monsters seen: for the turning away of the dangers foresignified and menaced thereby, the Senat decreed supplications and Letanies for two dayes together. Wine and incense for the sacrifices, was allowed at the publick charges of the City, and in procession went both men and women in great number, with much reverence, to visit the Holy shrines, and there to do their devotions. These solemn supplications were more renowned and memorable, by reason of a contention that arose among the dames of the City, in the Chappel of Lady Pudicitia Parvita, which standeth in the beast-market, by the round Church of Hercules. The Noblemens wives would not admit into that Chappel Virginia the daughter of Aulus, who, notwithstanding she was nobly descended from the race of the Patritii, yet had espoused Volturnius the Consul, a Commoner, and was married (forsooth) out of the family and ranck of the Parviti. Whereupon, there began some short and cutt shrewd words to be dealt between: and so (as women commonly are soon angry and set on fire) there grew to heart-burning and hot contention. Whiles Virginia alledged and said, that she being a Gentlewoman and Parvita born, and a chaste and honest Dame, was entered in the Chappel of Parvitan Chastities: over and besides, she had not been noted for Bigamy; but was the wife of one only husband: unto whom she was given and brought a pure maid: and as for her husband, and his dignities which he had born, his noble acts that he had atchieved, she had no cause to complain, or be ashamed, nay rather, she gloried therein right greatly. After this, she accumulated these magnificent and glorious words, with a generous and brave a deed. For in the long street where she dwelt, she set by and out of a part of her dwelling house, as much as would serve for an Oratory or pety Chappel, and there erected an Altar. And when she had assembled the wives of the Commoners together, and had complained of this injurious dealing of the Patritian dames: "This altar (quoth she) do I dedicate unto Pudicitia Plebeia: and all you here I exhort, "that with what emulation, the men our husbands, in this City contend about feats of valour "and arms, who may do best: so, likewise the Marrons and wives strive and excel in continence "and chastity: and that ye will labour and endeavour, that this altar may have the name to be "frequented, and resorted unto, with more reverence and devotion, yea, and if (it be possible) of "more chaste women, than that other of the Nobility. And so it fell out indeed, that from that time, this altar also had the same rites (in a manner) and ceremonies as the other, which was more ancient: in such sort, as no wife, but of approved honesty and chastity, and wedded but to one husband during her life, might be allowed there to sacrifice and offer oblations. But this religious order and institution, in lapse and procees of time was prophaned afterwards and divulged, and the altar frequented by them that were stained and infamous; and not only by matrons of name and quality, but also by women of all sorts and degrees, until at last through disuse it grew to be utterly forgotten, and came to nothing.

The same year the Ediles Curule, Cn. and Q. Ogulius accused certain Usurers, who were convicted, and their goods forfeit and confiscat. And of that which came into the common chest, they caused to be made a brazen portal in the Capitol, and silver vessels for to furnish out three tables in Jupiter his Chappel: also the image of Jupiter himself in the Lantern or frontispice of the Capitol, sitting in his chariot drawn with four steeds. Moreover, at the Fig-tree Ruminalis, they erected and set up the images of the foundling babes, the first founders of the City, pendant at the teats of a shee-wolf. They paved also with square stone, the causey and high way from the gate Capena, unto the Temple of Mars. The Ediles likewise Commoners, L. Atilius Paucus, and C. Fulvius Curvus, of the forfeited mony which they levied of the graasers or farmers of the City pastures, who were condemned and fined, exhibited certain pageants and playes, and set up golden bolles in the Temple of Ceres.

After this, Q. Fabius the fifth time Consul, and P. Decius the fourth, entered their government, who now had been companions together in three Consulats, and in one Censorship, men renowned, not more for the honor of their noble exploits in war, which was right great, than for their loving agreement and concord. Which unity of theirs was not perpetual to the end; by occasion, I suppose, of the contention of the States that came between, rather than of any difference betwixt themselves. For the Patritii laboured, that Fabius should have the Province of Tuscan extraordinarily: and the Commons were as earnest with Decius to put the matter to a Lottery. Certain it is, that a great contention there was in the Senat. But afterwards, seeing that Fabius was able there to do more and make a greater side than his Colleague, the matter was brought again before the people. In which assembly, few words passed between the parties themselves, being martial men both, standing more upon deeds than words. Fabius gave out and said: "That it was an indignity, that another should gather fruit under the Tree that he had planted. "Also, that himself was the man, who had opened the way through the wood Ciminia, and had "given entrance and passage for the Roman war, through desert and wild Forrests. What meant "they then to trouble him, a man of those years, with this place of charge, in case, they minded "to give the conduct of this war to any other General but himself? No doubt, but by little and "little he upbraided them covertly and cast in their teeth, for chusing unto him an adversary, and "not a companion in government: yea, and charged Decius, that he repented and envied the "good concord, wherein they had lived together, during the time of three Magistracies already. "Finally, he aimed and reached at no farther matter than this, but if so be, they thought him "worthy of the Province, thither to send him. For as he had been at the appointment and pleasure of the Senate, so would he be at the ordering and direction of the people. On the other "side, P. Decius complained of the injury offered by the Senat: for that the Nobles had endeavoured "to their power, and done their best, that no Commons might have access to honourable "places and dignities: and after that prowess and valour had got the upperhand, and prevailed "so, as even in those kind of men vertue wanted not her due reward and honour: there were "means sought, that not only the voyces of the people were deluded and made vain; but also "the very awards and arbitrements of fortune, were transferred to the wills and pleasures of some "few. All Consuls before him had their provinces by lot: and now the Senat by their absolute "authority, without casting lots, gave unto Fabius the charge of his province. If it be (saith he) "to honour the man: verily, he hath so well deserved both of my self and of the Common- "wealth, that I favour highly and tender the glory of Q. Fabius: provided alwayes, that it get "not a shining lustre, by a foil of my disgrace and dishonour. And who will ever doubt, where "there is one difficult and dangerous war, and the same precisely and absolutely charged upon "one Consul, without ordinary and lawful calling: but that the other Consul standeth for a "Cipher, and is reputed either needless, or good for nothing? As for Fabius, like as he gloried "in his service and noble Acts achieved in Tuscan, even so would Publius Decius also full fain "do the semblable: and peradventure, he should be able to put out and quench that fire once for "all, which Fabius left behind him, so covered and raked up, as that oftentimes it suddenly brake "out again, and yielded forth new flames and blazes. In conclusion, he could be content to yeild

Debate between Decius and Fabius for their Provinces.

A "yeeld the titles of honour and all rewards of vertue unto his Colleague, in the reverent regard "of his old age, and majesty of his person: but for any hazard or jeopardy that might be pre"sented unto them, he neither at this time gave place, nor ever would (with his good will) to "him or any man else whatsoever; and if he gat no other good by this contention, yet would he
 "obtain thus much at the least, that the people should hold their own, and dispose of that abso"lutely at their discretion, which was in their power: rather then permit the Nobles to gratifie
 "any one therewith at their pleasure. And herewith he prayed Jup. Opt. Max. and all the im"mortal gods, that even as they vouchsafed to bestow upon him and his Colleague equal valour
 "and happines in the conduct of their war, so they would afford them one and the same right B "and authority and rule. For, surely it was in nature meet and reason, for example good and "profitable, and for the credit and fame of the people of Rome much material, that such should "be Consuls, as by either of their guidance and conduct, without exceptions, the war with the "Tuscan might be administred as it ought to be. Fabius then, having besought the people naught else, but that before the Tribes were called in to give their suffrages, they would hear the letters of App. Claudius Pretor read, which were brought out of Tuscany, departed out of the assembly. So the Province of Tuscany, without casting lots, was awarded unto Fabius, with no less consent of the people, then of the Senat. Hereupon, all the younger sort (in manner) ran unto the Consul, and offered their service of themselves, and gave their names to be enrolled, so desirous were they to serve under that Captain. Which multitude being thus flocked about him round; Four thousand footmen (quoth he) and six hundred horse, and no more, am I mind-C ed to take up and levy. As many therefore, as to day and to morrow, will present themselves and give their names, will I accept of, and take with me: more care have I to bring you all home rich and wealthy, then to have numbers of souldiers to fight my battels. Thus went he forth with a competent Army well appointed, and so much more confident, and in hope of good success, by how much less he stood upon the great number; and directed his journey to the Town Abarna, where Appius the Pretor encamped, and from whence the enemy was not far distant. A few miles on this side, the fewellers or wood-purveyors, accompanied with a good guard of souldiers for their convoy, met him: who seeing the Sergeants going before, and understanding that it was Fabius the Consul, with joy and cheerful hearts, thanked God and the people of Rome, for sending unto them such a General. After this, when they came all about the Consul to salute and welcome him, Fabius demanded whither they went? who answered, D To purvey wood and fewel. Say ye so? (quoth he) and have ye not your camp empaled and fortified? Yes, cried they all, and that with a double rampart and ditch, but yet are we in exceeding fear. Then (quoth he) ye have wood and timber enough. Go ye back again, and down with the trench and pallisade. Who returned into the camp, and as they were plucking up the rampart, they gave the alarm both to the souldiers that tarried behind in the camp, and to Appius himself, and made them afraid. Then every man said to one or other as they came, that it was by the express commandment of Q. Fabius the Consul that they did so. The morrow after they removed the camp; and Appius the Pretor was dismissed and sent away to Rome: After which time, the E Romans abode no where in standing camp: for he said, it was not good and commodious for an army to make abode in any one place; but that it was better and more wholsom both for the agility and health of their bodies, to have a running camp, to be ever marching, and changing the air and the soil. But their journeys were no other, then the winter would permit, which was not yet past.

In the beginning of the Spring, Fabius having left the second legion at Clusium, which in old time was called Camars, and appointed L. Scipio Pro-pretor, to be governor of the camp, he returned himself to Rome for to consult about the war: were it of his own accord and motion, because it appeared evidently in view of eye much greater then it was reputed before; or that he was sent for by order from the Senat: for there be writers that affirm both the one and the other. Some F would have it thought, that he was called back again by Appius Claudius Pretor, who both at the Councel Table in the Senat-House, and also before the body of the people (like as he had continually done by letters) enforced the fear and terror of the Tuscan war, saying, that one General and one Army, were not sufficient to make head against four Nations: that it would be dangerous and doubtful, whether they jointly in one body gave battel unto one, or maintained war apart in divers quarters: that one man was not able to perform and mannage all at once.
 As for himself, he had left behind him two Roman Legions and no more, and with Fabius there were come not full five thousand in all, of horse and foot together. His opinion therefore was, that with all speed, P. Decius the Consul, should go to his Colleague into Tuscany, and L. Vo- lumnus have the charge of Samnium in the meantime. But in case the Consul had rather go in-G to his own Province, then he advised, that Volumnius took his way directly with a full and com-plect Consular army into Tuscany, to the Consul. When this discourse of the Pretor had moved a great part of the House, then P. Decius spake (by report) to this effect; That all should be left entire and free to the disposition of Q. Fabius, until such time as either himself in person (if it might stand with the weal-publick) were come to Rome, or sent one of his Lieutenants by whom the Senat might be enformed, and truly understand the poysse and importance of the war in Tus- cany; what forces were requisite, and how many Leaders and Captains were expedient and needful; Fabius, so soon as he was returned to Rome, both in the Senat-House, and also in the audience of the people, held a middle course in all his speech: that he might seem neither to encrease, nor yet to diminish the rumor of the war: and in assuming to himself another Captain, he pretended, that he condescended thereunto, in regard of other mens fear, more then for his own safety, or for any danger that the State was like to incur. Howbeit, if they would allow him a coadjutor and companion in war, how might he forget P. Decius the Consul: of whom he had so good proof and experience in so many Magistracies, which they had born and administered together. Of all men in the world he loved none better, and would make choice of no one sooner: and having P. Decius with him, he would never think his forces too few about him, nor his enemies too many before him. But if peradventure the mind and heart of his Colleague stood otherwise, his request was, that they would give him L. Volturnus to be his assistant. The determination of all was referred over to Fabius, both by the people and Senat, and also by the Consul himself. And when as Decius shewed and testified, that he was ready to take a journey either into Samnium or Tuscany, there followed such a joy and gratulation of all men, as if they had conceived in their spirit a victory afore-hand, and even now, had decreed for the Consuls, not a doubtful war, but a glorious triumph. I find in some writers, that Fabius and Decius, presently upon the entrance into their Magistracy, went into Tuscany, without any mention of casting lots for their charges and provinces, or of the contention between the two Collegues, which I have set down. There be some again, who having laid abroad these debates, stayed not there, but over and besides have added a surcease of matter, touching the invectives of Appius before the people, against Fabius in his absence; as also the obstinate stubbornness of him being Pretor, against the Consul, to his very face: moreover, another contention and variance between the two Consuls; whiles Decius endeavoured to bring about, and was instant that each one should keep him to his own Province allotted unto him, and hold it. But all writers agree in the course of the history, from the time that both Consuls went out to war, and so forward.

But before that the Consuls arrived in Tuscany, certain Gauls called Senones, came with a great power before Clusium, ready to give assault unto the Roman Legion and the camp. But Scipio, who was left Governor thereof, thinking it necessary to help out the small number of his men, by advantage of the ground, led his army up to the hill between the town and the camp. But (as it falleth out in such sudden cases) he had not discovered aforehand the wayes and passes all about; but inconsiderately went forward, and engaged himself up to the top and pitch of the hill, which the enemy was master of already, by another side. Thus was the legion assailed on the back and beat down, and thus was it enclosed and environed round, by a multitude of enemies, and put to the sword. Some writers there be who report, that the whole legion perished there, so as not one escaped alive to carry tidings. Also, that the Consuls who now were not far from Clusium, had no news brought them of this overthrow, before the horsemen of the Gauls were in fight, who carrying the heads of them that were slain, some hanging before at their horsepoitrals, others sticking aloft upon their lances, braved and triumphed, singing and chanting songs of joy, after their manner. Some write that they were the Umbri and not the Gauls, and that the defeat and massacre was not so great: also that when the forragers for the camp under the leading of L. Manlius Torguatus a Lieutenant, were compassed about by the enemy; then Scipio the Pro-pretor came forth of the camp to succour and rescue them, and that the Umbrians who first had the better, afterwards when the battel was renewed, suffered the foil and were overcome; and that as well their prisoners as their booty was taken from them. But more probable it is, that this overthrow was given by the Gauls, then the Umbrians; for that as divers times afore, so that year especially the City was frighted with the tumults and risings of the Gauls. Upon this defeat, over and besides, that both the Consuls were gone to war with four legions, and a great power of Cavalry of natural Romans, and a thousand horsemen of Capua, chosen out of purpose for that war, and sent unto them, with a greater power also of Allies, and of Latins then of Romans; there were two other armies not far from the City of Rome, opposed to frontier and make head against Tuscany: the one in the Faliscian territory, the other in the Vatican. Cn. Fulvius and L. Posthumius Megillus, both Pro-pretors, were commanded to keep a standing camp in those parts. But the Consuls by this time, having passed over the mountain Apenninus, were come to the enemies within the country of the Sentinars. And there about four miles off, they sat them down and encamped. Then the enemies, after much consultation, resolved in the end upon this point: not to be intermingled all in one camp, nor come into the field and hazard all their forces at once in one battel: But that the Gauls should take the Samnites unto them, and the Umbrians join with the Tuscans. The day of the battel was appointed. The Gauls and Samnites had the charge to maintain the fight: and in the time of battel the Tuscans and Umbrians were commanded to assault the camp of the Romans. But these their designs and purposes were altered by reason of three Clusin fugitive traitors, who by night stole away privily unto the Consul Fabius, and disclosed the inrents and enterprise of the enemies: who were sent away with rich rewards, to the end that every hour, upon new plots and devices that should be determined by the enemies, they would give them an inkling and certain intelligence. The Consuls write unto Fulvius and Posthumius, that the one should advance and come forward with his army, out of the Faliscan country; and the other out of the Vatican directly unto Clusium: and that with all their forces, they should overrun and destroy the enemies country. The rumor of these rodes & invasions, caused the Tuscans to remove out of the

Sentinars

A Sentinat territory; to the defence of their own frontier. Hereupon the Consuls made speed to strike a battel in their absence. And for two dayes space they skirmished continually with their enemy, and challenged him to the field: but for those two dayes, no worthy deed of importance was achieved. A few on both sides were slain, and hereby were their courages rather provoked, and their stomacks whet to a full set battel: then any trial or hazard made of the main chance. Upon the third day into plain field they come with all their power. When both armies stood ranged in battel array, there fortuned a Hind to be chased out of the mountains, and to run away before a Wolf, even through the midst of the plains between both armies: then, parted both these wild beasts asunder, the Hind took her way to the Gauls, and the Wolf his course to the Romans. The Wolf had way given him through all the ranks and files: but the Hind was killed among the Gauls.

B Then a Roman souldier, one of the foremost, who was to fight before the Ensigns: There will the flight (quoth he) there will the slaughter be, where you see the beast sacred and dedicated to Diana lie dead: but here on this party, the martial Wolf consecrated to Mars, having with victory gone clear away safe and unwounded, hath put us in mind of our martial Nation and of our first founder, the son of Mars. The Gauls put themselves in the right wing, the Samnites in the left. Against the Samnites, Fabius marshalled the first and third Legions, in the right point: and Decius the fifth and sixth in the left, affront the Gauls. For the second and fourth served in Samnium under L. Volturnius Pro-consul. At the first shock and encounter, the battel was so indifferently fought, and with so equal force, that if the Tuscans and Umbrians had either shewed themselves in the field, or assailed the camp, the loss and overthrow must needs have, light in either place, whereas they had bent their forces. Howbeit, although hitherto the conflict of battel went equal and indifferent, and that as yet fortune had not determined, which way she would incline and give the victory; yet they fought not alike, in the right and left wings. For the Romans under the conduct of Fabius, rather warded the enemy warily, and stood upon their guard, then offered to charge lustily: so as they maintained fight, and drew it at length until it was very late in the evening, because the Captain was enforced and perswaded of the Samnites and Gauls both, that being as they were in the first skirmish very hot and furious, it was sufficient to keep off at length and at staves end. As for the Samnites, their courages would abate and fall, by any long continuance of the holidays of the Gauls, (who of all other can least away with travel, & heat especially) would turn all to sweat, & melt away: who at the beginning, fight more fiercely then men, but in the end more faintly then women. Against that time therefore, when the enemy used to fall & give over, Fabius had kept his souldiers in breath, & reserved their strength fresh & lusty. But Decius, being very eager & hot by reason of his youth and courage of heart, laid on lustily at the first, and spent upon the enemies all the force & vigor he had: and for that the Infantry seemed to fight but coldly, he set the Cavalry a work: and himself personally in the thickest throng and troop of most valiant and hardy Knights, exhorted and befought the foremost gallants of those lusty youths, to join with him & to charge upon the enemy saying, that they should carry away a double honor, if by the means of the men of arms, the victory began at the left wing. Twice they forced the Gauls horsemens to turn side and back; but when as they were engaged farther within, and were now fighting hard pell mell among the squadrons of the horsemen, they beheld a new and strange kind of fight, which troubled and terrified them. For the enemies standing all armed upon chariots & wagons, with a great noise of their steeds, and rumbling of the wheels, ran full upon them & mightily affrighted the onsets of the Romans, which had not been acquainted with such uncouth & strange noises. So the horsemen who had the upper hand before, & were at point of victory, were now, with a foul fear discomfited and scattered, as if the hideous furies of hell, & the devil himself had been amongst them. Whereupon they fled suddenly, & not looking before them were overthrown both men & horse. By this occasion the ensigns of footmen were distressed & disordered, and many of those that were ranged in the front before the ensigns, were by force of horse & wagons driven cross through the battails: long, troden under foot, and their guts squashed out. Hereupon the battalions of the Gauls footmen, seeing their enemies thus scared, followed on apace, & gave them no time of breathing. Decius cried out aloud to his men, Whither flee ye? Or what hope have ye to save yourselves by flight? Decius opposed himself against them that retreated and fled. Decius rallied those that were disbanded and scattered: but seeing that by no force or means he could stay them, thus amazed & astonished as they were; he called upon his father P. Decius by name, and said: Why do I stay any longer the fatal death that is destined to my house & name? It is given to our race & family to be sacrificed in lieu of propitiatory sacrifices, for to spoil & save the publick weal from dangers impending: & threatened unto it. Even now therefore, wil I offer the legions of the enemies to be sacrificed with my self to Dame Tellus and other infernal gods. When he had spoken these words, he commanded M. Livius the high Priest (whom as he marched into the field, he straightly had charged not to depart from him) for to pronounce and say that form of words, whereby he should devote, offer, and betake himself to death, together with the legions of the enemies, for to save the army of the Quirits and people of Rome. Which when he had done by the same form of prayer, and in the same habit wherein his father P. Decius at the river Veseris, in the war against the Latins, caused himself to be offered to death: and besides these solemn prayers, added moreover these words: That he drave before him, Fright, Flight, Murder, Massacre, Bloodshed, Ire and Wrath of gods, in Heaven & fiends in Hell; and that he would with deadly maledictions and execrable curses smite the ensigns, weapons, and armors of his enemies; and that one and the same place, should give both himself, and also the Gauls and Samnites together with him, plague, perdition, and destruction. After these cursed, horrible, and detestable speeches against his own person and his enemies: look where he saw the thickest ranks of the Gauls; thither he spurred his horse, and rode in amongst them: where amidst the pikes, javelins, and swords, he was presently slain. Then could it hardly be seen, that the battle was any longer fought by power and help of man. The Romans so soon as they had lost their Captain, (which at all other times is wont to smite a terror into them) stayed their flight, and were willing and contented to renew the battle afresh. The Gauls, and especially that troop which stood about the Cos, his body, stared as though they had been out of their wits, flung their darts from them (I know not how) to no purpose, and in vain: some of them stood still, as it were benumbed, forgetting both to run away, and to fight still. But on the other side the high Priest Decius, with whom Decius had left the serjeants, and whom before his death he nominated and ordained to be Propretor, cried out, as loud as he could, that the Romans had the victory, and by the death of the Cos, were acquit and excused from all other fatal danger: but as for the Gauls and the Samnites, they were destined and forfeited (as it were) to mother Tellus and the infernal spirits. And now Decius (quoth he) haled after him, and called to follow him, the army that with him was devoted, cursed, and offered: now all the enemies are full of furies and fearful fright. Then, as these aforesaid began the skirmish again, behold there came unto them, Cornelius Scipio, and C. Marcius with a supply of succours from the rearward: who by commandment of Q. Fabius the Consul, were sent to aid and rescue his Collegue. Where they heard of the worthy end of P. Decius, a noble example to encourage them to adventure all hazards in the service of their country and Common-weal. Therefore, when as the Gauls stood close and thick together, opposing their targets before them, ranged and joined one over another featherwise, so, as to deal with them affront, and to cope together at hand strokes, was thought a difficult and dangerous matter: then, by the commandment of those two Lieutenants, the darts and lances which lay strewed upon the ground, between the two armies, were gathered up, and flung against the pavoise or tortoise-sense of the enemies targets aforesaid. And by reason that these javelins and spears light and stuck fast, some in their targets, and some in their very bodies, it hapned that their knot was broken, and the battailon (as huge and close as it was) disbanded, in such sort, as many of them, notwithstanding their bodies were untouched and unhurt, fell down astonished one upon another. Lo how fortune altered the case, and changed all in the left wing of the Romans. But in the right, Fabius (as is before said) at the first, lingered and drew on the day: but afterwards, when as he perceived, that neither the enemies shouts, nor their manner of giving charge, nor yet the darts and javelins which they lanced, had the same vigor and force, as before he commanded the Captains of the horsemen to wheel about with their Cornets, and to flank the Samnites, that upon a signal given, they might charge them overthwart with all the violence they could; while his own Legionary footmen by little and little advanced forward, and brake the ranks and disordered the enemy. When he saw once, no resistance made, and that without all doubt they were wearied and out of breath: then he gathered together all his subsidiary companies of the rearguard, which he had reserved until that time and business, fresh and in heart: and at once, both set forward the Legions, and gave the horsemen also a signal to set upon the enemies. But the Samnites could not endure this violent charge, but ran as fast as ever they could to recover the camp fast by the battailon of the Gauls, leaving their fellows behind them in fight to pay the reckoning. The Gauls having likewise made a target-sense, stood thick and close together under it. Then Fabius advertised of the death of his brother Consul, commanded a wing or Cornet, of the number almost of 500 horsemen of Capua, to withdraw themselves out of the conflict, to take about and to play upon the backs of the Gauls: after whom, he caused the Principes of the third Legion to follow: and wheresoever they espied the ranks of the enemies by force of horsemen disordered and broken; there, to second them, and press on still, and kill them while they were in disarray, and afraid. Himself vowed a Temple to Jupiter Victor, together with the spoils of his enemies: Which done, he advanced straight forward to the camp of the Samnites. Thither all the multitude of them were driven in great fright and disarray. And for that the gates were not able to receive so great a multitude, crowding together, they that were kept out, and could not get in, by reason of the throng of their fellows, began again to fight under the rampart. Where Gellius Egmatius, the General of the Samnites was stricken down and slain: after this, the Samnites beaten within their rampart, were killed every one, and their camp after small resistance won. The Gauls behind their back were environed and cut in pieces. That day were slain of enemies five and twenty thousand, and 8000 taken prisoners. Howbeit, this victory cost the Romans blood: for of P. Decius his army, there died 7000 and of Fabius, 1200. Fabius then having sent out to seek out the body of his Collegue, gathered up all the spoils of the enemies into an heap, and burned them, to the honor of Jupiter Victor. But that day could not the Consul his body be seen, by reason it was covered and hidden under heaps of the Gauls that lay there dead. The morrow after it was found and brought again with many a tear of all his souldiers. Then Fabius setting all other matters for the time aside, solemnized the burial and funeral obsequies of his fellow Consul, with due commendation and condigne praises, and with all honor that could be devised.

In Tuscany also about the same time, Cn. Fulvius Propretor, had fortunate success to his hearts desire: for besides great damage done to the enemy, by invasions & rides into the country, he fought also

Also a notable battel: wherein of Perusins and Clusins were slain above 3000, and twenty ensigns won. The Samnites, as they fled through the territory of the Pelignians, were by them intercepted and enclosed; and of five thousand, they were left but one thousand. Great is the fame of that day, and of the battel that was fought in the Sentinate territory, if a man hold him only to the truth, and make no more of it than it was. But some have overreached a little, and written, that the enemies were 40330. foot, and 46000. horse strong: also, that they had a thousand chariots or waggons, reckoning and comprising the Umbrians and Tuscans withal: who also (as they say) were at the battel. And to increase also the power and forces of the Romans, they report, that L. Volumnius Propetor, was a Commander, together with the Consuls, and that his army was joined with the Legions of the Consuls. But I find in most Chronicles, that this victory was achieved by the two Consuls only, Volumnius in the meantime warred in Samnium; and having forced and driven the army of the Samnites, to take the hill Tifernum, nothing afraid for the disadvantage of the place, discomfited them, and put them to flight. Q. Fabius, having left the army of Decius behind him in Tuscany, reduced his own legions into the City, and triumphed over the Gauls, Tuscans, and Samnites. His souldiers followed him in his triumph, who in their rude military rhimes and songs, celebrated no less the brave and noble death of P. Decius, than the worthy victory of Quintus Fabius. And they revived the memorial of his father late deceased, comparing him in equal degree, for the issue and event, as well publick as privat, with the praises of his son. Of the booty and pillage gained from the enemies, the souldiers had given unto them * 82 Asles apeece, with a livery cloak, and coat: a good reward for a souldiers service in those days.

For all these notable victories achieved, yet neither the Samnites nor the Tuscans were at quiet. For, both the Perusins began to rebel, so soon as the Consul had away his army: and also the Samnites came down to forrage and spoil into the territory of Vesstin and Formianum; and another way into Efetrnum, which lie along the river Vulturnus. Against them was Appius Claudius the Pretor, sent with Decius his army. And Fabius in Tuscany, which began new war, slew four thousand and five hundred Perusins, took prisoners 1740. who were ransomed for * 310. Asles a peece. The rest of the spoil was all bestowed upon the souldiers. The Legions of the Samnites being pursued hard at heels, partly by Appius Claudius Pretor, and partly by L. Volumnius Proconsul, met all together in the territory of Stella. Where both the Samnit Legions abode, and also Appius and Volumnius joined and encamped together. There was a sharp and cruel battel fought on both sides. The Romans were incensed with anger and choler against those that had so often rebelled: the other, upon a desperate mind were resolute to hazard the utmost. So there were slain of the Samnites, 16300; 2700. taken prisoners, and of the Romans there died two thousand seven hundred.

vilano.

This year so fortunate in war, was by reason of pestilence much afflicted; and for certain prodigious tokens, full of care and perplexed. For it was reported, that in divers places it rained earth: and that in the army of Appius Claudius, there were many smitten & blasted with lightning. In regard hereof, the books of Sibylla were perused and sought into. The same year Q. Fabius Garges, the Consul his son, fined and punished by the purse, certain wives who had been convicted and condemned, before the people, of Adultery: of which money so raised by their fines, he caused to be built the Temple of Venus, which standeth neer the Cirque or Race.

There remain yet behind certain wars of the Samnites, whereof we have now continued our history in these four books, for the space of six and forty years, ever since that M. Valerius, and M. Corneilius were Consuls, wtho were the first that waxed in Samnium. To let pass therefore, and not to trouble the readers, with a prolix narration of the alternative overthrowes given and received between both nations so many years one after another, for all which calamities and losses their hearts and courages could not be daunted or conquered: the very last year, the Samnites, in the Sentinate country, in the Pelign territory, at Tifernum, and in the territory of Stella, were defeated both by themselves, with their own legions, and also mingled with others; and that, by four armies, and four Roman Captains: lost the bravest and most noble General of all their nation; saw their confederates and allies in war, the Tuscans, Umbrians, and Gauls, in the same predicament as themselves, not able to stand and maintain their estate any longer, either by their own power, or with help of foreign forces; yet for all this, would they not abstain from war, so little weary were they of defending their liberty although it were unfortunately: choosing rather to be vanquished, than not to attempt the winning of victory. Who is he, that would not think itarkom, and tedious, either to write or read this long suite and train of wars, which they in fighting were never wearied?

After Q. Fabius and P. Decius succeeded Consuls L. Posthumius Megillus and M. Atilius Regulus. To them both, was committed charge of Samnium, for that the bruit went, that the enemies had prepared three full armies, the one to go again into Tuscany, the second to invade and over-run aresh the territory of Capua, and the third to defend their own frontiers. Posthumius by reason of sickness remained at Rome; but Atilius went presently with an army forth, to the end that he might surprize the enemies on a sudden in Samnium, before they had taken the field: for so the Senat had given direction: and he found the enemy in the way to meet him, as if it had been so of purpose before by them determined, ready there to keep him from entrance: and so far off were they from waisting the hands of the Samnites, that they could not once enter into their confines; nay, the Samnites debared them from departure thence, into the peaceable parts and territories of their allies. Now when as they were encamped affront one against another; that, which the Romans being so often conquerors, would hardly have adventured, (see how utter despair driveth men to rash projects and extremities) the Samnites attempted: even to give assault upon the Romans camp. And albeit this so venturous enterprise sped not well in the final effect, yet was it not altogether in vain attempted. There chanced to be a foggy mist, which continued a good part of the day, so thick and palpable, as men could not see before them, I say not, so far as without the trench, but not so much as those that came close to speak one to another. The Samnites hereupon taking the advantage fit for an ambushment, before it was full day light, and the same much overcast and dim with the mist, came as far as the Corps de guard of the Romans, who in the gates and entrance of the camp warded but negligently: being thus taken on a sudden, they had neither courage nor strength enough to resist. At the back-side of the camp, they assaulted the great gate Decimiana, seized the Quæstors pavilion, and that quarter about it: where the Quæstor himself (L. Opimius Pansa) was slain, and thereupon the alarm was given. The Consul, being with this tumult raised, commanded two bands or cohorts of allies, to wit, the one of Lucanians, and the other of Sueffians, which haply were next hand, to defend and guard the Pretors pavilion, and that quarter. In the mean while he marched with the legionary bands along the high broad street in the camp, called Principalis, and before they had buckled and fitted their armor about them, they were ranged in battel array; and had knowledge of the enemy, by the ear and ontcries, rather than by the sight of the eye: neither could they give an estimate what number they were. At the first, as doubtful of the event, and mistrusting their fortune, they retreated, and received their enemies in, and let them come even into the midst of the camp: but then the Consul cried out, and asked, Whether they meant to be turned out of their own ramparts and holds first, and after have a new piece of work to assail and win them again? So, they set up a shout, and put all their might together, and first made resistance only and kept their ground: but afterwards they set forward, and pressed upon them: and having once beat them back, they drave them afore them; with the same fear, that they themselves began, yea, and chased them out of the gate and the trench: but to proceed further, for to pursue the chase, they durst not, for fear of some ambushment, by reason of the misty and troubled weather, contenting themselves with the saving of their camp and no more: and so they retired within their ramparts having slain to the number welnear, of three hundred enemies. Of Romans, as well those that were in the first Corps de guard and Sentinels, who kept the watch, as of those that were surpris'd about the Quæstors lodging, were killed 230. This bold adventure of the Samnites speeding so well, made them take better heart; so as they would not permit the Romans to encamp farther into the Country, no, nor so much, as to go a foraging into their territory: whereupon they were compelled to retire again, and to purvey forrage in the quiet and peaceable quarters of their friends about Sora.

The bruit of all these occurrences more troublesome and fearful then truth was, being come to Rome, caused L. Posthumius the Consul, before he was well recovered of his sickness, to take the field: but ere he departed the City, he proclaimed the Rendezvous at Sora; for his souldiers there to meet. Himself now dedicated unto the goddess Vittoria, the Temple, which in the time of his Curule Edileship he took order to be built, with the money raised of certain fines taken of persons condemned. Then took he his journey to the army, and so went forward from Sora directly into Samnium, to the camp of his brother Consul. But the Samnites distrusting themselves, as not able to withstand two armies, were dislodged, and departed back: and the Consuls also parted one from another, sundry ways, to waste the country, and assault the towns. Posthumius at his first coming, assayed by meer force to assail the town Milionia, and seeing he could do small good that way, at length by rolling trenches and platforms, he approached close to the walls, and wan it: and albeit the town were thus forced, yet there continued a sharp and long fight in all streets and parts thereof, from the fourth hour of the day until the eighth, with doubtful and variable events for a good while; but in the end the Romans became masters of the town. Of Samnites were slain 3200 and 4100, were taken prisoners: besides the gaining of other booty and pillage. From thence, he led forth the legions to Ferentinum, but the inhabitants with their bag and baggage, and all that ever they could drive or carry, had quit the town in the still night season, and departed in great silence at a contrary postern gate, which opened from the camp of the enemy. The Consul so soon as he was come, at the first approached the walls, as well appointed and provided of all things, as if he should have found as much to do, as at Milionia: but afterwards, perceiving all silent and desolate throughout the City, seeing neither men nor munition within the towers and upon the walls: he held back his souldiers, desirous and greedy to enter upon the bare walls, so abandoned and disurnished of defence: and doubting to fall headlong ere he were aware, into the trains of some hidden and privy ambush, he commanded two Cornets of the Cavalry of Latine confederates, to ride about the walls about the counterescarp, and well to view and consider all places. The horsemen finding one or two gates neerer together standing wide open, and in the very same ways that led from thence, the fresh tracks and footing of the enemies, as they fled by night; rode softly neerer and neerer to the gates: and there they might see straight afore them safe entrance, and the City lying open even from one end to the other: whereupon they brought word back to the Consul, that the City was abandoned, and the enemies

A enemies gone: which was very evident and apparent, as well by the very solitude thereof, as the new and fresh marks and traces of their dislodging and departure: as also by the stuff and goods that lay here and there scattered all abroad, whiles they halted fearfully in the dark, to take their flight. The Consul upon this report, with his host drew to that side of the town, which the horsemen were at: and pitching down his ensigns not far from the gate, commanded five other horsemen to enter into the City: giving order, that when they had gone forward a pretty way, three of them should stay behind in the same place, if they saw all safe and out of danger: and the other two, bring him word what they had seen and found. Who being returned, made relation that they were gone so far as they might see about them every way into all parts, & could perceive nothing but silence and vast desolation all about, both far and near: then forthwith, the Consul entered the City, with certain cohorts lightly appointed, and charged the rest in the mean while to fortifie the camp. The souldiers being once entered, fell to break open the doors: where they found a few silly old folk, and some feeble and diseased persons, with such moveables as were hard to be conveyed and transported: those they rifled, and ranlackt: and by certain captives they understood, that divers other towns thet about, were all with one accord fled and gone: and as for their own countrymen, they departed at the first watch of the night, and they thought no other verily but that in the rest of the Cities, they should find the like emptiness and solitude. And as the prisoners said, so it proved indeed: and the Consul possessed himself of those forlorn and abandoned towns.

C The other Consul M. Attilius, had so easie war for his part: who as he was marching with his Legions toward Luceria, which he heard was besieged by the Samnits: the enemy encountered and met him in the very entry of the frontiers, and gave him battel: and the anger and indignation on both parts, but the end and issue more heavy and dolorous on the Romans side: both because they were not used to be vanquished: and also for that in the very loose and retreat, rather then in combat and skirmish, they found that many more were hurt and slain of their part. Which fearful fight and terror, as it began in the camp, if it had surprized them in the conflict, it would have been an heavy day with them, & no doubt they had received a notable overthrow. And even then, being as it was, they had a careful night, and full of anguish, thinking verily that the Samnits would presently assault their camp, or at leastwise that in the morning betimes they must of necessity fight with the conquerors. But the enemies, as their loss was less, so their heart and courage was never the more: For so soon as the day brake, desirous were they to be gone without any battel. Howbeit there was but one way, & that lay close and near to their enemies: which they were not so soon entered into, but they made shew a far off, as if they marched straight to the assault of the camp. The Consul commanded his men to arm, and to follow after him without the ramparts. To his Lieutenants, Colonels and Captains of the Allies he gave several charges to do as he thought needful and requisite. They all promised to execute any direction whatsoever: but they said withal, that their souldiers hearts were done, that they had watched and sit up all night, amongst the grievous wounds and uncomfortable groans of them that lay a dying: and no doubt if the enemy had come before day against the camp, so daunted were they, that they

D would have abandoned their colours: and even now for very shame and nothing else, they forbore indeed to run away, but otherwise their hearts were gone, and they clean spent. The Consul hearing this, thought good to go about himself in person, unto every one of his souldiers, and to speak unto them: and even as he met with any of them, and saw them so backward, and going about so coldly to take arms and weapon in hand: he checked and rebuked them: crying aloud, and asking why they tarried so long? why they loitered and made such delay? saying, that the enemies would come to them within the very camp, and cut their throats, unless they made more haste to sally forth: yea, and forced they should be to fight before their tent doors, if they would not give battel without the trench and ramparts. They that are armed (saith he) and will fight manfully, shall obtain undoubted victory: but the unarmed and naked man that attendeth the enemies coming,

E must either die for it, or endure captivity. As he rated and rebuked them in these tearms, they answered flatly again, that they had enough of yesterdays work, and were utterly done: and had neither strength nor blood left them in their bodies: and now the enemies (say they) seem more in number then they were the day before. Amid these speeches the army approached: and being now but a little way off, they might take a full view of them more certainly, and see every thing. Whereupon they said confidently, that they saw the Samnits to bring with them their stakes and pales to cast a pallisado, no doubt, round about their whole camp. At this, the Consul cried out upon them for very shame to suffer so foul a reproach and disgrace of a most dastardly enemy. "And shall we be (quoth he) beset and empaled within our own camp, there to die for hunger and famine with shame, rather then by edge of sword (if there be no other remedy) with honor, like men?"

F "The gods speed us well (quoth he) and their will be done: and do every man as he thinks best: as for M. Attilius the Consul, he is resolved even himself alone (if no man else will follow) to meet the enemy in the face, and rather be beaten down and die amongst the Samnits ensigns, than see the Roman camp besieged with a trench cast, and rampart raised about it. The Lieutenants, Colonels, and all the bands and Coronets of the Cavalry, yea, and the principal Centurions of the foremost companies liked well of this, and accepted the Consul his words. Then the souldiers for stark shame, full faintly take weapon in hand, and as slowly, God wot, go forth of camp. And thus in long ranks and files, not close united together but broken here and there, with heavy cheer, and as men half vanquished already, they marched after a sort toward the enemy, who was neither in hope nor in heart better resolved and settled then they. For so soon as the Samnits discovered the Roman Standards, suddenly from the vanguard to the rereguard, there went a muttering and bruit from one to another, that the Romans were come forth (the only thing they always feared) to empeach and stop their passage, so as now there was no way for them to fly and escape from them, and save themselves, but must either die in the place, or slay their enemies and make a land even over their bodies. All their packs and fardels, they cast together upon an heap in the midst: and being armed as they were, every man ranged and marshalled themselves in their own arrays. Now was there a very little space between the two armies, and they stood looking one upon another, waiting when their enemies would begin to give the first charge, and set up the first shout. But neither of both had any stomach to fight. And surely on both sides they had gone sundry ways untouched, and without any blows given or taken, but that they feared both, lest if they had dismarched of one part first, the other would have come upon them. Thus of themselves they began a faint fight, as unwilling and loath thereto, with an uncertain and unequal shout: neither stirred any man one foot. Then the Roman Consul, to begin the skirmish, sent out some few Cornets of horsemen from a side, without the battaillons: whereof the most part fel from their horses, and others were disarrayed and put out of order: whereupon both Samnits ran out to kill those that were fallen, and Romans also to rescue their fellows. Then the skirmish began a little to wax hot: but the Samnits advanced forward in greater number far, and bestirred themselves (as it seemed) more lustily: and withal, the Roman horsemen being disordered and in confusion, with their horses affrighted trod under their feet the footmen that came to rescue. Who beginning once to flie, caused the whole Roman army also to turn their backs. And now the Samnits played upon the backs of the Romans, as they fled: whereat the Consul rode before a gallop to the camp gate, where he bestowed a good corps de guard of horsemen, opposite in the way: and made proclamation, that whosoever came toward the camp, were he Samnit or were he Roman, should be taken and used as an enemy. With these and such like threats, he put himself against the souldiers, that marched so fast in heaps to the camp. Whither away sirrah, (quoth he to every souldier that he met) even here shalt thou find men in arms to fight withal: here shalt thou meet with thine enemy, as well as in the field behind: no entring here into the camp without victory, so long as thy Consul liveth: chuse therefore whether thou hadst rather fight with thy own countrimen or thine enemies. Whiles the Consul entertained them with this welcom, the horsemen also with spear in rest, and bent full against them, came all about, charging the footmen upon their peril to turn again to battel. Thus not only the Consul his vertue and prowess served in good stead, but fortune also went on their side: for the Samnits followed not the chase so hard, but that the Romans had both time and ground enough to turn about their ensignes, and to direct their battaillons from their camp against the enemy. Then one encouraged another to go to battel again. The Centurions snatched the banners out of the bearers hands, and advanced them forward: declaring to their souldiers, how few the enemies were in number, and how disorderly and out of all array they came against them. In this while the Consul lift up his hands to heaven, and with a clear and audible voice, vowed a Temple to Jupiter Stator, if so be the Roman army stayed their flight, and by renewing the conflict should kill and vanquish the Samnits Legions. Hereupon endevoured they on all hands, the Captain and souldier, both horsemen and footmen, to re-enforce the battel. And even the very gods from heaven seemed to have a special regard of the Romans at that time, so quickly the dice turned, and the enemies were repulled from the ramparts, and within a small while forced again to the very place where the battel began. Whereby reason of their fardels and packs which they had heaped together in the midst, and now lay in their very way, they were stopped in their very passage, and for fear lest their goods should be rifled and spoiled, they cast a ring round about their bag and baggage. Then the Roman Infantry afront, and the Cavalry behind, compassed them, and charged upon them right fiercely: wherein the midst between, they were either slain or taken. The prisoners were in number 7300. who were all put naked under the yoke, and sold: the number of them that were slain was about 4800. The Romans for all this had no great list to boast and brag of their victory, for the Consul taking view and account of his loss these two days, found by computation, that he missed 7300.

Whiles these things thus passed in Apulia, the Samnits with another power, assayed to surprize and get again Interamna, a Colony of the Romans: situate upon the Latine high-way: but when they could not be masters of the town, they overran and plundered the territory: and having got a good booty of men, women, and cattel, one with another: whiles they were driving the same before them, together with certain Coloners whom they had taken prisoners, they light upon Consul as he returned with victory from Luceria: where they not only lost their spoil, but were themselves slain as they marched disorderly in long files. The Consul made proclamation, That every man should repair to Interamna, for to own and challenge his own goods, and to receive the same again: and there, leaving his army, went to Rome, against the Election of new Magistrates. When he laboured instantly for a triumph, he was denied that honor: both for that he had lost so many thousands, and also because he had put his captives under the gallows, and sold them, without farther imposition.

The other Col. Posthumius, wanting subject matter of war to work upon among the Samnits, passed

A passed with his army into Tuscany: and after he had first pill'd and spoiled the Volsinians territory, he gave them battel not far from their walls, who issued forth to defend their frontiers: where there were 2200. Tuscans slain: the rest, by reason that the City was so neer, escaped and saved themselves. Then led he his army into the territory of Rosellum, where he not only laid the fields waste, but won the town also: took prisoners above two thousand, and slew under two thousand before their walls. Howbeit, in that year, the peace obtained in Hetruria, was more honorable and renowned then the war had been. For three of the strongest and most puissant States, even the very Capital Cities of Tuscany, to wit, Volturni, Perusia, and Arretium, desired accord. And having conditioned with the Consul, and promised, to find his souldiers clothing and corn, so they might have leave to send Orators to Rome to treat for peace. obtained at length a truce of forty years. And for that present, each City was fined to pay * 500000 Asles. For these acts done, the Consul having requested triumph of the Senat, for manner and fashion, rather then upon any hope to speed: and perceiving some of them to deny him flatly, as pretending, that it was so late ere he departed the City: and other some, for that without order and direction of the Senat, he passed out of Samnium into Tuscany: and that partly his adversaries, & partly the friends of his Collegue, who might take some comfort and contentment, that he also had the repulse with him, were against his triumph: My Masters (quoth he) you that are Senators of Rome, I wil not be so far mindful of your honor and majesty, as that I will forget my self to be a Consul: and by vertue of the same authority of commission, wherewith I have conducted and managed these wars; for so much as, I have happily brought them to end, and subdued Samnium and Tuscany, atchieved victory, and obtained peace: triumph I will, and ask you no leave. And with that he departed out of the Senat. After this, there arose a debate and dissention among the Tribuns of the Commons. Some of them said, they would enterpose their negative, that he should not in this manner triumph, and give so ill a precedent. Others gave out, that they would assist him in his triumph, maugre the heads of all their Collegues. After much ado, the matter was referred unto the people, and the Consul being thither called, alledged, that L. Horatius, and Mar. Valerius Consuls, also Caius Marius Rutilius of late days, even the father of him, who then was Censor, triumphed without the authority and approbation of Senat, only by the ordinance of the people. Over and besides, he added and said, that himself also would have moved the people therein, but that he knew that the Tribuns of the Commons, who were become vassals and slaves to the Nobles, would have nipped and crossed the bill. As for himself, he protested, that he did and would account of the will and favour of the people, agreeing together, as well as of all their Acts and Decrees whatsoever. So the morrow after, by the assistance of three Trib. banded against the opposition and negative voices of seven, yea, and against the general resolution of the Senat, he triumphed: and all the people with great joy solemnized and celebrated the honor of that day. But the records do vary much about the acts and affairs of this year also. Claudius writeth, That Posthumus having won certain towns in Samnium, was after in Apulia discomfited and put to flight: and that himself in person being hurt, was with some few besides, driven to take Luceria for refuge: and that it was Artilius, that fought in Tuscany, and triumphed. Fabius contrarily reporteth, That both Consuls warred in Samnium, and at Luceria: and that one of the armies was transported into Tuscany: but which of the Consuls had the conduct thereof, he hath not set down wihal: also, that before Luceria, there were on both parts many slain: and how in that battel, there was a Temple vowed to Jupiter Stator, like as Romulus had done before in times past: howbeit, before this time, there was no Temple erected, but only a Fannus, [i. a place pronounced, destined, and consecrated before to build a Temple on.] But in this year at last, the City being now twice bound and obliged to perform one and the same vow, made a conscience of it, and moved the Senat to decree and take order, that the house and temple aforesaid should be edified accordingly.

After this year, there succeeded a brave and noble Consul, L. Papyrius Cursor, as well in regard of his fathers glory, as his own reputation. Also a mighty great war, and such a victory as never any General wan the like at the Samnites hands before that day, but L. Papyrius again the Consuls father. And as it fell out, they made the like preparation for war, with the same endeavor and furniture of most costly and brave armor, as before time. Moreover, they used the help and favor of the gods besides, by a strange kind of induction and institution of the souldiers, binding them to take their oath, after an old ceremonial custom, as if they were to take orders in some holy mysteries: yea, and levied musters throughout all Samnium, after a new form of a law and edict: That whosoever of the younger sort and serviceable men, fit to bear arms, shewed not themselves, and gave attendance at the Generals appointment and proclamation, and whosoever departed without his leave and licence, his head should be forfeit unto Jupiter as accursed and damned. Which done, the Rendezvous was appointed at Aquilonia, for all the forces to assemble. Where there gathered together, to the number of forty thousand fighting men, even the whole flower and manhood of Samnium. There, about the midst of the camp, was a plot of ground set out, well fenced and enclosed all about with hurdles and boards, and the same covered all over with linnen cloaths: the place was two hundred foot square, every way. Then there was a solemn sacrifice celebrated, and divine service said, according to an order read out of an old book made of linnen, and the same by a certain Priest, one Ovinus Paccius, a very aged man: who avouched, that he fet these sacred and holy ceremonies from the old ancient Religion of the Samnites, according to the manner and custom, which in times past their ancestors had used, at what time as they conspired secretly and conspired, to surprize Capua out of the Tuscans hands. When the sacrifice was done, the General of the army by his Purfivant at arms, commanded to cite and call forth by name, the noblest persons, either for parentage, or acts achieved: who were brought into the place aforesaid, one by one. Amongst other preparations of this sacred solemnity (which were able to strike a religious fear and devotion in a mans mind) there were certain altars erected in the midst of this place closely covered in all parts, and sacrifices lying slain all about, and the Centurions standing round with their swords ready drawn. Then the souldier was caused to approach neer the altars (like a sacrifice himself, rather then one that should have his part of the sacrifice) and urged by vertue of an oath, to promise, that he would never utter abroad and reveal, whatsoever he there should see or hear. Afterward he was put to swear, after an horrible and dreadful form of words, framed and tending expressely to the cursing of his own person, his house and all his race and linage, in case, he went not into any battel, wheresoever the Generals should lead him, and if either himself fled out of the field, or saw any one to run away, and slew him not outright in the place. At the first verily, some there were that refused to take such an oath, and presently were massacred by the Altars side. And lying there along together with the beasts, which had their throats cut for sacrifices, they served for a warning to teach all the rest how they made refusal. When the chief of the Samnits had taken this abominable and cursed oath, ten of them were elected and nominated by the sovereign Captain, who every one had in charge to chuse himself a fellow, and they likewise successively to take other to them, man by man, until they had made up the number of 16000. And these were called Limeata Legio [i. the linnen Legion] taking the name of the covering of that inclosure, wherein the Nobility of the Samnits were sworn. These had given unto them brave and glorious armor, with helmets crested and plumed, because they should seem taller then the rest. Another army there was, consisting of twenty thousand and better, who neither in goodly and tall personage, nor in martial prowels and reputation, nor yet in furniture and setting out, were inferiour to the linnen Legion aforesaid. Lo, what a number there was of fighting men, even the whole strength and manhood of all Samnium, assembled and encamped in Aquilona.

The Roman Consuls took their journey from the City of Rome, and C. Carvilius first; unto whom were appointed the old Legions, which M. Attilius the Consul of the former year, had left in the territory of Interamna. And with them he marched into Samnium. And mean while that the enemies were over much busied and amused about their superstitious ceremonies, and held their secret and mystical counsels, he won by force from the Samnits, the town Amisernum. Where almost 2800. men were slain, and 4270. taken prisoners. But Papirius, having by direction from the Senat enrolled a new army, forced the town Duronia; took fewer prisoners then his Colleague, but in lieu thereof, put many more to the sword. A rich booty there was got, both in the one place and the other. Afterwards, the Consuls oversaw the whole counry of Samnium, but they spoiled and wasted especially the lands about Atinum. Carvilius marched as far as Cominium, and Papirius to Aquilona, where the whole power of the Samnits lay encamped. There, for a good while they neither sat still, and were altogether idle in the camp, nor yet was there any hot service in the field. They spent the time in provoking them to fight, that gladly would have sitten still; or in lying off and giving ground, to those that assailed them: and thus, I say, with threatening, rather then offering battel, they passed the day. For whiles they began ever and anon, and gave over as quickly, there was no issue seen of any skirmishes, & the decision even of small matters and occurrents were prolonged and put off from day to day. The other camp of the Romans lay twenty miles off: and albeit the other Consul was absent, yet his hand and counsel was in every enterprise and exploit. For as there lay a greater weight and charge at Aquilona, then at Cominium: so Carvilius had a more careful eye that way, then to the place which himself besieged. L. Papirius being now at all points provided to fight, dispatched a messenger to his Colleague, to signifie unto him: that he minded the next day, if he were not checked by the Auspices to give the enemy battel: and withal, that it was expedient and needful that he likewise should with all his forces assault Cominium; that the Samnits within, might have neither means nor leisure to send any succour to Aquilona. This post had that one day allowed him to doe his message, and attend his dispatch; and by night he made return, and brought word unto the Consul from his Colleague, that he liked well of his purpose and advice. Papirius then immediately dismissed and sent away the courier aforesaid, and assembled his souldiers to an audience, where he discoursed at large concerning war in general. Much he spake also as touching the present preparation and magnificent furniture of the enemies, more brave and goodly for shew and ostentation then effectual and of importance in the end: "For they are not the plumed crests (quoth he) that give the deadly wounds. but the Romans spear and lance it is, that is able to pierce their gilded and damasked shields: yea, and that other glittering army with milk white diaper coats. must be died red in blood, when they come to stroaks, and to try it out by dint of sword. The golden and silvered armies of the Samnits, were sometimes by my father put to the sword, and killed to the last man: and they served rather for rich spoils to honour the victorious enemy, then for armor of proof, to defend and save themselves. This is a fatal gift, and destined to our name and family, for to be chosen Generals, and to be opposed against the greatest puissance and attempts of the Samnits, and to bring away with them, those spoils which might be ornaments to beautifie the publick places of the City. And the immortal gods

A "no doubt are present to defend and assist us in our quarrel, against those that so oft have sought for peace and alliance, and as often broke the same themselves. And if a man may conjecture and guess of the will and providence of the Gods, they never were to any army more adverse and full of indignity, then to that, which being stained and polluted with the blood of beasts and men, massacred and mingled together in an horrible and execrable kind of sacrifice; and devoted to a double anger of the gods, having in dread and horror of one side, the vengeance of the same gods, witnesses off their breach of covenants with the Romans; and on the other side the detestable and abominable curses, comprised in an oath, taken against all covenant and promise; hath sworn by constraint and perforce; hateth and detesteth the oath whereby they are perjured, and at one time, is in fear of the gods, of their own selves, and their enemies.

B Thus having shewed unto his souldiers (who were already of themselves badly and maliciously enough bent against the enemies) that he had certain intelligence of all these things, by the constant relation averred by certain fugitives that were fled from them unto him; they all being now full of assured hope of Gods help and mans, with one uniform cry called for battel: and nothing grieved them more then this, That it was put off until the morrow; having in their hearts the rest of that day behind; and that one night, for being so long. About mid-night, Papyrius having received letters back from his Collegue, gat him up closely when all were fast asleep, and sent the chick-master to take token, & observe the presage of the pullers. There was not one throughout the whole camp, of what quality or degree soever but had a desire to fight. The highest as well as the lowest were earnest and eager: the Captains might behold and see the souldiers affection and courage that way, and the souldier likewise the Captains; in so much that the same ardent desire of battel which was in all the rest, reached also even to those that had the charge of the Auspices. For when as the chickens would not peck, the chick-master adventured to lye and falsifie the token, and made report to the Consul, that it was * Tripudium solistimum. Whereat the Consul right glad and joyous, pronounced that the token was lucky, and that they were to fight under the favour and conduct of the gods; and hereupon he put forth the signal or bloody banner of battel. As he was now marching forth into the field with his army, behold a fugitive out of the enemies camp, brought word, that twenty cohorts or companies of Samnits, and those were about 400. in a cohort, were gone to Cominium. And because his Collegue Carvilius should not be ignorant hereof, he presently dispatched a currier in post unto him, and himself commanded the Ensigns and Standards to be advanced and set forward with speed, ordaining the bands in the rereward for succours, and disposing them in divers places, with Captains over the same, accordingly. He appointed L. Volumnius to lead the right wing, and L. Scipio the left, and the horsemen he committed to the conduct of two other Lieutenants, C. Ceditius, and Trebonius. As for Sp. Nautius, he charged him in all haste to take off the pack-saddles from the Mules, and to mount the cohorts of the light armed footmen that serve in the wings, upon their backs, and with them to fetch a compass, and to seize upon an hill there in sight, and in the heat of the conflict, to shew himself from thence and to raise as great a cloud of dust as possibly he could. While the General was occupied hereabout, there arose some warbling amongst the chicken-masters touching the Auspice or presage of that day; in so much as they were overheard of the Roman horsemen; who supposing it a matter of good consequence and to be regarded, advertised Sp. Papyrius (the Consuls Nephew, or Brothers Son) that there was some doubt and question about the Auspice. The youth born in those days when there were no Atheists, nor Lectures read of despising God and Religion; enquired farther into the matter, because he would not certifie any thing wherof he was not sure: and when he had found out the truth, gave knowledg thereof to the Consul: who said thus unto him, "God blest thee my son, and be not thou dismayed therat, but fight hardly more valiantly, and do thy best endeavour. As for him that has the charge and oversight of the Birds and Auspice, if he have made a wrong report, and given up a contrary presage, or false sign, all the mischief and peril light upon his own head for his lewd lye. As for me

F "I was told of a Tripudium, and that the birds fell heartily to their meat: and I hold it for a lucky Auspice and token of good success unto the people of Rome and the army, and for no other. This said, he commanded the Centurions to set those pullers, in the forefront of the battel. The Samnits also for their part set forward their Ensigns, and their battaillons follow after gallantly set out in gorgeous armor and brave apparrel, in such sort, as the very sight of the enemies represented a magnificent and stately shew to the beholders. But see what hapned; before the first shout given, before the first volley of shot and encounter, the principal Puller chanced to be stricken with a javelin, lanced at adventure and at random, and fell down dead even before the Ensigns. Which being reported unto the Consul, "Behold the handy work of God (quoth he) the gods are present in this battel, the guilty person hath his due reward. And as the Consul was a speaking these words, lo, just before him a Raven set out a wide clear throat, and cried with a loud note: at which Augury, the Cos. rejoiced, and avowed, that the gods appeared never in mens affairs more evidently. And herewith he commanded the trumpets to sound, and to set up a lusty shout: then followed a cruel and terrible fight on both sides, but with hearts and courages far unlike. The Romans were ravished and carried on end to the battel, with anger, hope, and heat of conflict greedy of bathing their swords, and embruving their hands in the enemies bloodshed. But the Samnits many of them by force of necessity, and constraint of a blind and superstitious religion, even against their wills, were forced to make resistance, and defend themselves rather then to fight

* The chickens fell to their meat so eagerly, that with their hasty feeding, some corn fell from their bills to the ground, and rebounded again: and this was Tripudium solistimum, and in their learning was reputed the best Auspice in that kind, and prelagged most happy success.
